

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE v. SHERIFF OF LONDON.

[CT. OF APP.]

Supreme Court of Judicature.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Monday, July 16, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE v. SHERIFF OF LONDON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Sheriff—Seizure of goods of person liable to pay rates—Goods "taken in execution"—Privilege of overseers—Duty of sheriff to pay rate collector—35 Geo. 3, c. 73, s. 195—Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 161.

By a local Act affecting the parish of St. Marylebone it was provided that when the goods of any person liable to pay any rate by virtue of that Act should be "taken in execution" by the sheriff before such rate should have been paid, then the sheriff, upon demand made by the rate collector, was "directed and required in the first place to pay to such collector" such rate which shall not then have been paid.

By sect. 161 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 the overseers of every parish are to collect the rates mentioned in the section, and for the purpose of levying such rates, shall proceed in the same manner, and have the same powers, remedies, and privileges as for levying poor rate.

The goods of a judgment debtor, who was liable to pay to the vestry of St. Marylebone a poor rate made by them under their local Act, and also other rates made by them under the Metropolis Management Act 1855, were seized by the sheriff under a writ of fi. fa. The rate collector demanded payment from the sheriff of all the rates due. The judgment debtor subsequently paid to the sheriff the amount due in respect of the judgment debt, and the sheriff thereupon withdrew from possession of the goods, paying the judgment debtor his claim, but not paying to the rate collector the amount of the rates due to the vestry.

In an action by the vestry against the sheriff to recover the amount of the rates for which the judgment debtor had been liable:

Held, that the goods had been "taken in execution" within the meaning of the local Act, and that the privileges given to the overseers by sect. 161 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 included the privilege given by the local Act with regard to a rate made under that Act.

Held, therefore (affirming the decision of Bigham, J.), that the sheriff was liable to the vestry for the amount of all the rates which the rate collector had demanded of him.

THIS was an appeal by the defendant from the judgment of Bigham, J. at the trial of the action without a jury.

The action was brought to recover a sum of 18l. 19s. 3d. which sum the plaintiffs alleged was payable to them by the defendant under sect. 195 of the 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, under the following circumstances:

On the 17th Nov. 1898 the defendant seized under a writ of fieri facias the goods of one T. M. Bush, at 50, Crawford-street, in the parish of St. Marylebone.

On the 24th Nov. the plaintiffs' rate collector served on the defendant a written demand for the payment of 18l. 19s. 3d., which was the amount due to the plaintiffs from Bush in respect of eleven months' rates.

This amount was less than the value of the goods seized.

The rates in respect of which Bush was liable to the plaintiffs were a poor rate made under a VESTRY OF ST. MARYLEBONE v. SHERIFF OF LONDON.

[CT. OF APP.]

local Act of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, and other rates made under the Metropolis Management Act 1855.

On the 25th Nov., the defendant being still in possession of the goods, Bush paid to him the amount of the judgment debt, which was more than the amount demanded by the rate collector from the defendant in respect of Bush's liability for rates.

On the same day the defendant handed over to the judgment creditor the amount of the judgment debt and then withdrew from possession of the goods without having satisfied the demand made by the rate collector.

At the trial of the action without a jury, Bigham, J. gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The defendant appealed.

By 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, which is entitled "An Act for repealing several Acts . . . and for paving, repairing, cleansing, and lighting the parish of St. Marylebone in the county of Middlesex and for the better relief and maintenance of the poor thereof and for divers other purposes . . ." it is provided as follows:

Sect. 195. When and as often as the goods, chattels, and effects of any person or persons liable to pay any rate or assessment by virtue of this Act shall be taken in execution, within the limits aforesaid, by any sheriff or other officer, before such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, shall have been paid, then the said sheriff or other officer, upon demand made by the collector or collectors for the time being to the said vestrymen shall, and he is hereby directed and required, in the first place, to pay to such collector or collectors such rate or rates, assessment or assessments, so made as aforesaid, and which shall not have been paid by such person or persons, and all arrears due thereon; provided always that nothing herein contained shall extend, or be construed to extend, so as to charge such sheriff or other officer with the payment of more than one year's rate or of a larger sum of money than the value of the goods, chattels, and effects so taken in execution.

By the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) it is provided as follows:

Sect. 161. The overseers of the poor of every parish to whom any such order as aforesaid is issued shall levy the amount mentioned therein, and shall for that purpose make separate equal pound rates upon their parish, or the part thereof upon which any sum specified in such order is required to be levied, in respect of each sum thereby ordered to be levied; that is to say . . . a sewers rate, . . . a lighting rate, and . . . a general rate . . . and the said overseers shall, for the purpose of levying such rates, proceed in the same manner, and have the same powers, remedies, and privileges, as for levying money for the relief of the poor.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. and P. Rose-Innes for the defendant.—The debtor's goods were not "taken in execution" within the meaning of those words in sect. 195 of the local Act. "Taken" does not mean "taken into the possession of the sheriff"; it means "taken away from the place where they were seized and sold." The expression "taken in execution" is exactly equivalent to the expression "taken by virtue of an execution" which occurs in the Act 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1. The words used in that Act imply the removal and sale of the goods:

Riseley v. Ryle, 11 M. & W. 16;

Re McCarthy, 7 L. Rep. Ir. 473.

Secondly, it was not "by virtue of" the local Act of 1795, that the judgment debtor was liable to pay the amount of the rates demanded by the late collector from the sheriff, and therefore the plaintiffs cannot rely upon the privilege granted by sect. 195 of that Act. That Act has been superseded by the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and it is under the latter Act that the rates were payable:

Reg. on the Prosecution of Paddington Vestry v. Great Western Railway Company, 28 L. J. 59, M. C.

The Act of 1855 does not incorporate sect. 195 of the local Act. Sect. 161 of the Act of 1855 does not say that the overseers are to have the same powers as the collector of the vestry had under the local Act.

English Harrison, Q.C. (Manisty with him) for the plaintiffs.—There is no reason why the words, "taken in execution" should in this Act of 1795 be construed in any other than their ordinary meaning—i.e., "seized in execution." The Act of 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, had reference to the payment of rent "before the removal of the goods" and that explains the interpretation given to the expression "by virtue of an execution" in that Act. Secondly, though part of the sum due from the judgment debtor to the plaintiffs was in respect of rates made under the Act of 1855, yet the greater part was due in respect of a poor rate made under the local Act, and sect. 161 of the Act of 1855 gives the overseers the same privileges in respect of the rates there named as they have for levying poor rate. By sect. 250 of the Act "overseers of the poor" is to include collectors of poor rate. By sect. 8 all the powers held by the old vestries were transferred to the new vestries.

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. in reply.

SMITH, L.J.—Two questions have been raised upon this appeal, one of which is a matter of considerable complication, though the other one is plain enough. I will take the simple one first. The sole question there raised is as to the meaning of the words "goods taken in execution" in sect. 195 of the Act of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73. The sheriff in this case seized certain goods under a writ of feri facias. Bigham, J. held that those goods were "taken in execution" within the meaning of those words in sect. 195. I think that in so holding the learned judge was perfectly right. The other question raised in this case is more difficult to decide. The sheriff seized the goods under the feri facias on the 17th Nov. On the 24th Nov., while he was still in possession of the goods, a written notice was served on him by the collector to the vestry of Marylebone, to the effect that the judgment debtor owed the vestry 18l. 19s. 3d. for eleven months' rates, and the collector demanded payment of that sum by the sheriff. The next day, the 25th Nov., the judgment debtor paid the sheriff enough money to satisfy the judgment, and the sheriff accordingly paid over to the judgment creditor, the amount due to him, and withdrew from possession of the goods without having paid to the rate collector the 18l. 19s. 3d. which had been demanded. Under these circumstances the vestry are now suing the sheriff on the ground that under sect. 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, he ought to have paid them the amount of rates due from the judgment debtor before he handed over to the judgment creditor the amount which he had received from the judgment debtor. Sect. 195 provides that whenever the goods of any person "liable to pay any rate or assessment by virtue of this Act" shall be taken in execution within certain limits by any sheriff before such rate or assessment shall have been paid, the sheriff upon receiving notice shall in the first place pay to the rate collector the amount of the rate or assessment which shall not have been paid by such person. On behalf of the defendant it is contended that the rates which were due from the judgment debtor to the vestry were not rates which the debtor was liable to pay "by virtue of" the Act of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73. The rates for which the collector demanded payment from the sheriff included a poor rate, a general rate, a sewers rate, and two other rates. Now the poor rate, in my opinion was due by virtue of the Act of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73. It purports to have been made under that Act, and that Act has never been repealed. The Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) does not deal at all with poor rate, though it does give power to make certain other rates. I come to the conclusion, therefore, that the judgment debtor was liable to pay poor rate by virtue of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, and therefore with regard to that rate the vestry were entitled under sect. 195 to be paid by the sheriff. With regard to the rates other than poor rate, I think that they were made by virtue of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and not by virtue of 35 Geo. 3 c. 73; but then we must take into consideration the clause at the end of sect. 161 of that Act. After giving power to the overseers to levy certain rates, sect. 161 continues thus: "And the said overseers shall, for the purpose of levying such rates, proceed in the same manner, and have the same powers, remedies, and privileges as for levying money for the relief of the poor." Now one of the powers, remedies, and privileges which are given by the Act of 35 Geo. 3 c. 73, with regard to poor rate is that given by sect. 195 under which, after giving notice to the sheriff when he has taken in execution the goods of any person liable to pay poor rate under the Act, the vestry is entitled to require the sheriff to hand over to them, in the first place, the amount of poor rate due from such person before the judgment creditor is paid. In my opinion, therefore, this privilege extended to the other rates, besides the poor rate, payment of which was demanded by the vestry. Bigham, J. was right in so holding, and I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree. Now that the matter has been threshed out, it is clear that it resolves itself into two points only, and I have very little to add to what Smith, L.J. has said upon them. In so far as the payment demanded by the collector from the sheriff was in respect of rates other than poor rate, it seems to me that the clause in sect. 161 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, giving to the overseers the same privileges as they have in respect of poor rate is absolutely fatal to the argument that was put forward on behalf of the sheriff, unless the meaning of the clause can be limited by construing them as referring only to powers exercised generally by overseers, not including special powers given by local Acts. With regard to the other point, it was contended that the words "taken in execution" in sect. 195 of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, ought to be construed in the same way as the words "taken by virtue of any execution" in 8 Anne, c. 14, s. 1, were construed in Biseley v. Ryle (ubi sup.). There seems to me to be no ground for that contention. The construction which has been put upon the words "taken by virtue of any execution" in the statute of Anne, depends upon the presence in the earlier part of the section of the words "before the removal of such goods from off the said premises"; and it was held that what was intended to be forbidden by the statute was the removal of the goods from the premises unless the rent is first paid. The Act is very different from the Act which we have now to construe. By sect. 195 of the Act of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, where demand has been made by the collector of payment of the rates due, the sheriff is directed and required in the first place to pay to such collector the rates due and unpaid provided that the sheriff is not liable to pay more than one year's rates, nor more than the value of the goods taken in execution.

ROMER, L.J.—I agree. I only wish to add a few words as to the effect of these two Acts of 1795 and 1855. Until the matter was fully threshed out, the point involved seemed a little difficult; but it now seems clear enough, and I cannot help thinking that the case is really concluded by the decision in Vaughan v. Imray (28 L. J. 78, M. C.). In that case the facts were that by an Act of George II. the hamlet of Spitalfields was made a distinct parish, and persons possessing certain qualifications were constituted vestrymen. By a subsequent local Act in the same reign power was given to this vestry to make poor rates. Then under the Metropolis Management Act 1855 a new vestry was constituted to supersede the old one and to exercise the powers and privileges held by the then existing vestry. The court held that under these provisions the new vestry had the power of making poor rates which had been possessed by the old vestry. In the present case the vestry of Marylebone, after the passing of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, still possessed the power given by the Act of 35 Geo. 3, c. 73, of making a poor rate, and the poor rate made by it was made by virtue of their old Act, and they still had the privilege given them by sect. 195 of the old Act to assist them in getting in the rates due to them, in cases where the goods of persons who had not paid the rates due from them had been taken in execution by the sheriff. Then by sect. 161 of the Act of 1855 the privileges possessed by the overseers for the purpose of levying poor rates were extended to apply to the cases of other rates which the overseers were empowered to levy under the Act of 1855. The plaintiffs are, therefore, right in their contention, and I agree that the appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BOSTOCK v. RAMSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[OT. OF APP.]

Friday, July 20, 1900.

(Before SMITH, WILLIAMS, and ROMER, L.JJ.)

BOSTOCK v. RAMSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Practice—Costs—Action against public authority—Jurisdiction of judge to deprive successful defendant of costs—Discretion—"Good cause"—Order LXV., r. 1—Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. 61), s. 1 (b).

Sect. 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 provides that where an action is brought against a public authority for any act done in execution of any Act of Parliament, and judgment is given for the defendant, the judgment shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

Held, affirming the decision of Lord Russell, C.J., that this enactment does not take away from the judge at the trial of the action with a jury the jurisdiction given him by Order LXV., r. 1 of depriving a successful defendant of costs for "good cause."

In an action for malicious prosecution, evidence of conduct of the defendant previous to and conducing to the plaintiff's action may be taken into consideration by the judge for the purpose of deciding whether or not there is "good cause" for depriving the defendant of costs.

THIS was an appeal from an order of Lord Russell, C.J. at the trial of the action with a jury depriving the successful defendants of costs.

The action was for malicious prosecution and was brought under the following circumstances:

The plaintiff was proprietor of a travelling menagerie.

On its arrival at Ramsey in Huntingdonshire on the 15th Dec. 1897 the manager put it up on a piece of open ground where it had been put up on previous occasions when visiting the town.

This piece of ground was alleged by the defendants to be a public highway but they did not take any steps to compel the removal of the vans, and after remaining there for one night the menagerie left the town.

The plaintiff was in Scotland at the time and had no knowledge of what was being done.

The defendants, by their solicitors, then wrote to the plaintiff giving him formal notice that if he persisted in putting up his menagerie in the streets of Ramsey, they would without further notice, commence an action against him for damages, and apply to the court for an injunction.

In May 1898, the defendants preferred an indictment against the plaintiff at Huntingdon Assizes for having unlawfully obstructed the highway, they having been advised by counsel that this was an available remedy against the plaintiff.

The indictment was tried before Wills J., and on his direction the jury acquitted the plaintiff.

The plaintiff then brought the present action for malicious prosecution.

The action was tried before Lord Russell, C.J. with a jury. He ruled that there was reasonable and probable cause for the prosecution, and that there was no evidence of malice, and directed judgment to be entered for the defendants without costs.

On further consideration the Lord Chief Justice held that there was nothing in sect. 1, sub-sect. (b), of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 which prevented him from depriving the defendants of costs under Order LXV., r. 1, and, taking the circumstances of the case into consideration, he held that there was "good cause" within Order LXV., r. 1, for depriving the defendants of costs, and he made an order accordingly.

This decision of the Lord Chief Justice is reported in 81 L. T. Rep. 756; (1900) 1 Q. B. 357.

By Order LXV., r. 1, it is provided as follows:

Subject to the provisions of the Acts and these rules, the costs of and incident to all proceedings in the Supreme Court . . . shall be in the discretion of the court or judge . . . provided also that where any action, cause, matter, or issue, is tried with a jury the costs shall follow the event, unless the judge by whom such action, cause, matter, or issue, is tried, or the court, shall for good cause, otherwise order.

The Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61) provides as follows:

Sect. 1. Where after the commencement of this Act any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom, against any person for any Act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority . . . the following provisions shall have effect: . . . (b) Wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant, it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

Lawson Walton, Q.C. and J. W. Cooper for the defendants.—First, there were no facts before the Lord Chief Justice which could constitute "good cause" within Order LXV., r. 1. The question whether there were any such facts before a judge who has deprived a successful party of costs is one on which an appeal lies to this court:

Husley v. West London Extension Railway Company, 60 L. T. Rep. 642; 14 App. Cas. 26.

The mere fact of the failure of the prosecution which was instituted by the defendants cannot be "good cause." Nor was there any such conduct of the defendants before litigation as in the case of Harnett v. Vise (43 L. T. Rep. 645; 5 Ex. Div. 307) was held sufficient to constitute "good cause." Secondly, it is immaterial whether or not there was "good cause" within the meaning of Order LXV., r. 1. The Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 gives the defendants in the present case an absolute right to costs, and the Lord Chief Justice had no power to exercise any discretion in the matter. The Act is a consolidation Act by which it was never intended to put public authorities in a worse position than they were in before. It is clear that many of the Acts which it repeals gave such an absolute right as the defendants now contend for:

Harker v. Wood, 54 L. J. 419, Q. B.;Fielden v. Morley Corporation, 82 L. T. Rep. 29; (1900) A. C. 133;Reeve v. Gibson, 64 L. T. Rep. 141; (1891) 1 Q. B. 652.

Blake Odgers, Q.C. and P. Rose-Innes for the plaintiff.—First, apart from the question of the construction of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, it is clear from the decision of the Court of Appeal in Harnett v. Vise (ubi sup.) that for the purposes of deciding whether or not there was “good cause” within Order LXV., r. 1, the Lord Chief Justice was entitled to take into consideration the conduct of the defendants which induced the plaintiff to bring the action of malicious prosecution. With regard to the construction of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, the object of sect. 1, sub-sect. (b) was to overrule Avery v. Wood (65 L. T. Rep. 122; (1891) 3 Ch. 115), and to declare that where a public authority was a successful defendant in any such action as is mentioned in sect. 1, it should, if entitled to costs, have those costs taxed as between solicitor and client. It would not be reasonable to construe the Act so as to give a public authority its costs in every case where it defended an action successfully, regardless of how oppressive or vexatious its conduct may have been. They referred to Holford v. Acton Urban District Council, 78 L. T. Rep. 829; (1898) 2 Ch. 240;Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. Southampton Local Board of Health, 8 E. & B. 801.Lawson Walton, Q.C. replied.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal from an order of the Lord Chief Justice depriving the successful defendants of costs in an action for malicious prosecution. The plaintiff was the proprietor of a travelling menagerie, and for many years when visiting the town of Ramsey it had been usual for the menagerie to occupy a particular piece of open ground in the town. In Dec. 1897 the menagerie arrived at Ramsey and remained there for one night. The plaintiff's manager set it up in the usual spot, as he thought he was entitled to do. The defendants took no steps to put a stop to what the manager was doing, and, after remaining one night the menagerie was taken off to some other town. Some months after an indictment for obstructing the highway was preferred by the defendants against the plaintiff at Huntingdon Assizes. The judge who presided at the trial held that there was no case, and directed an acquittal. Thereupon the plaintiff, having been acquitted, brought this action against the defendants for malicious prosecution. The action was tried before Lord Russell, C.J., with a jury, and he came to the conclusion that there was no evidence of malice on the part of the defendants or of absence of reasonable and probable cause, and he directed a verdict for the defendants. It is obvious that he took a very decided view of the conduct of the defendants in instituting the prosecution against the plaintiff, and therefore, acting under Order LXV., r. 1, he deprived the defendants of the costs which as successful defendants they would otherwise have been entitled to. The Lord Chief Justice thought that the conduct of the defendants in presenting an indictment against the plaintiff, instead of taking the simple steps to which he adverted, was conduct which naturally induced the plaintiff to think that they were acting maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause, that is to say, that the defendants' unreasonable conduct had induced the plaintiff to bring his action for malicious prosecution. On that ground he held that there was “good cause” for depriving the defendants of costs. Two questions now arise. The first is, was there any evidence of “good cause” within the meaning of Order LXV., r. 1? It has been held, and it is clear law, that if there is any evidence at all of good cause, the question whether the defendants shall be deprived of costs is one for the discretion of the judge at the trial, and no appeal lies against the way in which he has exercised his discretion. That was laid down in the cases of Jones v. Curling (50 L. T. Rep. 349; 13 Q. B. Div. 262) and Husley v. West London Extension Railway Company (60 L. T. Rep. 642; 14 App. Cas. 26). The point for us to consider now is, therefore, whether there was any evidence before the Lord Chief Justice that the conduct of the defendants in instituting this prosecution was such as might give rise to a reasonable belief in the plaintiff's mind that he would succeed in any action which he might bring against the defendants for malicious prosecution. It is clear that the conduct which is relied upon as constituting “good cause” must be connected with the subject-matter of the action. I think that the Lord Chief Justice was quite right in holding that the judge is not confined to the consideration of the defendants' conduct in the actual litigation itself, but may also take into consideration matters which led up to and were the occasion of that litigation. That was what was held by the Court of Appeal, in Harnett v. Vise (43 L. T. Rep. 645; 5 Ex. Div. 307). That was an action for libel in which the jury found a verdict for the plaintiff. It was tried before Huddleston, B., and upon the application of the defendant's counsel the learned judge deprived the plaintiff of his costs on the ground that he had brought the libel upon himself by his incautious conduct. On the matter coming before the Court of Appeal, James, L.J. said he was of opinion that the jurisdiction as to costs given to the judge was not confined to the conduct of the parties in the litigation itself and that it is the duty of the judge to consider the whole circumstances of the case, everything which led to the action, everything which led to the libel, everything in the conduct of the parties which may show that the action was not properly brought in respect of the libel complained of. In the present case I think that there was evidence of conduct on the part of the defendants such as to lead the plaintiff to think that he had a good cause of action against them, and the Lord Chief Justice rightly took that evidence into consideration in deciding whether or not there was good cause for depriving them of costs. On that ground, therefore, the appeal fails. I now come to the second point as to the true construction of sect. 1 (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893. It seems to me unnecessary to go back to the earlier Acts which that Act repealed. The words of the existing Act are, in my opinion, perfectly clear. The sub-section provides that where any action is commenced against any person for any act done in pursuance, or execution, or intended execution, of any Act of Parliament, or of any public duty or authority, and wherever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant, such judgment shall "carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client." That enactment means that the judgment is to carry those costs, in a case where the defendant is entitled to costs. It does not mean that the defendant is to have costs in a case in which he is not entitled to costs. It would not be reasonable to construe the sub-section as meaning that, in all cases, however vexatious and unreasonable the defendant's conduct may have been, he is to have costs as between solicitor and client. The only adverse opinion that I am aware of is that which was expressed by Bruce, J. in Cree v. St. Pancras Vestry (ubi sup.), but I feel unable to agree in the view then taken by the learned judge. On the other hand, there is the opinion on the construction of this Act which was expressed by my brother Romer in the case of North Metropolitan Tramways Company v. London County Council (78 L. T. Rep. 711; (1898) 2 Ch. 145). As to Harker v. Wood (ubi sup.), I think that, when once the true construction of the Act has been arrived at, the case has no application to the present. I think that the appeal must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. The arguments in this case have made perfectly plain what are the points really in issue. The question is as to the application of the provision of Order LXV., r. 1, that where an action is tried with a jury the judge may, for good cause, order that the costs shall not follow the event. Two points have been raised. First, it was said that that provision has no application at all to the present action, because under the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 the defendants are absolutely entitled to costs as between solicitor and client, and their rights under the Act cannot be affected by the judgment of the judge at the trial. Of course it is not contested by the plaintiff that, if an Act of Parliament provides that in a given event a litigant shall be entitled to costs, the judge at the trial would have no jurisdiction to deprive the litigant of his right; but the plaintiff says that the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 does not contain any such provision as is alleged. I do not think it does. Sect. 1 (b) cannot be reasonably construed as giving a successful defendant an absolute right to costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client to the exclusion of the exercise of the discretion of the judge which is given by Order LXV., r. 1. I will not repeat what was said by the Lord Chief Justice with reference to the case of Southampton and Itchin Bridge Company v. Southampton Local Board of Health (ubi sup.). But, apart from those considerations, I think that the words of the sub-section, when considered in connection with the provisions of the Act as a whole, do not import any intention to give the defendant costs to the exclusion of the discretion of the judge under Order LXV., r. 1. I think that the Legislature only meant to fix the measure of costs in a case where the defendant is to have costs. It was not meant that every judgment for the defendant must carry costs. The later provisions of the section seem to me to tend to show that this is so. By sub-sect. (c) where an action for damages is commenced after tender of amends or is proceeded with after payment into court in satisfaction of the plaintiff's claim, and the plaintiff does not recover more than the sum tendered or paid, he shall not recover any costs incurred after the tender or payment, "and the defendant shall be entitled to costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client, as from the time of the tender or payment." The case there contemplated seems to be one in which the plaintiff has vexatiously carried on the litigation after sufficient amends have been offered, and therefore in that case it is provided that the defendant "shall be entitled to costs" to be taxed as between solicitor and client as from the time of the tender or payment. I think that the words used in sub-sect (b): "shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client," cannot have been intended by the Legislature to have the same meaning as the words used in sub-sect (c): "the defendant shall be entitled to costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client." So much for the first point. The other point is this: Assuming that the Lord Chief Justice had jurisdiction to exercise a discretion as to depriving the defendants of costs for "good cause," were there any facts before him on which he was entitled to hold that the defendants had so conducted the litigation that they ought not to have their costs? It is not disputed by the plaintiff that there must be some facts before the judge to form a basis for the exercise of his discretion. Both sides accept the law as laid down in Harnett v. Vise (ubi sup.); and, therefore, the only real question is whether there was conduct on the part of the defendants which can be considered as having led to the action being brought, and but for which it probably would never have been brought. I think that there were facts which the Lord Chief Justice was entitled to treat as constituting "good cause" within Order LXV., r. 1, and in that case this court has no jurisdiction to review his decision in the matter. No one can deny that it is possible that the defendants might so act as to give the plaintiff reasonable ground for supposing that they were actuated by malice when they prosecuted him and that they prosecuted him without reasonable and probable cause. The circumstances of the present action are such as to afford some ground for supposing that such was in fact the case. With regard to the question of malice, the matter has not been very strongly contested; and as to the absence of reasonable and probable cause, it appears that the defendants themselves at the outset of the affair took the view that their proper remedy was in a civil court, and expressed that view to the plaintiff. It seems that they changed their mind because they were advised that an indictment would be a cheaper remedy. They did not, however, communicate with the plaintiff the reasons for their change of view, but left him to suppose that they knew that their proper remedy was a civil one. The result of the trial of the plaintiff at the assizes would be to confirm the impression made in the mind of Wills, J. who tried the case, that the defendants had behaved unreasonably in instituting a prosecution. It seems to me impossible to say that there were not some facts before the Lord Chief Justice on which he might come to the conclusion that the defendants by their conduct had conducted to the plaintiff's bringing the action and had induced in his mind the belief that they had acted maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause. The Lord Chief Justice had, therefore, a discretion to deprive the defendants of costs, and we have no jurisdiction to review his exercise of that discretion.

ROMER, L.J.—With regard to the construction of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893, I adhere to what I said in North Metropolitan Tramways Company v. London County Council (ubi sup.). In my opinion that Act was not intended to take away from the judge the power to deprive a successful defendant of costs in any case in which it would otherwise be proper to do so. In my view, if the action fails, but the defendant is deprived of costs by the judge under Order LXV., r. 1, the defendant cannot be said to have obtained a judgment within the meaning of sect. 1, sub-sect. (b) of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893. Of course, if judgment be simply given for the defendant, it must be a judgment obtained by the defendant such as under sub-sect. (b) will carry costs as between solicitor and client. But if the Act is not intended to take away the discretion of the judge to deprive the defendant of costs, the judge if he exercises that discretion ought to see that the judgment is drawn up in such a way as to carry out his intention. I think it would not matter in what particular form the judgment is drawn up, so long as the intention is made clear. The word "judgment" in sub-sect. (b) is not used with reference to the form in which the judgment or order of the court is drawn up, but merely indicates the substance of the judgment, as was pointed out in Shaw v. Hertfordshire County Council (81 L. T. Rep. 208; (1899) 2 Q. B. 282). In that case it was held that a consent order in chambers dismissing the action with costs was a judgment obtained by the defendants within the meaning of the Act. That point seems to me to be reasonably clear. As to the second point that has been made, namely, whether there were any facts on which the Lord Chief Justice was entitled to hold that there was "good cause" within Order LXV., r. 1, for depriving the defendants of costs, it is clear that this "good cause" does not have reference only to the conduct of the successful party in the course of the litigation. It might for example, in the case of a successful defendant, be founded on his conduct outside the action if his conduct were such as to have led the plaintiff reasonably to suppose that he had a good cause of action, and thus induced him to bring the action. But I do not consider that such conduct on the part of the defendant could constitute "good cause" if it had no reference to the action, and did not lead the plaintiff reasonably to believe that he had a good cause of action. Misconduct in nowise connected with the action could not be any ground for depriving a successful defendant of costs. Nor could conduct of the defendant outside the action, unless it were such as to lead the plaintiff reasonably to suppose that he had a good cause of action, and so conduced to the action. Suppose X. takes criminal proceedings against Y. which fail, but X. had reasonable and probable cause for taking the proceedings, and was not actuated by malice, and then suppose that Y. brings an action against X. for malicious prosecution, and it fails. Then I should say that the mere fact that X. had taken criminal proceedings against Y. unsuccessfully would not be good cause for depriving X. of costs. If I were wrong in that, then in all actions for malicious prosecution a successful defendant could be deprived of costs. But if X. by his conduct had induced a reasonable belief in the mind of Y. that X. had acted maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause, then I think there might be good cause for depriving X. of costs. That I think is the view which the Lord Chief Justice took in the present case. I have felt some doubt as to whether there was sufficient evidence before Lord Russell, C.J. of such conduct on the part of the defendants, but as my brethren are clearly of opinion that there was such evidence, I do not think that I should be justified in differing from the view taken by them and the Lord Chief Justice. With the discretion exercised by the Lord Chief Justice upon those facts, we have no jurisdiction to interfere.

BARON AND ANOTHER v. PORTSLADE URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Local government — Sewers — Neglect of local authority to cleanse — Nuisance to adjoining landowner — Cause of action for damages — Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 19, 299.

Sect. 19 of the Public Health Act 1875 provides that every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be kept so as not to be a nuisance, and to be properly cleansed and emptied.

Sect. 299 of the same Act provides a remedy by means of an application to the Local Government Board in cases where default has been made by a local authority in maintaining existing sewers.

Held (affirming the decision of Mathew, J.), that a person who has sustained damage through the breach by a local authority of the duty imposed on them by sect. 19 has a right of action in respect thereof.

THIS was an appeal by the defendants from the judgment of Mathew, J. on further consideration after the trial of the action with a jury.

The plaintiffs were occupiers of a dwelling-house and agricultural land at Portslade, and the defendants were the local authority for the district.

The action was brought to recover damages in respect of a nuisance on the plaintiffs' land alleged to have been caused by the negligence of the defendants in not properly cleansing an open sewer belonging to and vested in the defendants, whereby large quantities of sewage and filth were brought on to the plaintiffs' land.

Several years previous to the bringing of the action, a sewer had been constructed by a private

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.] REG. on the Prosecution of WRIGHT v. EASTBOURNE CORPORATION. [CT. OF APP.]

person for the drainage of a brewery and some cottages. This sewer drained into an open ditch, which emptied itself into a pond on the plaintiffs' land.

Under the Public Health Act 1875 this drain became vested in the local sanitary authority, and when the defendant council was formed in 1898, the sewer became vested in them.

Before the year 1898 the local sanitary authority had paid the expenses of cleansing the sewer and pond; but in that year, in consequence of a dispute between the plaintiffs and the defendants, the arrangement which had previously been made with regard to the cleansing was put an end to.

After this the sewer and pond were not cleaned out at all, with the result that the sewage overflowed on the plaintiffs' land, and caused a nuisance. The plaintiffs thereupon commenced the present action. The defendants admitted at the trial that they were guilty of a breach of their statutory duty in not properly cleansing the sewer as required by sect. 19 of the Public Health Act 1875.

The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiffs for 75*l.* damages.

On further consideration Mathew, J. held that sect. 299 of the Public Health Act 1875 has no application to the case of a breach of the duty created by sect. 19, and that there was therefore nothing to deprive the plaintiffs of their right of action against the defendants, and he accordingly gave judgment for the plaintiffs.

The case is reported in 81 L. T. Rep. 225.

The defendants appealed.

By the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) it is provided as follows:

Sect. 19. Every local authority shall cause the sewers belonging to them to be constructed, covered, ventilated, and kept so as not to be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to be properly cleansed and emptied.

Sect. 299. Where complaint is made to the Local Government Board that a local authority has made default in providing their district with sufficient sewers, or in the maintenance of existing sewers, . . . or that a local authority has made default in enforcing any provisions of this Act which it is their duty to enforce, the Local Government Board if satisfied after due inquiry, that the authority has been guilty of the alleged default, shall make an order limiting a time for the performance of their duty in the matter of such complaint. If such duty is not performed by the time limited in the order, such order may be enforced by writ of mandamus, or the Local Government Board may appoint some person to perform such duty.

Macmorran, Q.C. and Thorn Drury for the defendants.—The plaintiffs have no right of action against the defendants for what the defendants have neglected to do. The plaintiffs' only remedy is that provided by sect. 299 of the same Act which imposes the duty on the defendants—namely, by means of a complaint to the Local Government Board. The defendants have simply been guilty of non-feasance of duty. They did not make the sewer. It was vested in them by Act of Parliament. No alteration has been made by the defendants in the amount of sewage which is poured into the sewer:

Witt, Q.C. and Sinclair Cox for the plaintiffs were not called upon.

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—In this case I think we have simply to apply the law which has been already laid down in previous cases. The sewer in question was vested in a local authority, and, according to what had been their practice for some time, the local authority had the sewer cleansed at certain intervals. After some time they discontinued that practice with the result that a nuisance was caused upon the plaintiffs' land. Now, there is all the difference in the world between the right to call on a local authority to make a new system of drainage and the right to compel them to use in a reasonable manner the sewers that are vested in them. No complaint has been made that the defendants ought to provide a new sewer, but only that they have neglected to clear out an existing sewer, and so have caused a nuisance to the plaintiffs. I cannot see why the defendants should not be subject to an action to compel them to use their sewer in a reasonable manner. The first part of sect. 299 of the Public Health Act 1875 refers to the construction of new sewage works, and the only difficulty here can arise from the subsequent words of the section as to maintaining existing sewers. I agree with the learned judge that the maintenance of a sewer is not the same thing as that which it is the duty of the local authority to do by virtue of sect. 19, that is, to keep the sewer so that it shall not be a nuisance or injurious to health, and to see that it is properly cleansed. Sect. 299 does not, in my opinion, touch the duty of the local authority to use proper diligence in the ordinary course of the management of their sewers, and I cannot see anything in the section to show that a private person who has suffered damage by the neglect of such a duty by the local authority may not have a right of action in consequence. The appeal must be dismissed.

SMITH, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion.

REG. on the Prosecution of WRIGHT v. EASTBOURNE CORPORATION. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.
Local government—Local authority—Refusal to approve—Plans of proposed building—Grounds of refusal—Mandamus.

A prerogative writ of mandamus will not be granted to compel a local authority to approve plans of a proposed building which the local authority has in good faith refused to approve upon the ground that the building would contravene the provisions of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act 1888 by being brought forward beyond the front main wall of the building on one side thereof in the same street.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

CT. OF APP.] REG. on the Prosecution of WRIGHT v. EASTBOURNE CORPORATION [CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal by the prosecutor from an order of the Divisional Court (Ridley and Darling, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a mandamus.

One Wright deposited with the Eastbourne Corporation plans for a block of buildings which he proposed to erect in Eastbourne.

After properly considering the plans, the corporation resolved that the plans should be approved as complying with their bye-laws; but they resolved that the plans should be disapproved as regards the building line shown upon the plans upon the ground that the proposed building was shown upon the plans to be intended to be brought forward beyond the front main wall of the building on one side thereof in the same street, contrary to the provisions of sect. 3 of the Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act 1888.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Sect. 157. Every urban authority may make bye-laws with respect to the following matters—that is to say: (1) With respect to the level, width, and construction of new streets, and the provisions for the sewage thereof; (2) with respect to the structure of walls, foundations, roofs, and chimneys of new buildings for securing stability and the prevention of fires, and for purposes of health; (3) with respect to the sufficiency of the space about buildings to secure a free circulation of air, and with respect to the ventilation of buildings; (4) with respect to the drainage of buildings, to water-closets, earth-closets, privies, ashpits, and cesspools in connection with buildings, and to the closing of buildings or parts of buildings unfit for human habitation, and to prohibition of their use for such habitation. And they may farther provide for the observance of such bye-laws by enacting therein such provisions as they think necessary as to the giving of notices, as to the deposit of plans and sections by persons intending to lay out streets or to construct buildings, as to inspection by the urban authority, and as to the power of such authority (subject to the provisions of this Act) to remove, alter, or pull down any work begun or done in contravention of such bye-laws. Provided that no bye-law made under this section shall affect any building erected in any place (which at the time of the passing of this Act is included in an urban sanitary district) before the Local Government Acts came into force in such place, or any building erected in any place (which at the time of the passing of this Act is not included in an urban sanitary district) before such place becomes constituted or included in an urban district, or by virtue of any order of the Local Government Board subject to this enactment.

Sect. 158. Where a notice, plan, or description of any work is required by any bye-law made by an urban authority to be laid before that authority, the urban authority shall, within one month after the same has been delivered or sent to their surveyor or clerk, signify in writing their approval or disapproval of the intended work to the person proposing to execute the same; and if the work is commenced after such notice of disapproval, or before the expiration of such month without such approval, and is in any respect not in conformity with any bye-law of the urban authority, the urban authority may cause so much of the work as has been executed to be pulled down or removed.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XX.

The Public Health (Buildings in Streets) Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52) provides:

Sect. 3. Section one hundred and fifty-six of the Public Health Act 1875 is, save as hereinafter mentioned, hereby repealed, and in lieu thereof it is hereby enacted that it shall not be lawful in any urban district, without the written consent of the urban authority, to erect or bring forward any house or building in any street, or any part of such house or building, beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side thereof in the same street, nor to build any addition to any house or building beyond the front main wall of the house or building on either side of the same. Any person offending against this enactment shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every day during which the offence is continued after written notice in this behalf from the urban authority.

The corporation, in disapproving the plans upon the above ground, acted in good faith, and in the belief that the proposed building would contravene the provisions of sect. 3 of the Act of 1888.

Wright thereupon obtained a rule nisi for a mandamus commanding the Eastbourne Corporation to approve and signify in writing their approval of the plans.

The Divisional Court (Ridley and Darling, JJ.) discharged the rule nisi for a mandamus upon the ground that the case of Smith v. Chorley Rural District Council (76 L. T. Rep. 637; (1897) 1 Q. B. 678) showed that the court would not grant a mandamus to a local authority to approve plans which, in the bond fide exercise of their discretion, they had refused to approve.

The prosecutor appealed.

Macmorran, Q.C. and B. A. Hall for the appellant.—A local authority has power, under sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875, to make bye-laws and to require the deposit of plans, and, under sect. 158, has power to approve or disapprove of plans. The local authority has, however, power to disapprove of plans only if the plans contravene any of the provisions of the bye-laws. They cannot disapprove of plans upon the ground that they contravene the provisions of a statute although they comply with the bye-laws. If the building, in respect of which the plans are deposited, does infringe the statute, the remedy of the local authority is to take proceedings under the statute:

Robinson v. Barton-Eccles Local Board, 50 L. T.

Rep. 57; 8 App. Cas. 798;

Reg. v. Tynemouth Rural District Council, 75 L. T.

Rep. 86; (1896) 2 Q. B. 451.

If the local authority has power to consider the question whether the plans do show that the provisions of the statute will be infringed, yet the High Court will consider the question whether the local authority were right in saying that there would be an infringement, and will grant a prerogative writ of mandamus if the local authority appears to have come to a wrong conclusion. The decision in Smith v. Chorley Rural Council (76 L. T. Rep. 637; (1897) 1 Q. B. 678) was only that an action for a mandamus would not lie against a corporation for refusing to approve plans upon the ground that they showed an infringement of the bye-laws. In the present case the statute does not in fact apply, and the local authority has no jurisdiction to disapprove of the plans upon the ground that they do infringe the statute. This remedy by the way of mandamus is the only remedy in a case of this kind.

C. A. Russell, Q.C. and Bowall, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

SMITH, L.J.—This is an appeal by the prosecutor against the judgment of my brothers Ridley and Darling, who refused to make absolute a rule nisi for a mandamus. The rule nisi is to show cause why a writ of mandamus should not issue directed to them—that is, to the local authority of Eastbourne—commanding them to approve and signify in writing their approval of the building line as shown on the plans sent in by Wright. What happened was this: Wright wanted to build some flats at Eastbourne, and the question has arisen—a very serious question—as to whether or not what he is proposing to do with regard to these flats is not prohibited by sect. 3 of the Public Health (Building in Streets) Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 52). It is admitted that the Eastbourne local authority have no bye-law that fits the case; and when Wright sent in his plans a question arose whether he was entitled to build, as he was about to build, in contravention of this Act of Parliament, and the rule nisi was moved for and obtained. That rule nisi, as I have already said, was discharged by my brothers Ridley and Darling. What is complained of is this: that Wright is proposing to build these flats and to bring forward the building “beyond the front main wall of Mixbury House being a house on one side of and in the same street as the proposed flats”—that is practically copying the words out of the 3rd section of the Act of 1888—in other words, that what he is proposing to do is to contravene that Act. What is it that the local authority has done? They have returned to us this: “That the amended plans now submitted by Mr. Wright for the erection of flats in Hartington-place and Compton-street, Eastbourne, be approved as complying with the bye-laws.” They have approved of them; but they go on and add this, and I see very good reason for adding it myself, so that it might never be said that the local authority had consented to this building, as a consent within sect. 3, by the approval of the plans: “But disapproved as regards the building line shown on the said plans on the grounds that the said plans are” in contravention of sect. 3 of the Act of 1888. Now, with regard to the prerogative writ of mandamus, what is wrong about that return? First of all, for myself, it seems to me perfectly plain that a rule nisi for a mandamus should not be made absolute when it appears, and clearly, to the court that obedience to that mandamus would be the approval of plans which would be in contravention of the law of the land, which is if anything more cogent than a bye-law. If it is in contravention of a public Act of Parliament, it seems to me obvious that the Queen's Bench Division ought not to grant a mandamus. A mandamus ought not to go when it would be futile and could not be obeyed. That is another very good ground why a mandamus should not go, because, if this be against the Act of Parliament, of course it cannot be obeyed; although they might approve plans, they could not approve plans which would authorise buildings to be carried out in the teeth of the Act of Parliament. It seems to me, on that ground this mandamus ought not to be made absolute. Then it is said that the local authority have held facts to bring this case within the ambit of sect. 3 of this Act of 1888 which are not facts at all. I should like to know where is the evidence of that before us. I have no evidence of that. What is more, as the case stands before us, it comes precisely within what the late Chitty, L.J. said, with great accuracy, and I think with rather greater accuracy than Lopes, L.J. in Smith v. Chorley Rural Council (76 L. T. Rep. 637; (1897) 1 Q. B. 678). One of them used the word “discretion,” and the other used the word “jurisdiction.” I think Chitty, L.J.'s word “jurisdiction” was the right word when he said: “They had jurisdiction in the matter, which they honestly exercised, and it was part of the question before them whether the building of the new houses amounted to laying out a new street.” He said that it was for them to decide, not for this court to decide. I am clearly of opinion that, in a case like this, unless it is shown that there was no evidence at all and the local authority had usurped jurisdiction by finding something which was not competent to them to find, we cannot interfere, particularly on a rule nisi for a mandamus. For these reasons I think my brethren were quite right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. I do not think that the application which has been made in the Divisional Court, and before us on appeal, is an application which we ought to grant, because I do not think that the applicant really wishes for that which he is asking, for what he does wish for is to get something under our mandamus from the local authority which he can use for a purpose for which it is not intended. Now, what was asked for originally was a mandamus to the local authority commanding them to approve and signify in writing their approval of the building line as shown on the plans sent by John Wright, &c. Now, what he wants to do is this: Having got that approval of the building line in that way, he then thinks he will be in a better position hereafter in case any prosecution is instituted under sect. 3 of the Act of 1888, to which our attention was called, for building beyond the building line in contravention of that Act. To my mind the duty which the local authority has to perform has nothing to do with that Act at all. Under sect. 158 they are bound within a limited time to signify in writing their approval or disapproval of the intended work. As I read that section of the statute it has no relation to anything else at all but the bye-laws. The statute begins with enabling the local authority to pass bye-laws, and then it says that the plans of intended buildings are to be submitted and then the approval or disapproval of the local authority is to be expressed. That does not mean general approval or general disapproval. It means under the statute that they approve this as not being in contravention of their bye-laws, or they disapprove this as being in contravention of their bye-laws. I agree with Mr. Macmorran when he says that Wright here is entitled to have the local authority comply with that statute and signify in writing their approval or disapproval, and, if the local authority had refused to do this, I should have thought, speaking for myself, that a mandamus might have gone to them to approve or disapprove.

Q.B. Div.] LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS (apps.) v. POPLAR UNION (resps.). [Q.B. Div.]

But that is not what is asked for. It is not said here that this resolution, or whatever it may be that has been passed by the local authority, is neither an approval nor a disapproval and therefore the statute has not been complied with. What is said is that it is not sufficient that they should have expressed their approval of the plans, as they have done, as complying with the bye-laws, but that they ought not to have added these words, "but disapproved as regards the building line shown on the said plans on the ground that the said flats are shown on such plans as intended to be erected or brought forward beyond the front main wall of Mixbury House being a house," &c.—in other words, disapprove in so far as they are a breach, not of the bye-laws, but of the statute. We have not got to decide any question here to-day as to what is the effect of this document which has been issued by the local authority. If, so far as the statutory duty is concerned, it is an approval, I do not see myself what more Mr. Wright can require; and, in so far as it contains something outside the statutory duty imposed upon the local authority, it does not seem to me that the proper mode of testing that, or correcting that, is by this application for a mandamus.

(Before KENNEDY and DARLING, JJ.)

LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS (apps.) v. POPLAR UNION (resps.). (a)

Rating—Machinery—Cranes in docks—Warehouses in different parish—Docks in different parishes in same union—Deductions.

The L. and I. Docks used cranes worked by hydraulic power communicated to them by means of mains laid under the surface of the docks in which they were used alongside the rails upon which the cranes travelled. The cranes could be made to travel along the rails upon which they rest by means of hand gearing attached to them, or by means of hydraulic capstans, or by means of levers. When in use such cranes were firmly and securely attached, by means of a flexible tube capable of resisting a pressure of 700lb. to the square inch, to the hydraulic main by the side of the rails. While so attached the cranes could be moved along the rails 6ft. in either direction, but in order to move them from one quay to another new lines of rails would have to be laid, or they would have to be moved by floating derricks.

Held, that these cranes must be treated as enhancing the rateable value of the dock undertaking, as they were on the premises for the purpose of making them fit as premises for the purpose for which they were used.

The L. and I. Docks also used certain warehouses, situate outside the parishes in the P. Union, in connection with and for the purposes of their undertaking. These warehouses were separately assessed in the parishes in which they were situate, and they did not adjoin the dock warehouses or docks.

Held, that the net receipts derived from these warehouses should be deducted from the net receipts derived by the L. and I. Docks from their whole undertaking, inclusive of such warehouses, when ascertaining the rateable value of the premises of the L. and I. Docks within the parishes in the P. Union.

*Where one system of docks is situated in different parishes in the same union, the rateable value ought to be ascertained upon the parochial principle as laid down in Sculcoates Union v. Hull Dock Company (71 L. T. Rep. 642).*

Expenses of one company, such as superannuation allowances or rents of premises made payable by such company, upon an amalgamation of several companies to form one undertaking, ought not to be deducted from receipts in order to arrive at the net revenue of the undertaking.

CASE stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County of London in an appeal against the decision of the assessment committee upon an objection by the appellants to the valuation list made for the parish of Bromley St. Leonard, in the Poplar Union, pursuant to the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869.

1. The appellants are a body incorporated under and by virtue of the London and St. Katharine and East and West India Docks Act 1888 for the purpose of working, maintaining, and managing the undertakings of the London and St. Katharine Docks Company and the East and West India Dock Company hereinafter referred to as the "undertakings."

2. The "undertakings" mean and include the docks, wharves, quays, bridges, railway stations, and other works and conveniences, and the lands, buildings, and property of every description and of whatever tenure, with any improvements, alterations, and additions which may from time to time be made therein or thereto.

3. The appellants were assessed in a valuation list made by the overseers of the poor of the parish pursuant to the provisions of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, in respect of so much of the undertakings of the East and West India Docks Company as are situate within the parish at a gross value of 8271l. and a rateable value of 5514l., and upon objection made to the assessment committee by the appellants, pursuant to sect. 11 of the Act, the respondents' assessment committee finally determined the gross value of the portion of the undertakings at 7622l. and the rateable value thereof at 4372l.

4. Among the buildings comprised in the undertakings are certain warehouses known as and hereinafter referred to as the "town warehouses," situate at Crutched Friars and Outler-street, in the city of London, and at Commercial-road and West Smithfield outside the parish, which warehouses are separately assessed in the parishes in which they are situated. Such warehouses are in the occupation of the appellants, and are used by them in connection with and for the purposes of their undertakings in the same way as other town warehouses are used belonging to wharfingers or warehouse keepers. A portion of the goods stored in the town warehouses do not come from or go to the docks at all, but are delivered by rail from Liverpool, Southampton, and elsewhere, or are lightered from ships discharged in the river or places other than the appellants' docks. Some portion of the goods, however, are stored in the town warehouses after discharge from vessels in the docks, and as regards some of these last-mentioned goods payments are made not only in respect of the storage of the goods, but also in respect of the cost of dealing at the dock of discharge with the goods so stored, and the transfer of such goods to the warehouses. Each of these payments when received is divided into two parts which are separately dealt with in the appellants' accounts, one part being included in the receipts attributable to the warehouses. There are also dock warehouses situate within the parish forming part of the dock, and which belong to and are occupied by the appellants in connection with their undertakings. The town warehouses do not adjoin the dock warehouses or docks, but in the case of the Commercial-road warehouse there are lines of railway between the warehouse and the docks, belonging to and worked by the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Company and the Great Eastern Railway Company, by means of which goods are conveyed from the docks for delivery either in the Commercial-road warehouse, or to warehousemen and other persons other than the appellants.

5. In the case of dutiable goods it is necessary that warehouses duly licensed for the reception of goods upon which duty is payable but has not been paid should be provided, and certain portions of the dock warehouses are duly licensed for the reception of such goods. Some portion of the town warehouses are also duly licensed, and the appellants use them for the storage (inter alia) of dutiable goods received by rail or road, or discharged from vessels in the river, or in the docks or elsewhere.

6. The accounts of the town warehouses are kept quite distinct by the appellants, and are included in their published accounts of the receipts and expenses of the undertakings. All moneys received and expended in respect of all the town warehouses and other separately assessed property have always been treated by the appellants in the published accounts of the undertakings and in their dealings with the companies as forming, and they do form, part of the appellants' undertakings.

7. For facilitating the lading and unloading of vessels in the appellants' docks there are hydraulic cranes placed upon the sides of the docks, which cranes travel upon iron rails about 10ft. to 13ft. apart, specially constructed for the purpose, upon and along the quays which form the sides of the docks, and used only for the purposes of such cranes. Such rails do not extend further than the quay upon which they are constructed, and are firmly affixed to and embedded in and form part of such quay, but the cranes can be and are moved from one quay to another as the business and occasion requires; but in order to move them it would be necessary to lay down new lines of railway where no sufficiently hard pavement exists, or they could be transported by water by means of floating derricks.

8. Upon the undertakings there are 191 hydraulic cranes, which vary in weight from thirteen to sixteen tons. Such cranes are worked by hydraulic power communicated to them by means of mains laid under the surface of the quays in and through the appellants' said lands between their hydraulic pumping station thereon and the rails upon which the cranes travel, close by the side of which and parallel thereto such mains are laid.

9. The larger of the cranes can be made to travel along the rails upon which they rest by means of hand gearing attached to them, and the smaller of the cranes by means of hydraulic capstans and by means of levers. When in use such cranes are firmly and securely attached by means of a flexible tube, capable of resisting a pressure of 700lb. to the square inch, to the hydraulic main by the side of the rails. While so attached the cranes can be moved along the rails to a distance of 6ft. either way from the point of attachment.

10. The appellants contended that, in arriving at the net receipts of their undertakings for the purpose of ascertaining the gross and rateable value of so much of the undertakings as is situate in the parish, all moneys received and expenses incurred in respect of the town warehouses separately assessed in the parishes in which they are situate ought to be deducted from the total receipts and expenses of the appellants in respect of the undertakings; and that, in estimating such rateable value, the hydraulic cranes were to be treated as tenants' fixtures, and the value thereof included in ascertaining the amount of the tenants' capital necessary to carry on the undertakings.

11. The appellants also contended that the entire net revenue should be apportioned in the various parishes according to gross receipts of each dock. That the amount of tenants' capital, maintenance, renewals, and taxes should be calculated in each dock and deducted where they arise. That the profits and rents outside the Custom House fence ought not to be included in the receipts, and that the expenses of the separate dock companies and the rent of the Commercial-road warehouses should be deducted from the total receipts in order to arrive at the net revenue.

12. The respondents contended that the receipts and expenses of the appellants in respect of all warehouses wherever situate and although separately assessed were to be included in the total receipts and expenses of the appellants in respect of their undertakings in order to arrive at the net receipts of the appellants for the purpose of estimating the rateable value of so much of the appellants' undertakings as is situate in the parish, and that the rateable value of such of the warehouses as were separately assessed was to be deducted from the rateable value of the whole of the undertakings in arriving at the rateable value of the portion in the parish, and that in any event, if the receipts in respect of certain of the warehouses were to be deducted, all expenses incurred by the appellants in respect of those warehouses should also be deducted from the total expenses of the appellants in respect of their undertakings. The respondents further contended that no dock premises are complete as such unless cranes are placed so as to travel upon rails along the sides of the docks comprised in such premises, and that the value of the appellants' undertaking was enhanced by reason of the cranes thereon inasmuch as no one would be likely to become tenant of dock premises which were not provided with cranes such as those hereinbefore described; that the hydraulic cranes were to be taken into consideration in valuing the appellants' undertakings, and that the value thereof was to be included in ascertaining the rateable value of the undertakings.

13. The Court of Quarter Sessions were of opinion that the aforesaid contentions of the appellants were correct except those mentioned in par. 11, and arrived at the rateable value of the appellants' premises in accordance therewith, and accordingly ordered the appeal to be allowed, but without costs, and the gross value of the portion of the appellants' undertakings in the parish to be assessed at 5949l. and the rateable value thereof at 4085l.

14. The questions for the opinion of the court are: (1) Whether in ascertaining the rateable value of so much of the appellants' premises as is the subject-matter of the above appeal the net receipts derived from the town warehouses occupied by the appellants in connection with their whole undertaking, but rated or capable of being rated separately from the remainder of their premises, should be deducted from the net receipts derived by the appellants from their whole undertaking inclusive of such warehouses? (2) Whether the hydraulic cranes upon the quays of the appellants' docks are to be treated as landlords' or tenants' fixtures? (3) Whether the entire net revenue is to be apportioned according to the gross receipts of each dock? (4) If not, then whether the amount of tenants' capital, maintenance, renewals, and taxes are to be calculated in each dock and deducted when they arise? (5) Whether the profits earned and rents received outside the Customs House fence are to be included in the receipts? (6) Whether the expenses of the separate dock companies and the rent of the Commercial-road warehouses are to be deducted from the receipts in order to arrive at the net revenue?

Cripps, Q.C. and B. Cunningham Glen for the union.—In Reg. v. Southampton Dock Company (14 Q. B. 587; 15 Jur. 268) it was held that cranes, steam engines, shears, and other heavy machinery attached to the freehold, and essential to the business, but capable of being detached as easily and with as little injury to the freehold as other fixtures put up for the purpose of the tenants' trade, and usually valued as between incoming and outgoing tenants, were not allowable deductions. Again, in Tyne Boiler Works Company v. Overseers of Longbenton (55 L. T. Rep. 825; 18 Q. B. Div. 81) it was laid down that in estimating the rateable value of premises used as a factory, the machinery and plant thereon, placed there for the purpose of making the premises fit as a factory, were to be taken into account as enhancing the value, although the machinery and plant were not physically attached and remained personal property. Retorts, purifiers, engines, boilers, &c., at gasworks, although capable of being removed, were held rateable in Reg. v. Lee (13 L. T. Rep. 704; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 241) as they were attached to the hereditament for its permanent improvement.

The rule appears in Laing v. Overseers of Bishopwearmouth (38 L. T. Rep. 781; 3 Q. B. Div. 299) that machinery, although capable of being removed, is to be taken into consideration in ascertaining the rateable value of premises, if it is essential to the business to which the premises are devoted, and is intended to remain attached to them so long as they are applied to that purpose. These cranes enhance the rateable value of the hereditament, and are not like loose plant or loose machines. They should be valued as part of the premises. The last case on the point was Gifford v. Chard Union (63 L. T. Rep. 249), where these former decisions were discussed and followed.

Balfour Browne, Q.C. (Freeman, Q.C., Boyle, Q.C., and Ryde with him) for the docks.—These warehouses are separate undertakings, and are so assessed. They have nothing to do with the receipts, and should not be included. [KENNEDY, J.—The union wishes to increase the value of the docks by the excess of the profit of the warehouses over the rent.] That is so, and must be wrong. As to the cranes, the description in the case shows them to be on the same footing as locomotives or rolling stock of a railway. [DARLING, J.—Is not the analogy a bad one? Rolling stock earns when moving, but these cranes only earn when not moving and attached.] The cranes here are very different to those in Laing v. Overseers of Bishopwearmouth (sup.), as appears from the description given on p. 302. [KENNEDY, J.—In Mersey Docks and Harbour Board v. Overseers of Birkenhead (29 L. T. Rep. 454; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 445) cranes were held rateable.] That would depend upon what kind of cranes they were in that case. These cranes do not make the place a dock. In Tyne Boiler Works Company v. Overseers of Longbenton (55 L. T. Rep. 825; 18 Q. B. Div. 81) the machinery made the place what it was, and the same must be said of Gifford v. Chard Union (63 L. T. Rep. 249). [KENNEDY, J.—Do you dispute the analysis of Cockburn, C.J. in Reg. v. North Staffordshire Railway Company (3 L. T. Rep. 554; 3 El. & El. 392) where he says at p. 556: "The second question is whether the company are entitled to a deduction in respect of the capital invested in the various articles therein specified, being things necessary for the carrying on the business of the company. The articles to which such a question may have reference may be divided into three classes—first, things movable, such as office and station furniture; secondly, things so attached to the freehold as to become part of it; and, thirdly, things which, though capable of being removed, are yet so far attached that it is intended that they shall remain permanently connected with the railway, or the purposes connected with it, as certain permanent appendages to it and essential to its working. It is clear, in respect of the first class of articles, a deduction should be allowed; it is equally clear that no deduction should be allowed as to the second; as to the third, the question is finally settled by the decision of the court in the case of Reg. v. Southampton Docks (14 Q. B. 587).] No. That lays down the law as it exists.

Aug. 10.—KENNEDY, J. delivered the following judgment of the court:—In this case two distinct parishes in the east of London are appealing

Q.B. Div.]

LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS (apps.) v. POPLAR UNION (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

against the decision of the quarter sessions for the county of London on two points decided adversely to them upon the hearing of the appeal to quarter sessions against the decision of the assessment committee in regard to the assessment for rating purposes of property of the London and India Docks Joint Committee. The London and India Docks Joint Committee raise several points by way of cross-appeal. The cases stated for our decision in regard to the two parishes are identical. One of the points raised by the parishes is the question of the assessment of the joint committee on 191 hydraulic cranes which are the property of the joint committee, and are upon the docks which form part of the undertaking of the joint committee within the rating area of the parishes. The parishes contend that these cranes enhance the value of the joint committee's undertaking and ought to be taken into consideration in valuing that undertaking, and that the value is to be included in ascertaining its rateable value. On the other hand, the joint committee contend that these cranes are to be treated as tenants' fixtures, and the value of them to be included in ascertaining the amount of tenants' capital necessary to carry on the undertaking. The quarter sessions have decided, as we understand, against the parishes on this point. The second point raised by this appeal is as to the correctness of the decision of the quarter sessions in adjudging that, for rating purposes, in the parishes, the net receipts derived by the joint committee from certain warehouses described in the case as town warehouses and situated outside the rateable area, should be deducted from the net receipts derived by the joint committee from the whole undertaking, inclusive of such warehouses. It is convenient, I think, to deal with these two points on appeal first before stating the points of the cross-appeal. The cranes in question are described in pars. 8 and 9 of the case before us. [His Lordship read those paragraphs, and continued:] The law, as it seems to us, governing the case of machinery of this description appears to be laid down by the Court of Appeal in Tyne Boiler Works Company v. Overseers of Longbenton (55 L. T. Rep. 625; 18 Q. B. Div. 81). The effect of the judgment in that case, as appears from the report, is that in estimating the rateable value of premises used as a manufactory, machinery and plant placed thereon for the purpose of making them fit as premises for such a manufactory are to be taken into account as enhancing the value of the hereditament, although such machinery and plant remain personal property, and are not physically attached to the premises. Lord Esher, in his judgment, at p. 92, lays down the rule in these terms: "I believe the real rule to be that things which are on the premises to be rated, and which are there for the purpose of making and which make the premises fit as premises for the particular purpose for which they are used are to be taken into account in ascertaining the rateable value of such premises. Of course, it is not all things on the premises, or that are used on the premises, which are to be taken into account; but things which are there for the purpose of making and which do make them fit as premises for the particular purpose for which they are used." On page 95 Lopes, L.J. states the principle thus: "I adopt the concluding words of the judgment of Mathew, J. in the court below, where he says that the machinery ought to be taken into account as essentially necessary to the business to which the premises are devoted, and manifestly intended to remain connected with the premises so long as they are used for the same purposes." That which is said by the late Master of the Rolls and by Lopes, L.J. with regard to machinery in a manufactory appears to me to be equally applicable to machinery or plant in such docks as these, which form part of the undertaking of the joint committee. It is, of course, possible to have a dock in which ships are separately received, but these docks are intended to be used, and are used, not merely for the reception but for the unloading of ships, for the effective and profitable performance of which some mechanical appliances, such as these cranes are, are, in the case at least of some cargoes, necessary. It appears to us from the description which is given in pars. 8 and 9 of the case which I have read that these cranes are manifestly intended to remain connected with the docks so long as the premises are used as docks. Indeed, it is clear from those paragraphs, in my judgment, that whilst in use the cranes are actually attached to the premises with only a very limited range of movement. They are moved upon lines of rails only for the purpose of being brought to the places convenient for the using of them, where they are fixed when in actual use. I do not think it can be argued, as the joint committee suggest by their counsel, that these cranes are identical in character for rating purposes with the locomotives of a railway company, which are in no sense connected with any particular rateable area on the line of railway. We feel ourselves unable satisfactorily to distinguish the character of these cranes, in regard to the subject of rating, from the character of the portable engine and boiler mounted on cast iron wheels so that it can be moved from place to place, in Laing v. Overseers of Bishopswearmouth (37 L. T. Rep. 781; 3 Q. B. Div. 299), or from the character of "the traversing crane weighing thirty tons carried on a pair of wrought iron girders bolted to the iron columns supporting the roof" mentioned in p. 302 of the same case, and apparently held by the court to be properly included as part of that which enhances the value of the hereditament. The question which is marked 2, and is set forth for our judgment in the two cases in regard to these cranes, is not, we may add, correctly put, because, as is stated by the court in the case I have just cited, referring to the earlier case of Reg. v. Guest (5 A. & E. 951), the treatment of machinery for rating purposes does not depend upon the consideration whether on the expiration of the lease the machinery will belong to the landlord or to the tenant; but understanding as we do that question to mean, Are these cranes to be included as enhancing the rateable value of the joint committee's undertaking or as tenants' fixtures, the value of which should be included as part of the tenants' capital in fitting up and working this place? we are of opinion, in answer to that question, that they must be treated as landlords' and not as tenants' fixtures. With regard to the second point raised by the appellant parishes—namely, the treatment of the receipts derived from the town warehouses, the circumstances of

LONDON AND INDIA DOCKS (apps.) v. POPLAR UNION (resps.).

which are set forth in pars. 4, 5, and 6 of the case—we have come to the conclusion that the view of the quarter sessions as expressed in par. 13 of each case was right, and that question No. 1 ought to be answered in the affirmative. The town warehouses are wholly outside the rating areas of these parishes. They are separately assessable and, in fact, are separately assessed in the parishes in which they are respectively situated. They do not locally adjoin the property of the joint committee in the parishes. They are used in part for goods which have never passed through the docks. The only case in which there is any sort of connection, as we understand the facts, between the docks and any of the town warehouses is in the case of the Commercial-road warehouse, to which it appears some goods from the docks are brought, not by the joint committee, but by the London, Tilbury, and Southend Railway Company over a line of railway which belongs to and is worked by the railway company. It appears to us that the decision of the quarter sessions is right, and ought to be upheld. We now come to the consideration of Nos. 3, 4, 5, and 6, all of which are intended to raise points of cross-appeal. We cannot but wish that the facts deemed relevant to the issues which the answers to those questions are intended to settle had been stated in the case in a fuller and more instructive manner. The meagreness of the information relating to them has involved some obscurity as to the exact point and bearing of the questions which the court is asked to decide, and some difference in the opinion of the learned counsel who argued the case, and whose assistance we had, in regard to the two questions Nos. 3 and 4, and as to the contentions which those two questions are intended to represent. With regard to questions Nos. 3 and 4 we are asked to say “whether the entire net revenue is to be apportioned according to the gross receipts of each dock”; and, “if not, then whether the amount of tenants’ capital, maintenance, renewal, and taxes are to be calculated in each dock, and deducted when they arise.” It was agreed, as we understood, by counsel on both sides, that by the expression “each dock” was meant in both questions the dock property in each parish; but some discussion arose as to the meaning of the words “net revenue” in question No. 3. In the result, as we understood it, upon the learned counsel for the joint committee saying that his clients were quite willing that “net revenue” should be understood and taken for the purposes of this case to mean the net revenue as apportioned by the governing Act of Parliament, which is the London and St. Katharine’s and the East and West India Docks Act, s. 42, it was agreed between the parties that the third question should be answered in the affirmative. This being so, it is apparently by the alternative form of the question intended that the court should not be asked to answer No. 4, and it becomes unnecessary to do so. I will therefore only point out that in my view, if it were practical in the present case to apply it, the principle stated in No. 4—that is, the parochial principle—appears on the authority of the Sculcoates Union v. Hull Dock Company at Kingston-upon-Hull (71 L. T. Rep. 642; (1895) A. C. 136) to be the proper principle. It may be that in the present case, which is no doubt in some respects very peculiar, as in the case of the docks system which the Court of Queen’s Bench had to consider in Reg. v. Hull Dock Company (18 Q. B. 325), there would be so much practical difficulty in applying this at all, or in applying it at any rate without working injustice, as Mr. Glen seemed to suggest might be worked here, that it cannot rightly be adhered to. Upon the face of these questions I do not see why an affirmative answer to question No. 4 might not have stood with the affirmative answer to No. 3; but, as the case is stated, we are not, I think, at liberty so to treat the relation of each alternative question. Question No. 5 asks us “whether the profits earned and rents received outside the Customs House fence are to be included in the receipts of the undertaking.” We may possibly, though I do not think so, have overlooked it, but I cannot find in the statement of facts in the case any information as to the position of the Customs House fence, and the court is not, I think, placed in a position to answer this question except in a hypothetical manner. If by the expression “outside the Customs House fence” is meant profits earned and rents received in respect of property situated outside the rating area with which these parishes are concerned distant from the docks and separately rateable and rated in other rating districts, we ought, in my view, to answer the question in accordance with the principle of our decision with regard to the town warehouses on the earlier question, and say that such profits and rents are not to be included. If, on the other hand, the property from which these rents and profits arise, though lying outside the Customs House fence, is within the real area or ambit of these two parishes, or, although lying outside that ambit, if it forms part of the dock undertaking and is so closely connected therewith that the docks and property from which these rents and profits arise form, as it were, part of one entire undertaking, which is a question of fact, this question, in my judgment, should be answered in the affirmative. The property described by Mr. Balfour Browne as intended to be referred to in this question and described by him as a bit of railway miles away, which the joint committee let to the Tilbury and Southend Railway, seems rather to bring the case within the first branch of the hypothesis. The last question is No. 6, and this, in my judgment, should be answered in the negative. It refers to the rent of the Commercial-road warehouses, which, under sect. 47 of the Act of Parliament, is to be paid by the East and West India Docks Company alone, and as we understand from counsel in the case, for there is no information that we can find in the case itself, applies to superannuation allowances paid separately by the dock companies who were amalgamated by the Act to old servants under agreements made prior to the amalgamation. With regard to the question of the Commercial-road warehouses, which form one of the town warehouses which have been already dealt with in the earlier part of this case on another point, I see no reason for including an allowance for those in respect of the burden which the paying of the rent lays upon one of the amalgamated companies. I have already held that the town warehouses in respect of net receipts ought not to be included in getting at the rateable value of the joint committee’s property within those parishes, and I see no reason to allow the rent as a deduction from the receipts as an expense in one of the companies which were amalgamated in order to form the joint committee. With regard to the superannuation allowances, I think that Mr. Glen rightly argued that superannuation allowances which were agreed upon before the passing of the Act for the constitution of the joint committee ought not to be taken into consideration when the thing to be calculated is the amount of the expenses of carrying on the undertaking at the present time. The learned counsel for the joint committee upon this sixth question, and in reference to his clients' claim for a deduction in respect of the rent of the Commercial-road warehouses, referred to Altrincham Union v. Cheshire Lines Committee (15 Q. B. Div. 597; 50 J. P. 85). I do not think that that decision has a real bearing upon the present case. There, by reason of an agreement between the two railway companies which received statutory sanction by embodiment in a private Act of Parliament, the hereditament to be rated was, to quote the language of Lord Esher (p. 602), "struck with sterility by the Act beyond the value of 2500L," and the question was whether that hereditament could be rated for more than the amount of 2500L. Here there is a peculiar burden, no doubt, upon the separate dock company contained in the enactment, but it is not a burden upon the joint committee whose property is in question. The case must therefore be remitted to the quarter sessions. I have been desired to say by my brother Darling that he concurs in this judgment.

CALLOW (app.) v. TILLSTONE (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Judgment accordingly.

CALLOW (app.) v. TILLSTONE (resp.). (a)

Public health—Unsound meat—Exposure of for sale—Aiding and abetting exposure—Negligence—Sufficiency for conviction—Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 5—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 117.

Negligence on the part of a veterinary surgeon in making an examination and giving a certificate that meat which is in fact unsound is sound and healthy is not of itself sufficient to justify a conviction against the veterinary surgeon for aiding and abetting the exposing of the unsound meat for sale although such negligence in fact causes the exposure of the meat.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the borough of Brighton.

At a petty sessions, held in Brighton on the 12th Feb. 1900, an information was preferred by F. Tillstone (the respondent), town clerk of Brighton, against one Lintott, a farmer in Sussex, and Callow (the appellant), a veterinary surgeon, for having on the 24th Oct. 1899 at Brighton unlawfully abetted the exposing for sale for food of man by one Grey, a butcher in Brighton, on the 27th Oct. 1899, of certain meat which was unsound and unfit for the food of man, such meat being part of a carcase of beef sold on the 24th Oct. to Grey by Lintott. This information was heard and determined by the justices who convicted the defendants, Grey having been previously convicted of having exposed the meat for sale.

On the 27th Oct. the sanitary and food inspector for Brighton visited Grey's shop, and he found in the shop the meat in question exposed for sale. The whole, which formed part of the carcase of a heifer, was unsound and unfit for the food of man. The meat was seized, and on the following morning was brought before the justices, who condemned it and ordered it to be destroyed.

The facts were as follows:

On the morning of the 23rd Oct. this heifer, together with a steer, a black cow, a spot cow, and another animal, had been feeding in a field belonging to Lintott, and the animals belonged to him. The steer was found dead in a field by a servant of Lintott very early on that morning, and the black cow died shortly afterwards.

The appellant Callow, who was a veterinary surgeon, was called in to examine the carcasses. He opened them and found the stomach full of yew leaves, inflammation in the intestines, and other clear indications of yew poisoning.

Lintott asked if they had been bled and dressed would they have been fit for food, and Callow replied "No." Callow refused to certify them as fit for food and they were buried. The animals had died of poisoning by eating yew leaves.

At the time of Callow's visit to the farm the heifer (in respect of which these proceedings were taken) was apparently quite well and so lively that he was not able to examine her. He examined another cow and prescribed drinks for the heifer and this cow.

At four o'clock of the same day the heifer became very ill. She fell over on her side and was in a moribund condition, and ten minutes later Lintott killed her. She could not have lived more than a very short time, probably but a few minutes. The carcase was dressed and hung in the barn and the internal parts were buried. The spot cow was then visited in a stall and was found either dead or on the point of death, and Lintott stuck this cow also.

Late in the afternoon of the 24th, between four and five o'clock, Grey, who was, as Callow knew, a butcher, came to the farm, and Callow was then sent for to inspect the carcasses of the heifer and the spot cow.

When Callow arrived he asked Lintott what he had killed them for, and he replied, "because they might go like the others." He then asked if there was anything the matter with them, and Lintott replied "No."

Lintott, Grey, and Callow went into the barn and examined the carcasses hanging there. They then went and examined the intestines of the two animals which had been stuck—the heifer and the spot cow.

While Callow examined the heifer in the barn there was no light, but afterwards a stable lantern was brought. The carcase was hanging about 10ft. from the barn doors, but there was no window. He did not observe the patch of inflammation which existed where the spleen had been removed. He examined the stomach and found a little yew in it, but not so much as in the

CALLOW (app.) v. TILLSTONE (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

other animals. He made no inquiry of anyone as to the time at which the animals had been stuck, and thereupon promised to give Grey a certificate, and Grey bought the carcase from Lintott.

After the seizure of the meat Callow did in fact give Grey the following certificate:

24th Oct. 1899.—At the request of Mr. John Grey I have this day examined the carcase of a heifer belonging to Mr. Lintott, and found the animal in good condition, and the flesh and organs sound and healthy.—CHARLES CALLOW, M.R.C.V.S.

Callow admitted that he knew that yew acted as a strong narcotic poison and was very rapid in its action, and that he knew that the animal in question had eaten some yew. He admitted also that it was not possible to ascertain by examination of the carcase whether the animal had died of narcotic poison or whether narcotic poison was present in the carcase.

The investigation and examination by the defendant Callow was negligently performed. It was conducted partly when almost dark and partly with the dim light of a candle, and was perfunctory in character. He had not made a careful inspection, but relied on Lintott's statement. He had not cut into the carcase, and took no notice of the extravasation of blood and patch of inflammatory lymph which—in the judgment of the justices—must have existed prior to death, and might have been discovered by him had he exercised due care.

The justices therefore found that Callow had been guilty of negligence, and that such negligence had in fact caused the exposure of the unsound meat for sale, and that he thereby abetted Grey, and they convicted him (and Lintott), and imposed on him a penalty of 40s. and costs or fourteen days' imprisonment.

Various questions of law were raised by counsel on behalf of Callow on the hearing: First, that even admitting negligence that is not sufficient to justify the conviction; that there must be on the defendant's part carelessness amounting to wilfully shutting his eyes to facts within his knowledge; secondly, that the summons charged aiding and abetting on the 24th an offence alleged to have been committed on the 27th, and that this constitutes no offence in law.

The questions for the opinion of the court were (amongst others): (1) Was the negligence of which the justices found Callow had been guilty sufficient to support the conviction for aiding and abetting in the offence of exposing for sale meat unsound and unfit for food of man? (2) Could the defendant Callow be properly convicted of aiding and abetting on the 24th Oct. an offence stated in the summons to have been committed on the 27th Oct.? and (3) could the defendant Callow on the findings and facts as above stated be properly convicted of the offence with which he was charged?

If any of the questions should be answered in the negative the conviction was to be quashed; otherwise it was to stand.

Sect. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43) provides:

Every person who shall aid, abet, counsel, or procure the commission of any offence which is or hereafter shall be punishable on summary conviction shall be liable to be proceeded against and convicted for the same, either together with the principal offender, or before or after his conviction, and shall be liable on conviction to the same forfeiture and punishment as such principal offender is or shall be by law liable, &c.

Sect. 117 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) deals with the offence of exposing unsound meat for sale.

Corrie Grant for the appellant.—The justices were wrong in convicting the appellant Callow. Under sect. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 a person who aids and abets the commission of an offence may be punished as the principal offender; but a person cannot be convicted of a criminal offence merely because he is unskilful. The justices have merely found that Callow was negligent, but negligence is not of itself sufficient to justify a conviction under a criminal statute. There must be something more than negligence; there must be a criminal intent or knowingly counselling the commission of the offence. At the utmost the appellant was merely guilty of an error in judgment in giving the certificate, and even if that is to be taken as negligence it is not enough:

Benfield v. Simms, 78 L. T. Rep. 718; (1898) 2 Q. B. 641.

Bowall for the respondent.—The finding by the justices was not a finding that the appellant had been unskilful, or that he had given a wrong opinion in point of judgment or committed an error in judgment. It is a finding of negligence that it is more than a mere want of care. That there was gross carelessness on the part of the appellant cannot be doubted. There was something more than mere carelessness or unskilfulness; there was a wilful shutting of his eyes to the whole suspicious circumstances of the case. No mens rea or criminal intent is necessary to convict a person of an offence under sect. 117 of the Public Health Act 1875:

Blaker v. Tillstone, 70 L. T. Rep. 31; (1894) 1 Q. B. 345.

LAWRENCE, J.—In this case we have no doubt that the justices came to a wrong conclusion in finding that the appellant Callow was guilty of the offence charged against him. What they had found him guilty of was only negligence, and the question now arises upon that finding whether Callow, who was the veterinary surgeon called in in the case, can be found guilty of aiding and abetting the exposing for sale of this unsound meat, when all that the justices find against him is negligence. The justices found that Callow had been guilty of negligence and thereby abetted Grey, and upon that they convicted him. We think that is not sufficient, and the case of Benfield v. Simms (ubi sup.) is very strong to show that it is not sufficient. In that case, where there was a conviction, the defendant, a veterinary surgeon, had—according to the finding of the justices—knowingly counselled the owner of a horse to cause the act of cruelty in question and Channell, J. says at the end of his judgment that the decision of the court in that case “afforded no ground whatever for supposing that a veterinary surgeon who gives a wrong opinion and commits an error in judgment is liable to be convicted of cruelty if the effect of his opinion being followed is that the act of cruelty does in fact result." I think, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion. It seems to me that all that is found by the justices against the appellant is negligence, and to my mind a person cannot be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission of this offence upon such a finding. In this case the appellant gave his certificate, one is bound to assume, quite honestly, and therefore it seems to me he ought not to be convicted under sect. 5 of aiding and abetting the exposing of the meat for sale.

Appeal allowed. Conviction quashed.

Bating—General district rate—Shop closed during winter months—Stock removed—Fixtures and articles left in shop—Occupation—Liability to rate—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 211, sub-s. 2.

The respondent held certain premises under a lease or licence for a term of years, and had entered into possession and used the premises as a shop. As the business was remunerative only during the summer, the respondent at the end of the summer locked up and left the shop with the intention of not reopening the same for business until the beginning of the following summer, and during this interval he had not in fact returned to the shop and no one lived therein. Before he left he removed all his stock, but left in the premises certain fixtures and other articles. He was entitled under his lease to occupy the premises and carry on his business continuously throughout the year except for certain hours during the night. A general district rate was made for the half-year during the whole of which the shop was so closed in the winter. The respondent having objected to pay the rate made in respect of the shop on the ground that in law the premises were unoccupied by him during the time the shop was closed:

Held, that the respondent was in occupation of the premises during the time they were so closed, and was liable to pay the half-year's rate accordingly.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the borough of Southend-on-Sea.

The respondent appeared before a court of summary jurisdiction on the 27th March 1900 on the complaint of the appellants that he (the respondent), being a person duly rated and assessed by the general district rate made for the borough on the 9th Nov. 1899 for the half-year ending the 31st March 1900, at the rate of 1s. 6d. in the pound, in respect of certain premises in the borough, had failed to pay the rate.

The following were the facts as proved or admitted:

The rate was duly made, and the respondent was rated thereby in respect of premises which were shops, known as Nos. 2 and 3, Pier Hill-buildings.

The rate was made on the 9th Nov. 1899 for the half-year ending the 31st March 1900, at 1s. 6d. in the pound on an annual value of 136l., amounting to 10l. 4s., and the respondent had not paid the rate.

The respondent held the premises by virtue of a lease or licence granted to him by the appellants as owners thereof, dated the 8th March 1899, and by this lease or licence the corporation (the appellants) gave leave and licence to the licensee to use the premises in question between the hours of 8 a.m. and 11.20 p.m. on every day from the 25th March 1899 to the 25th March 1913, the premises being described as two shops forming part of certain buildings belonging to the corporation.

The licence was to be subject to the terms and conditions of the agreement, and the licensee was to pay to the corporation by way of rent on the 30th June and 15th Aug. in each year the sum of 100l.

The licensee was to use the premises for the carrying on of the business of a fancy bazaar, and none of the rooms or premises were to be used for any other purpose whatsoever except with the previous consent in writing of the corporation.

The premises were not to be used for the purpose of a dwelling-house, and no person was to occupy the same between 11.30 p.m. and 6 a.m. the next morning, and no person was to be allowed to sleep on the premises at night.

The licensee was not to assign or underlet without the consent of the corporation, and was to keep the premises in good and substantial repair and condition, and on the determination of his tenancy deliver them up to the corporation in the same good repair, and was to have the liberty of keeping his premises open during the aforesaid hours for business all the year round except Sundays, but if the premises should be closed during the summer season for a longer consecutive period than one month then the corporation should be at liberty to determine the lease.

After the respondent had entered into possession he had with the consent of the appellants turned the two shops into one shop. There was no living accommodation, lavatory, or water supply on the premises.

The respondent had carried on business there under the name of the "Universal Bazaar Company," and had used the premises as a shop for the sale of goods at prices not exceeding 6½d. up to the 25th Sept. 1899, when he locked them up and left them.

For the purposes of such business the respondent had caused to be indicated on a signboard securely attached to the premises the words "Any article 6½d.," and had also affixed to the windows and exterior parts of the premises the words "The Universal Bazaar Company. Nothing over 6½d.," all of which remained attached and affixed for the period during which the rate was current.

The respondent's business could not be carried on lucratively on the premises except in the summer months, and the respondent on the 25th Sept. 1899, and before the rate in question was made, locked up and left the premises with the bona fide intention of not reopening the same for business until the month of May 1900 and after the expiration of the half-year for which the rate was made. Up to the date of the hearing of the summons neither the respondent nor any person on his behalf had in fact returned to the premises, and no one ever lived on the premises.

Before the respondent left the premises in Sept. 1899 he had removed all his stock therefrom, but had left on the premises some mirrors and mirrored shelves which he had on the premises for the purpose of displaying his stock, and some other articles, such as three movable tables, three tiers of mirrored shelves, a sweeping brush, pail, a small trolley, and a shop ladder.

By the lease or licence the respondent was entitled to occupy the premises continuously throughout the whole term mentioned therein if so disposed and to carry on business there, nor was there anything in the state or condition in which the premises were left to prevent him so doing. He would require all the tables, mirrored shelves, and other articles left by him for carrying on his business, but he could not utilise the premises for his business until he had moved in and unpacked his stock.

The respondent contended that under the above circumstances the premises had in law ceased to be occupied by him after the 25th Sept. 1899 and throughout the period during which the rate was current and until he again brought stock on to the premises and again carried on business thereon, and that therefore he was not liable to pay the rate.

The appellants contended that the respondent was in occupation of the premises during the period for which the rate was made and was therefore liable to be rated, and was not within the exemption contained in sect. 211, subsect. 2, of the Public Health Act 1875 and was liable to pay the rate.

The justices, having found the above facts, held that in law the respondent was not in occupation of the premises during the period, and that he was not liable to pay the rate or any part thereof, and they dismissed the complaint.

The question for the court was, whether upon the facts above set out the justices were right in law in holding that the respondent did not occupy the premises or any part thereof during the currency of the rate of the 9th Nov. 1899.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Sect. 211. With respect to the assessment and levying of general district rates under this Act the following provisions shall have effect; namely, (1) General district rates shall be made and levied on the occupier of all kinds of property for the time being by law assessable to any rate for the relief of the poor, and shall be assessed on the full net annual value of such property, &c. (2) If at the time of making any general district rate any premises in respect of which the rate may be made are unoccupied, such premises shall be included in the rate, but the rate shall not be charged on any person in respect of the same while they continue to be unoccupied, &c.

Picksford, Q.C. (Herbert Smith with him) for the appellants.—The question raised is as to the rating of this lock-up shop during the time when the business is not going on in the shop. The justices have held as a matter of law that during the winter months when the respondent is not selling goods in this shop there is no occupation, and that he is therefore not liable to pay this rate. The justices were wrong in so holding. Though the respondent took away his stock, he left behind the fittings in the shop, his advertisements, and various other articles, but the justices held that the premises were unoccupied, and were therefore exempt under sect. 211, subsect. 2, of the public Health Act 1875. In Willing v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee (37 L. T. Rep. 126; 2 Q. B. Div. 581) it was held that a person who affixes advertisements to hoardings was not an occupier. That case differs from the present, as there the person sought to be rated merely got a licence to place advertisements on hoardings generally belonging to someone else. What is given to the respondent in this case is an exclusive occupation of these premises for the whole year, and, although in the agreement it is called a licence, it is one which gives him the exclusive occupation for the whole year, and if he is in occupation during the summer months when he is carrying on his business—which is admitted—he is equally in occupation during the time the shop was shut up. He can use the premises at all times, even after eleven o'clock at night, except that no one can sleep there, and at any moment he could come back and resume his business and open his shop. The case is analogous to a person going away for a few months and closing up his house.

Macmorran, Q.C. (J. A. Hawke with him) for the respondent.—The justices were right. The question is not one of law at all; it is a question of fact and of degree, and as such the justices have dealt with it, and they have found that the respondent was not in occupation of the premises. A distinction has been made between an actual and a beneficial occupation, and the question of actual occupation is to be decided by the justices by whom the rate is to be enforced. The case is not at all analogous to the case of a person going away from his house for a short time. Such a person leaves his house in a position in which he can resume occupation at any time. Applying the principle applicable in such cases and looking at the facts in this case substantially there was no actual occupation by the respondent. He had left the shop and had removed the whole of his stock, and had left behind merely a few small things which make no difference. The shop was an empty shop, and, being an empty shop, was not rateable. It was in the contemplation of the parties that the shop should be used only in the summer months. The case of Willing v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee (ubi sup.) is in favour of the respondent. Lush, J. there says: "Legal possession does not of itself constitute an occupation. The owner of a vacant house is in possession, . . . but as long as he leaves it vacant he is not rateable for it as an occupier." The same principle appears in Reg. v. Overseers of Malden (L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 326) and in Smith v. Assessment Committee of New Forest Union (61 L. T. Rep. 870). The rights of the tenant in this case were distinctly limited so that he could not use the place at certain times, and the distinction in cases where the rights of the tenant are limited is well stated by Oake, J. in Mayor of Southport v. Ormskirk Union Assess- ment Committee (1893) 2 Q. B. 468; affirmed 69 L. T. Rep. 852; (1894) 1 Q. B. 196).

Pickford, Q.C., in reply, was stopped.

LAWRENCE, J.—In this case I think the magistrates came to a wrong conclusion. The point has been taken in the first instance that there was no tenancy at all under this agreement, but merely a licence. On looking at the agreement, a lease or licence was granted for fourteen years at the yearly rent of 200*l.*, and on the terms of that agreement these premises were handed over to the respondent. He has to pay 100*l.* in June and in August, and he has a full right to carry on his business there, but he is not to carry it on after eleven o'clock at night. As to that point, I think there was a tenancy. The question, then, is whether there was an occupation during the period in question—namely, the winter months when the shop was closed. When the summer ended, the goods were removed from this shop, which was only a lock-up shop, but certain things were left behind. All that was necessary to carry on the business—with the exception of the stock itself—was kept on the premises, and by the terms of the agreement he was bound to keep the place in good repair and hand it over in good repair. I think, therefore, that the respondent was in occupation for the six months in question, and that this appeal must be allowed.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me that the justices have held as a matter of law that the respondent did not occupy the premises during the time when the shop was locked up. When we look at the facts stated in the case we find that the respondent left on the premises what was necessary for the fitting up of the place, and also some other things; but he removed his stock, and because he did so the magistrates have held really as a matter of law that the premises ought to be treated as unoccupied premises unless they are stocked, as they say that the respondent "could not utilise the premises for his business purposes until he had moved in and unpacked his stock." I think they were clearly wrong, and that there is no authority for that proposition. Putting it as a question of law, I think they were wrong. With regard to the other point, although in many cases it is not easy to say whether a thing is a licence or a tenancy, I think in this case there was a tenancy, and that the justices were clearly wrong in holding that the respondent was not liable to this rate.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the justices.

Bastardy—Wife living with husband—"Single woman"—Bastardy Laws Amendment Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65), s. 3.

A married woman living with her husband cannot lay an information and obtain an order against the putative father of her bastard child under sect. 3 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act 1872.

CASE stated by justices upon the hearing of an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent under sect. 3 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act 1872.

Upon hearing it was proved that the appellant at the time of the birth of the child mentioned in the information and for some years previously was a married woman, the wife of Benjamin Jones (hereinafter called the husband), who is still alive.

The appellant deposed that the respondent was the father of the child, which was born on the 3rd Dec. 1899.

Some evidence (other than the appellant's or her husband's evidence) was called to show that the husband, who was a seafaring man, was from home from the 23rd Feb. 1899 to the 6th July 1899.

It was proved that the husband became aware of the appellant's pregnancy about four months after conception, and, notwithstanding that fact, he returned to his wife, who had throughout remained at his home, in July 1899, and he stayed thereat for about three weeks, and again went to sea.

He returned, however, in Sept. 1899 to his wife, and remained for some time, and again left to go to sea.

On each of these occasions the husband and wife lived and cohabited together.

The next time the husband returned to his wife at his home was on the 27th Jan. 1900 (which was after the birth of the child), and continued to cohabit as husband and wife, though the husband alleged he did not sleep in the same house with the appellant during this visit.

On the 31st Jan. 1900, while the husband and wife so cohabited together as above mentioned, the appellant, accompanied by her husband, laid an information in which she described herself as a "single woman," and applied to a justice for a summons under sect. 3 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65) to be served on respondent as putative father of the child, and such summons was issued and served.

Subsequently on the 7th Feb. 1900, while the husband and wife cohabited together as husband and wife, as mentioned above, the appellant accompanied by her husband, attended upon the solicitor who appeared for the appellant at the hearing. On that day—namely, the 7th Feb. last—she, after being advised by her solicitor that it was necessary for her and her husband to separate, then left the office, and immediately afterwards and on the same day she laid an information in which she described herself as "a single woman," and applied for another summons under sect. 3 of the before-mentioned Act to be served on the respondent as putative father of the said child, and such summons was duly issued and served.

At the hearing on the 28th Feb. 1900 the first above-mentioned summons—namely, the one issued on the 31st Jan. 1900—was withdrawn, and the matter proceeded on the second summons issued on the 7th Feb. 1900. The solicitor who appeared for the appellant at the hearing admitted that he had advised the appellant that she could not obtain an order upon the respondent unless the appellant and her husband lived apart, and that thereupon the appellant and her husband, it was said in evidence, separated, the appellant returning to her husband's home at a village called Aberarth, and the husband going to the appellant's father's house, at New Quay, both in the county of Cardigan, and about seven miles apart.

The husband and wife alleged that from the time the appellant and her husband said they had separated on the 7th Feb. 1900 to the 28th Feb. they had not again seen each other, but on the latter date they both attended the hearing of the application, and the husband at such hearing sat by and instructed the solicitor who appeared for the appellant. Afterwards the wife went to the union workhouse at Aberayon, and the husband returned to his home at Aberarth.

The husband in his evidence admitted that on the occasion when the second summons was issued, namely, the 7th Feb. 1900, he was told by the appellant's solicitor that he (the husband) and his wife should live apart, and that he thereafter lived apart for the purpose of the affiliation proceedings. The following question was put to the husband by the chairman of the justices: "It has been stated here that you mean to live with your wife after these proceedings are over." The husband in reply stated: "Yes, I think I will; that is according as she behaves, and she gets her rights," and immediately after he added, "No, I don't think I will."

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the appellant was not a single woman within the meaning of sect. 3 of 35 & 36 Vict. c. 65, and that an order to affiliate the child could not under the circumstances be made on her application.

The justices found as facts (1) that the husband became aware of the pregnancy of his wife in about four months after conception; (2) that with such knowledge he lived and cohabited with her for lengthened periods in July and Sept. 1899 and Jan. and Feb. 1900; (3) that the summons applied for and issued on the 31st Jan. 1900 was withdrawn because at the time the husband and wife lived and cohabited together; (4) that the alleged separation on the 7th Feb. was not a bona fide separation, but colourable and for the purpose of the proceedings, and that the parties intended to and did cohabit together.

They considered that the words "single woman" did not apply to a married woman living with her husband at the time the information was laid, the summons issued, and the application made under the circumstances before stated.

They therefore dismissed the information without going into further evidence as to the respondent being the father of the child or deciding upon the sufficiency of the evidence tendered of non-access, on the ground that the appellant was not entitled to prefer the information to issue the summons, or to obtain an order thereon, because she was a married woman living with and cohabiting with her husband at the time the information was preferred, the summons issued, and the application made.

S. T. Evans for the appellant.—The point here is whether a married woman living with her husband can or cannot obtain a bastardy order, if her husband can prove that the child is a bastard. The justices decided on a misapprehension of two cases that were cited to them. The first one was Stacey v. Lintell (40 L. T. Rep. 553; 4 Q. B. Div. 291) which decided that no application for a bastardy order could be made when the mother married since the birth of the child and at the time of the application was living with her husband. In Tozer v. Lake (41 L. T. Rep. 280; 4 Q. B. Div. 322) the facts were the same, except that the summons against the putative father was issued before the marriage, and could not be served because of his default. But the circumstances here are different. What is held in both those cases is that when a woman has an illegitimate child and marries afterwards she cannot get a bastardy order against the putative father. By 4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76, a man marrying a woman is made liable to maintain a child, but there is no liability to maintain a child born to his wife during his marriage in adulterous intercourse. By sect. 3 of the Bastardy Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 65) "any single woman" may make an application for a summons to be served on the man alleged by her to be the father of the child. That section is substantially the same as sect. 2 of 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, which it has replaced. In 6 Geo. 2, c. 31, the words are "if any single woman," therefore the cases under that Act are authorities here. The case that governs the present is Rees v. Luffe (8 East, 193). The child being a bastard, the question is, Who will have to support it? Lord Ellenborough says at p. 204: "The second exception which arises upon the wording of the statutes of Elizabeth and George II. in effect resolves itself into the third. For when the question is whether this were a child born out of lawful matrimony—that is, out of the limits and rights belonging to that state—it is the same in substance as the question whether it be a bastard. It is so for the general purposes of the Act. The matrimony does not cover the child if it be in other respects (according to the rule of law applicable to the subject) a bastard, and so it seems that a child born by adulterous intercourse is as much within the provision of the Act of Geo. 2 as one born of a single woman." He also referred to

Reg. v. Collingwood, 12 Q. B. 68.

The proper test is that laid down in Peatfield v. Childs (63 J. P. 117) as to who has to support the child. The point to be considered is whether there would be two persons liable to support the child. That is the reason why we have 4 & 5 Will. 4. The justices here refused to go into the case at all, because they said that the appellant was not a single woman for the purposes of these Acts. For the purpose of this case it must be taken that the child was a bastard, although that point was not gone into at the hearing. There are no cases against me, except those under the statute of Will. 4. These decide that where a man marries, and the woman gives birth to an illegitimate child, that the man is bound to support it. He also referred to:

Aylesford Peerage case, 11 App. Cas. 1;

Burnaby v. Baillie, 61 L. T. Rep. 634; 42 Ch. Div. 282.

Bryn Roberts for the respondent.—The cases of Stacey v. Lintell (sup.) and Tozer v. Lake (sup.) do not turn on the ground of estoppel. The only question there discussed was whether a married woman living with her husband could be considered a single woman. The cases show that a married woman living with her husband cannot be considered as a single woman. He referred to

Hardy v. Atherton, 44 L. T. Rep. 776; 7 Q. B. Div. 264.

[KENNEDY, J.—If adultery has been committed and there is a child, and afterwards the husband goes on living with his wife, would he be bound to support such child?] I submit, yes. He referred to the judgment of Lord Ellenborough in Rez v. Luffe (8 East, 193). [KENNEDY, J. referred to Gardner v. Gardner (2 App. Cas. 723).] After the change in the law by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101 Rez v. Luffe (sup.) is no authority. In no case has it been held that a woman was single when living with her husband. In Reg. v. Collingwood (12 Q. B. 681) the husband and wife were not living together. Stacey v. Lintell (40 L. T. Rep. 553; 4 Q. B. Div. 291) expressly gives as a ground that the husband and wife were living together. That is laid down in the judgment of Mellor, J.

Evans in reply.—Rez v. Luffe is treated as an authority in Reg. v. Collingwood. [KENNEDY, J. referred to the judgment of Lord Campbell, C.J. in Reg. v. Pilkington.] If the status remains the same—i.e., that of a married woman—if the child is born in wedlock the same principle applies whether the husband and wife are living together or not. He referred to Bosville v. Attorney-General, 57 L. T. Rep. 588; 12 P. Div. 177.

LAWRENCE, J.—In this case I think that the magistrates were right, and on this short ground. In no case that has been cited to us has it been shown that, in fact, a married woman was looked upon as a single woman when living with her husband. No doubt a single woman was within the Bastardy Acts. A difficulty arose with regard to married women, but the courts got over it by holding that a woman living apart from her husband might be considered as a single woman within these Acts. But in no case has a woman living with her husband been considered a single woman. In Stacey v. Lintell (40 L. T. Rep. 553; 4 Q. B. Div. 291) Mellor, J. says: "It is unnecessary for us to discuss the cases that have been decided upon the construction of the earlier bastardy statutes, that the term 'single woman' is not restricted to a woman who has never married, for in the present case the mother at the time of the application was not living separate from her husband as in those cases, so that the ground on which they proceeded—that there would otherwise be no provision for the child—is removed from our consideration." Lush, J. also says: "It is another question whether the applicant was a 'single woman' qualified to apply for the order, and I think that having married and living with her husband she cannot be considered as a single woman within any construction that has been put upon the term." The ground, therefore, of my decision is that no case has been cited showing a married woman living with her husband has been considered as a single woman. As a matter of fact, the case that I have cited is a direct authority to the contrary.

KENNEDY, J.—This case raises a question of some difficulty. The point is whether, when the justices have found conclusively that a husband and wife are living together, the woman can under those circumstances obtain a bastardy order against another man who she alleges is the father of her child, if it is proved that the child was in fact the child of such person. The section of the Act in terms relates to a single woman, and prima facie a married woman would not be able to maintain an application under the section, because she was not within that category. But there are a number of authorities by which we are bound, that "single woman" may apply to a married woman, and that there may be a successful application by a married woman within the section, being a "single woman" in the eye of the law. But we must not deviate from plain words, and create exception upon exception. However, under certain circumstances, the words "single woman" apply to married women. In Stacey v. Lintell (40 L. T. Rep. 553; 4 Q. B. Div. 291), as far as that case goes, the woman was not separate from her husband when the application was made. The woman might have said that she had forfeited her right to her husband's protection. With regard to the liability to maintain an adulterous wife, there is no distinction between the parish and an individual applying: (see Littledale, J. in Rez v. Flintan, 1 B. & A. 227). That is as to maintenance. Rez v. Luffe (8 East. 193; 9 R. R. 406) was an application by the poor law authorities, and the woman was in the position of being separate from her husband, although married. Reg. v. Collingwood (12 Q. B. 681) was also a case where an order was again obtained while the married woman was living apart from her husband. The order said that 1s. 6d. per week shall be paid by the putative father until "... the said George Rance shall again live and cohabit with his said wife." The fact that they were living separate was relied on. Lord Denman, C.J., in giving judgment, says: "The single question is whether a married woman, becoming the mother of an illegitimate child, is within the Act 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, which authorises the justices to make an order in bastardy. The language of the statute applies only to single women; so did the language of 6 Geo. 2, c. 31, yet Lord Ellenborough and the whole court in Rez v. Luffe held that an order might be made on the putative father of the bastard child of a married woman, who was to be considered single under the existing circumstances and for that purpose." The words "under the existing circumstances," as in this case, mean when away from her husband. The next case to consider is Ex parte Grimes (22 L. J. 153 M. C.). There it is stated: "At the time of the making of this order Elizabeth Grimes, in fact, was a married woman, but her husband then was, and had been for several years before, absent from her, and residing as a convict under sentence of transportation in Van Diemen's Land." The husband came back, and the justices put an end to the order, taking the view that the putative father was discharged from the order by reason of the husband of the mother having returned and cohabited with her. The court held that this was not so, and Lord Campbell, C.J., in dealing with the cases of Rez v. Luffe and Reg. v. Collingwood, said: "I think that decision" (Reg. v. Collingwood) "is quite right, for the reason given in Rez v. Luffe, that in contemplation of law a married woman living separate from her husband may be within the meaning of the Act, which was passed for the purpose of providing for the support of the child, which, according to the present argument, would otherwise be altogether unprovided for." It is suggested that the meaning of single woman should be applied at the time of conception. The authorities are against it, and Mellor, J. says that the time is the time of the application. It seems to me that there is no authority that a married woman living with her husband can be treated as a single woman for the purposes of the Bastardy Acts. I do not think that we ought to extend the decisions that have been given in any way. Upon the whole, in my opinion, the true view is that the justices were right.

CAMERON (app.) v. WIGGINS (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

Appeal dismissed.

CAMERON (app.) v. WIGGINS (resp.). (a)

Merchandise marks—False trade description—Letters inserted in invoice of goods—Verbal representation as to their meaning—Merchandise Marks Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28), s. 3.

When on the sale of goods there is a figure, word, or mark applied to them which is devoid of or ambiguous in meaning, to constitute that figure, word, or mark a trade description of the goods within sect. 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act 1887 it is not necessary to show that by the custom of the trade it indicates a trade description, if it can be shown that at the sale it was inserted by the seller for the express purpose of indicating a trade description within sect. 3.

THIS was an appeal against a decision given by the Blackpool justices under the Merchandise Marks Act 1887. The respondent was summoned for unlawfully selling to the appellant a leg of mutton as to which a false trade description—namely, "New Zealand mutton"—was applied contrary to the provisions of that Act. The justices dismissed the summons without requiring the respondent to call evidence.

The facts as proved by the prosecution were as follows:—

On the 16th March 1900 the appellant saw the respondent at his (respondent's) shop at Blackpool, and produced to him a handbill. This handbill was headed, "Canterbury Meat Stores," and the material parts of it were:

Wiggins and Co. beg to inform the inhabitants of North Shore and district that they are selling their best chilled beef and pork and Canterbury (New Zealand) mutton and lamb of the very best qualities at the following low prices . . . legs of mutton 5d. and 5½d. per lb. . . . Try our Canterbury (New Zealand) lamb: Legs, 5½d. per lb.

Several exactly similar handbills were in the shop of the respondent.

The appellant said to the respondent, producing and showing him the handbill at the same time: "I understand you are selling New Zealand mutton. I am desirous of procuring a leg of mutton. My wife objects to River Plate meat, and I want New Zealand mutton. Do you supply it?" To this the respondent answered: "I do." Appellant then said: "Have you got a fresh leg you can supply me with—one that will keep for the end of the week?" The respondent replied: "I have one in this morning; it is perfectly fresh."

Upon the request of the appellant the respondent produced to him a leg of mutton and weighed it. It was 7lb. The appellant then said to the respondent: "Please give me an invoice for it." The respondent handed to the appellant an invoice, of which a copy is as follows, save that the letters "N.M." were not then written thereon: "7lb. leg of mutton at 5½d."

The appellant then said to the respondent: "You have charged me 5½d., I see" (at the same time pointing to the handbill); "you have two charges, 5d. and 5½d." The respondent replied: "Sometimes at the end of the week I have River Plate meat in; I charge 5d. for it, and 5½d. for New Zealand legs." The appellant then said to the respondent: "Then I understand this is New Zealand mutton?" To this the respondent replied: "Yes." The appellant then said to the respondent: "Do you mind marking in the invoice that this is New Zealand meat, so that I can show my wife that I have bought New Zealand mutton at 5½d., and that I have not been supplied with 5d. meat at the higher price?" The respondent then, with the intent, as the justices found, to warrant to the appellant that the mutton was New Zealand mutton, wrote upon such invoice the letters "N.M."

No evidence was offered on behalf of the appellant that the letters "N.M." had any particular indication in the meat trade.

The justices found as a fact that the mutton sold by the respondent to the appellant was not New Zealand mutton.

At the hearing before the justices it was contended on behalf of the appellant that the giving of the invoice by the respondent to the appellant with the letters "N.M." written by him thereon with the intention of the conversation and the production of the handbill at the time of sale by the respondent with the circumstances above set forth and the references thereunto made constituted an application of a false trade description to the mutton within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act, and that the mutton was sold with such description.

For the respondent it was contended (1) that an oral statement did not constitute a false description within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act; (2) that, the letters "N.M." being put on the invoice at the request of the appellant himself, no fraud was intended or committed by the respondent in putting them in, and that therefore no offence was committed; (3) that the said letters did not constitute a trade description within the meaning of the Merchandise Marks Act by reason of its not being established that according to the custom of the trade they were commonly taken to be an indication of the place or country in which the mutton was produced; and that the facts before stated did not establish that the trade description "New Zealand" in the handbill was applied by the respondent to the said mutton within the meaning of the Act.

Q.B. Div.]

CAMERON (app) v. WIGGINS (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

The justices were of opinion that the letters "N.M." on the invoice did not constitute a trade description within the meaning of the Act by reason that, although they were written thereupon by the respondent with the intent to warrant to appellant that the mutton which was sold to him and to which the invoice referred was New Zealand mutton, it was not established that according to the custom of the trade such letters were commonly taken to be an indication of the place or country in which the mutton was produced; and, secondly, that the facts above found did not as a matter of law amount to the application of a false trade description "New Zealand mutton" in the handbill to the mutton so sold by the respondent within the meaning of the Act.

The questions submitted for the decision of the court were: (1) Do the letters "N.M." in the invoice constitute a false trade description? (2) Do the facts constitute the application of a false trade description? (3) Do they constitute the application by the respondent of a false trade description within the meaning of the Act?

By the Merchandise Marks Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28):

Sect. 3. The expression "trade description" means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect . . . (b) as to the place or country in which any goods were made or produced . . . and the use of any figure, word, or mark which according to the custom of the trade is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters shall be deemed to be a trade description within the meaning of this Act.

Horace Ivory for the appellant.—The justices have been misled by the latter part of sect. 3. They have assumed that it is a qualification of the whole preceding parts. This is a mistake; it is merely an addition to them. The chief enactment is the general one that "the expression 'trade description' means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect." Then follows the addition that the use of a figure, word, or mark under certain circumstances shall be deemed a trade description for the purposes of the Act. In this case the letters "N.M." are an indication—indirect perhaps—that the mutton was New Zealand mutton. The evidence shows that that was the precise meaning that was intended to be indicated by them. [KENNEDY, J.—It seems to me a difficulty may arise in that you are really making the case extend to other cases in which something which is intelligible as a trade description is to be implied by some evidence of oral statements made at the time. That is the very thing, or one of the very things, intended to be obviated—i.e., questions as to disputed evidence regarding what took place at the sale. If you have got an intelligible written description applied to the thing sold—such, for instance, as "New Zealand Mutton"—you want no more. But if the so-called description is simply a mark or word unintelligible in itself, then the only way in which it may be interpreted is by evidence that by the custom of the trade it means a certain kind of article. This Act was not intended to cover all cases of selling goods under false characters. It was intended merely to apply to a certain class of such frauds—where a written description or mark by trade custom indicating a description is applied to the goods.] Is not your Lordship overlooking the words "indication direct or indirect"?

Putting an intelligible description on the goods would of course be a direct indication. My contention is that putting a word or mark on them in any particular case and explaining to the buyer that it means that the goods are of a certain description is an indirect indication that they are of this description. That, I think, is the principle of Coppen v. Moore (78 L. T. Rep. 520; (1898) 2 Q. B. 300). There the seller, at the purchaser's request, put into the invoice of the goods the word "Scotch." The goods were a ham, and the ham was sold as a Scotch ham. Could it have made any difference if, instead of putting "Scotch," he had put "S."? I contend that, provided there is any word or mark put upon the goods and it is put upon them with the intention of indicating their character, then that amounts to an indirect indication within the Act of their character. [LAWRENCE, J.—Suppose in this case "Australian" had been put on the invoice, the mutton being in fact Australian, and the seller had explained that "Australian" meant that it really was New Zealand, how would your argument stand?] That is a more difficult case, but I would not hesitate to contend that under such circumstances the word "Australian" constituted a false trade description of the mutton. [KENNEDY, J.—This may be said in favour of your argument, that the last words of the section may mean this, that where a word or mark is upon the thing sold, once you show that by the custom of trade it means a certain thing, then it is without more to be "deemed a trade description," but if it does not by the custom of the trade mean a certain thing, then you must give express evidence of what it actually was intended to mean in this particular case.] That is my contention. If there had been no conversation here, then we should have had to produce evidence that "N.M." by the custom of the trade means New Zealand mutton, and if we could not do so we must have failed. But we are not therefore precluded from proving that "N.M.," whether it has or has not a meaning by the custom of the trade, was in this case expressly inserted for the purpose of indicating that the mutton was New Zealand mutton. [KENNEDY, J.—Was the "N.M." inserted in the invoice after the money had been paid?] There is no statement in the case to that effect, and I think, seeing that the term used is invoice, not receipt, the fair inference is that it was not, and I am instructed that in fact it was not paid before the invoice was finally handed to the appellant. [KENNEDY, J.—What I am trying to put to you is a possible distinction between this case of Coppen v. Moore (sup.) and your case. In that case no money had passed. The transaction was still inchoate. The judge in fact says that the ground on which he finds is that the sale was not complete when the representation that the ham was Scotch was made. If in your case the sale was complete before the description was inserted in the invoice then there could be no sale under a false trade description within the Act.] The facts in Coppen v. Moore (sup.) seem to me to be identical with those in this case, and in fact the money here was not paid. [KENNEDY, J.—I do not think the point arises. The magistrates do not say that the respondent contended that the sale was complete before the invoice was altered, and there is no finding that it was.] Then the whole point is that the seller puts "N.M." on the goods, and says that means "New Zealand mutton." Surely, then, "N.M." is an indirect indication of their place of origin. [KENNEDY, J.—It really comes to this: The indication of the letters written is susceptible of another meaning; but it becomes indicative of a particular meaning by reason of the words spoken.] Precisely.

The respondent did not appear.

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 3.—LAWRENCE, J.—This is a case stated by the justices of the borough of Blackpool, and raises a question under the Merchandise Marks Act 1887 under the following circumstances: [His Lordship stated the facts.] The question is whether what the defendant did and said amounts to a description under the Merchandise Marks Act. Now, the definition of a trade mark in the Merchandise Marks Act is contained in sect. 3. The expression "trade mark" means a trade mark registered, and so forth. The expression "trade description" means any description, statement, or other indication, direct or indirect, of the number, weight, &c., of goods, the place or country in which the goods were produced, the manufacture and material, and the use of any figure, word, or mark which according to the custom of the trade is commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above matters within the meaning of the Act. Now, the question in this case discussed before the magistrates was as to whether putting the letters "N.M." on the invoice came under the enactment which I have already read, or whether if he put a "figure, word, or mark" it was necessary to show that it was a mark which according to the custom of the trade was "commonly taken to be an indication of any of the above meanings." What was done undoubtedly was—there is no question whatever as to that—a fraud practised upon the purchaser. It is found as a fact that the mutton sold was not New Zealand mutton. The respondent put "N.M." on the invoice, which the magistrate found (and most properly found) to be an indication by him that the mutton was sold as New Zealand mutton. Now, counsel for the appellant cited to us the case of Coppen v. Moore (sup.), in which practically the very same point arose. I think the provisions of sect. 2 (2) of the Merchandise Marks Act, which makes it an offence to sell goods to which a false trade description is applied, do not apply where the description is entirely oral. There can be no doubt here that if this had been only a representation orally that this was New Zealand mutton, whereas it was not, there would be no offence under the Act. In this case of Coppen v. Moore (sup.) the respondent asked the salesman in the appellant's shop for a small English ham. The salesman pointed to some American hams on the shelf and said: "Those are Scotch hams." The respondent then chose one, and the invoice, which did not contain the word "Scotch," was handed to respondent by another assistant. The respondent told the assistant to put the word "Scotch" in the invoice as he had bought the ham as such. The assistant did so, and handed the invoice to respondent, who then paid the account. It was held that the description in the invoice was a false trade description sufficient to satisfy the statute. I do not think that it is necessary I should read the judgment. That was what was held. Putting in the word "Scotch" after the representation which had been made as to the bargain, seems to me precisely on all fours with the present case. Here the respondent is asked to put in something to show that the goods sold are New Zealand mutton. He put in the letters "N.M." The justices have found that these were intended to mean New Zealand mutton. The case thus seems to me to be on all fours, in principle at all events, with Coppen v. Moore (sup.), and in my judgment the magistrates were wrong to dismiss the summons on the ground that "although the words were written thereon by the respondent with the intent to indicate to the appellant that the mutton sold to him, to which the invoice referred, was New Zealand mutton, it was not established according to the custom of the trade that such letters were commonly taken to be an indication of the place or country in which the mutton was produced; and, secondly, that the facts above found do not as matter of law amount to the application of a false trade description," &c., "within the meaning of the said Merchandise Marks Act." Now, this is the mistake the magistrates seem to have made: Referring once more to sect. 3, they seem to put it that all matters contained in the clauses of that section marked (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e) must be subject to "putting a figure, word, or mark . . . according to the custom of the trade." It is obvious what that applies to, I think. That is this. If in this case the mutton had been sold simply with "N.M." upon it, if the purchaser had taken it away, brought it back, and was told then that it was well known in the trade to indicate that it was New Zealand mutton, then, if it was well known in the trade that these letters meant New Zealand mutton, there can be no doubt that would have been an offence against the statute. But that is not the case here. This is a case which comes under the principle of Coppen v. Moore (sup.), where the words are added for the very purpose of showing that the mutton was New Zealand mutton. Therefore the question relating to the latter part of the section, as to whether the word or mark is "according to the custom of the trade to be an indication in the above matters," seems to me to be entirely irrelevant. That is the mistake the magistrates seem to me to have made. There is only one other observation I should make in respect to the case. I find the magistrates in the first paragraph of the case say the case was "heard and determined by us the said parties respectively being then present, and upon such hearing we dismissed the said information without requiring the respondent to call any evidence." That being so, it seems to me that we cannot say they ought to find the respondent guilty without hearing the case which he had prepared. Therefore the matter must go back to the magistrates with the intimation that, if the facts remain as found by the justices, then in our judgment there ought to be a conviction of course subject to any alteration which may be made in the case on the evidence given on behalf of the respondent.

KENNEDY, J.—I entirely concur in the judgment, and have nothing to add to it.

Public health—Nuisances—Abatement—Collector of rents of property—"Owner"—Structural defects—Liability of collector for structural defects—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 94, 95.A person who collects the rents of property as agent for another, is "owner" within sect. 94 of the Public Health Act 1875, and may be served with a notice under that section and required to abate a nuisance on the premises arising from structural defects of the premises.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the West Riding of the County of York.

At a petty sessions held at Castleford, in the division of Upper Osgoldcross, in the West Riding, on the 27th June 1900, a complaint was preferred by the appellant, Broadbent, on behalf of the Castleford Urban District Council, against the respondent as agent for one Mr. Doukersley, of Huddersfield, the owner of Nos. 75 to 91 (odd numbers), Regent-street, Castleford, under sect. 95 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), for that on the 7th Feb. 1900 a notice was served upon the respondent requiring him to abate a certain nuisance in or on the above premises in the district of the urban council, and that he had made default with the requisitions thereof within the time therein specified—that is to say, that he had not provided earthenware trapped gulleys, under fall pipes, connected same to sewer, covered all yard areas with hard and impervious material, repaired roofs of ash-pits and floors of wash-houses, &c.

This complaint was heard and determined by the justices, who dismissed the same, subject to this case.

It was admitted by the appellant that the nuisances were caused by structural defects.

No attempt had been made by the appellant to ascertain the real owner or owners of the property, and the respondent and rent collector or agent stated that he had never been asked for the name of the owner.

Two notices had been sent by post, addressed to a Mr. Doukersley, of Berry Brow, Huddersfield, as owner, and Mr. Shepherd, of Castleford (the respondent), as agent. The notice addressed to Mr. Doukersley had been returned through the post with a statement that it could not be delivered as there were several Doukersleys residing there.

It was contended by the appellant that the definition clause (sect. 4) of the Public Health Act 1875 (notwithstanding the special provision in sect. 94 which throws the responsibility of structural defects on the actual owner) included all agents and receivers and collectors of rent, as owners, and relieved the appellant from the responsibility of ascertaining the ownership of the property.

The justices took the view that it was not the intention of the Act of Parliament to create two ownerships under the special provision in sect. 94; that the respondent was a mere rent collector, and that the definition clause extending ownership to agents was only intended to apply where it was not inconsistent with the context; that the definition clause relied on by the appellant was governed by the earlier portion of it, which reads as follows: "In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them"; and that the appellant ought to have served the proper owner with the notice and summoned him for default.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether "owner" in that portion of sect. 94 of the Public Health Act 1875 which refers to structural defects includes a mere collector of rent or agent.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Sect. 4. In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them. "Owner" means the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack rent.

Sect. 94. On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose: Provided—First, that where the nuisance arises from the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, or where there is no occupier of the premises, notice under this section shall be served on the owner.

Then sect. 95 provides that where the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served makes default in complying with the notice, complaint may be made to a justice and the justice may issue a summons.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Scholefield with him) for the appellant.—The short point is whether a person who in fact collects the rents of property, or who acts as agent for collecting the rents, is an "owner" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, and can, as such owner, be required to execute works for the abatement of a nuisance, when such nuisance arises from structural defects. The justices were wrong in holding that a rent collector was not an "owner" for the purpose of remedying these structural defects, and it is only necessary to refer to the two sections—sects. 4 and 94—to see that they were wrong. The point as to whether the person who collected the rents of property was "owner," within a similar definition in the Nuisances Removal Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), was considered in the year 1872 in the case of Cook v. Montagu (26 L. T. Rep. 471; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 418). In sect. 2 of that Act the word "owner" was defined as including "any person receiving the rents of the property in respect of which that word is used . . . on his own account, or as trustee or agent for any other person," and Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, thus laid down the principle on which the definition of owner proceeded in such cases: "The object was, on the one hand, that a structural improvement should be thrown upon the owner, and that the local authority should not be bound to proceed against temporary occupiers who might also not be worth powder and shot; but, on the other hand, inasmuch as it might often be very difficult indeed to ascertain who were the real owners, and the collectors of rent might easily be found, this definition of 'owner' was given; and in a vast number of cases they would thus reach the real owner": (L. Rep. 7 Q. B., at p. 422). Under the same definition of owner in a local Act it was held by Lopes, J. in Mayor, &c., of St. Helens v. Kirkham (16 Q. B. Div. 403) that an agent employed to collect the rents of property was an "owner," and was liable as such for the payment of paving expenses. There is not the same necessity for making an agent or collector of rents liable as owner in respect of paving expenses as there is in making him liable for the abatement of nuisances, yet the collector of the rents was in that case held liable for the paving expenses, though he had no funds in his hands. This has been followed repeatedly, as in Tottenham Local Board v. Williamson (69 L. T. Rep. 51), decided in 1893. The justices were therefore wrong in their decision.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think this case must go back to the magistrates. In order that there might be no difficulty in enforcing the provisions of this Act, for the purposes of the Act the word "owner" is expressly defined in sect. 4 as meaning "the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person." Now, it appears that it has been held that that definition of "owner" includes the person who collects the rent in the case of liability for paving expenses. If so, I certainly think it ought also to be applied in cases in which the question is as to the abatement of nuisances. I therefore think this case ought to go back to the magistrates with this intimation of our opinion.

Metropolis—Management Acts—"New street"—Sewering—Expenses of—Liability of frontagers—Old street with line of new buildings on one side—Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 52, 53.

An old highway formed a boundary between the parish of C. in the county of London and the parish of H., in the county of Middlesex, the actual boundary being nearly in the centre of the road. Before 1856, when the Metropolis Management Act 1855 came into operation, buildings had been erected on the H. side of the road along nearly the whole of its length, but on the C. side there were only a few buildings. During the last few years and since 1856 the greater part of the C. side of the road had been covered with buildings, and in 1898 a sewer was constructed on the C. side for draining the houses on that side, and the cost was apportioned on the frontagers on that side as being a "new street" within the Metropolis Management Acts.

Upon a summons against a frontager for the apportioned cost of the sewerage, the justices found that the road taken as a whole was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act 1855 came into operation, and dismissed the summons.

Held, that the road must be dealt with as a whole, and that the C. side could not be dealt with by itself for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts so as to render frontagers on that side liable to the cost of the sewerage, and that the justices were therefore right in dismissing the summons.

CASE stated by justices of the peace sitting at the Highgate Petty Sessions, in the county of London.

A complaint was preferred by the appellants under the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 against the respondents, that the appellants, during the years 1897 and 1898, in accordance with the provisions in that behalf of the Metropolis Management Acts, executed or caused to be executed certain works—namely, the construction of a sewer and the works appertaining thereto, including the cost of gullies, side entrances, lengths of sewer at the intersection of streets with the necessary manholes and inspection chambers, and other incidental charges and expenses under the Acts, in or in part of a new street known as Colney Hatch-lane, for or in respect of certain premises in the street of which the respondents were the owners; and that the appellants had thereby incurred expenses of which the amount apportioned in respect of the respondent's premises were 190l. 6s. 8d. and 7l. 2s. 10d. respectively, and that the respondents had not paid these sums.

Colney Hatch-lane is an old highway forming the boundary between a detached portion of the parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, in the county of London, and the parish and urban district of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex.

The actual boundary is nearly in the centre of the lane, but the greater part of the surface is within the parish of Clerkenwell.

Before the year 1856, when the first of the Metropolis Management Acts (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) came into operation, buildings had been erected on the Hornsey or Middlesex side of the lane along nearly the whole of its length, but on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane there were at that time only seven or eight buildings at various points.

The entire length of the lane is 2993ft., and the character and extent of the buildings was shown on the Ordnance Map published in 1862.

No attempt had been made by the appellant to ascertain the real owner or owners of the property, and the respondent and rent collector or agent stated that he had never been asked for the name of the owner.

Two notices had been sent by post, addressed to a Mr. Doukersley, of Berry Brow, Huddersfield, as owner, and Mr. Shepherd, of Castleford (the respondent), as agent. The notice addressed to Mr. Doukersley had been returned through the post with a statement that it could not be delivered as there were several Doukersleys residing there.

It was contended by the appellant that the definition clause (sect. 4) of the Public Health Act 1875 (notwithstanding the special provision in sect. 94 which throws the responsibility of structural defects on the actual owner) included all agents and receivers and collectors of rent, as owners, and relieved the appellant from the responsibility of ascertaining the ownership of the property.

The justices took the view that it was not the intention of the Act of Parliament to create two ownerships under the special provision in sect. 94; that the respondent was a mere rent collector, and that the definition clause extending ownership to agents was only intended to apply where it was not inconsistent with the context; that the definition clause relied on by the appellant was governed by the earlier portion of it, which reads as follows: "In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them"; and that the appellant ought to have served the proper owner with the notice and summoned him for default.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether "owner" in that portion of sect. 94 of the Public Health Act 1875 which refers to structural defects includes a mere collector of rent or agent.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Sect. 4. In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them. "Owner" means the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack rent.

Sect. 94. On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice on the person by whose act, default, or sufferance the nuisance arises or continues, or, if such person cannot be found, on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same within a time to be specified in the notice, and to execute such works and do such things as may be necessary for that purpose: Provided—First, that where the nuisance arises from the want or defective construction of any structural convenience, or where there is no occupier of the premises, notice under this section shall be served on the owner.

Then sect. 95 provides that where the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served makes default in complying with the notice, complaint may be made to a justice and the justice may issue a summons.

Macmorran, Q.C. (Scholefield with him) for the appellant.—The short point is whether a person who in fact collects the rents of property, or who acts as agent for collecting the rents, is an "owner" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, and can, as such owner, be required to execute works for the abatement of a nuisance, when such nuisance arises from structural defects. The justices were wrong in holding that a rent collector was not an "owner" for the purpose of remedying these structural defects, and it is only necessary to refer to the two sections—sects. 4 and 94—to see that they were wrong. The point as to whether the person who collected the rents of property was "owner," within a similar definition in the Nuisances Removal Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 121), was considered in the year 1872 in the case of Cook v. Montagu (26 L. T. Rep. 471; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 418). In sect. 2 of that Act the word "owner" was defined as including "any person receiving the rents of the property in respect of which that word is used . . . on his own account, or as trustee or agent for any other person," and Blackburn, J., in delivering the judgment of the court, thus laid down the principle on which the definition of owner proceeded in such cases: "The object was, on the one hand, that a structural improvement should be thrown upon the owner, and that the local authority should not be bound to proceed against temporary occupiers who might also not be worth powder and shot; but, on the other hand, inasmuch as it might often be very difficult indeed to ascertain who were the real owners, and the collectors of rent might easily be found, this definition of 'owner' was given; and in a vast number of cases they would thus reach the real owner": (L. Rep. 7 Q. B., at p. 422). Under the same definition of owner in a local Act it was held by Lopes, J. in Mayor, &c., of St. Helens v. Kirkham (16 Q. B. Div. 403) that an agent employed to collect the rents of property was an "owner," and was liable as such for the payment of paving expenses. There is not the same necessity for making an agent or collector of rents liable as owner in respect of paving expenses as there is in making him liable for the abatement of nuisances, yet the collector of the rents was in that case held liable for the paving expenses, though he had no funds in his hands. This has been followed repeatedly, as in Tottenham Local Board v. Williamson (69 L. T. Rep. 51), decided in 1893. The justices were therefore wrong in their decision.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think this case must go back to the magistrates. In order that there might be no difficulty in enforcing the provisions of this Act, for the purposes of the Act the word "owner" is expressly defined in sect. 4 as meaning "the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person." Now, it appears that it has been held that that definition of "owner" includes the person who collects the rent in the case of liability for paving expenses. If so, I certainly think it ought also to be applied in cases in which the question is as to the abatement of nuisances. I therefore think this case ought to go back to the magistrates with this intimation of our opinion.

KENNEDY, J.—I agree.

Metropolis—Management Acts—"New street"—Sewering—Expenses of—Liability of frontagers—Old street with line of new buildings on one side—Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 52, 53.

An old highway formed a boundary between the parish of C. in the county of London and the parish of H., in the county of Middlesex, the actual boundary being nearly in the centre of the road. Before 1856, when the Metropolis Management Act 1855 came into operation, buildings had been erected on the H. side of the road along nearly the whole of its length, but on the C. side there were only a few buildings. During the last few years and since 1856 the greater part of the C. side of the road had been covered with buildings, and in 1898 a sewer was constructed on the C. side for draining the houses on that side, and the cost was apportioned on the frontagers on that side as being a "new street" within the Metropolis Management Acts.

Upon a summons against a frontager for the apportioned cost of the sewerage, the justices found that the road taken as a whole was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act 1855 came into operation, and dismissed the summons.

Held, that the road must be dealt with as a whole, and that the C. side could not be dealt with by itself for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts so as to render frontagers on that side liable to the cost of the sewerage, and that the justices were therefore right in dismissing the summons.

CASE stated by justices of the peace sitting at the Highgate Petty Sessions, in the county of London.

A complaint was preferred by the appellants under the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 against the respondents, that the appellants, during the years 1897 and 1898, in accordance with the provisions in that behalf of the Metropolis Management Acts, executed or caused to be executed certain works—namely, the construction of a sewer and the works appertaining thereto, including the cost of gullies, side entrances, lengths of sewer at the intersection of streets with the necessary manholes and inspection chambers, and other incidental charges and expenses under the Acts, in or in part of a new street known as Colney Hatch-lane, for or in respect of certain premises in the street of which the respondents were the owners; and that the appellants had thereby incurred expenses of which the amount apportioned in respect of the respondent's premises were 130l. 6s. 8d. and 7l. 2s. 10d. respectively, and that the respondents had not paid these sums.

Colney Hatch-lane is an old highway forming the boundary between a detached portion of the parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, in the county of London, and the parish and urban district of Hornsey, in the county of Middlesex.

The actual boundary is nearly in the centre of the lane, but the greater part of the surface is within the parish of Clerkenwell.

Before the year 1856, when the first of the Metropolis Management Acts (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) came into operation, buildings had been erected on the Hornsey or Middlesex side of the lane along nearly the whole of its length, but on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane there were at that time only seven or eight buildings at various points.

The entire length of the lane is 2993ft., and the character and extent of the buildings was shown on the Ordnance Map published in 1862.

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. DIV.] VESTRY OF ST. JAMES & ST. JOHN, CLERKENWELL v. EDMONDSON & SON. [Q.B. DIV.]

Since the year 1856, and more particularly within the last few years, the remainder of the Clerkenwell or London side has been laid out for building, and the greater part of the frontage to the lane is now covered with buildings.

In or about the year 1887 the Hornsey Local Board laid a sewer on their side of the lane for the drainage of the houses in their district. By agreement between that board and the appellants two of the houses on the Clerkenwell side were drained into such sewer until the sewer mentioned in the complaint was constructed; and by agreement between the same board and the owners of two other houses on the Clerkenwell side, those owners connected their drains with the Hornsey sewer. The sums paid by such owners to the Hornsey Local Board under the agreements were repaid to them by the appellants when their drains were connected with the sewer mentioned in the complaint. On the Clerkenwell side of the lane there was no sewer of any kind save a surface water sewer which had been laid for the drainage of the road itself partly by the owners of adjoining land and partly by the appellants, and for a short distance an old brick sewer running obliquely across the lane and taking the drainage of three or four of the houses on that side. The old houses at the south end of the lane on the Clerkenwell side were drained into a sewer behind these houses, running into another parish.

The part of the parish of Clerkenwell which comprised the eastern side of the Colney Hatch-lane is wholly detached from the rest of the parish, and is entirely surrounded by the county of Middlesex. For this reason it was found to be impracticable to provide an outlet into the metropolitan main drainage system from this part of the parish.

By the Metropolitan Board of Works (Various Powers) Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. cvi.), s. 44, the Metropolitan Board of Works (now the London County Council) were enabled, by agreement with the local authorities of certain adjoining districts, or any of them, to cause any sewer or sewers constructed or to be constructed by such board in the said detached portion of Clerkenwell to communicate with the sewers of one or more of such authorities, and an agreement for this purpose was made in the year 1896 by the London County Council with the Friern Barnet Urban District Council, and an outlet for the sewage of this detached part of Clerkenwell into a sewer of the county council and thence into the Friern Barnet sewers was provided in pursuance of the agreement in the year 1897. As soon as such outlet was provided, the appellants laid the sewer, which was the subject of this case, for the drainage of the houses and buildings which then were or might thereafter be erected on the Clerkenwell or London side of the lane, and such sewer was completed in the year 1898.

The total cost of the sewer and the works appertaining thereto was 1106*l.* 14*s.* 5*d.*, of which the appellants charged to sewer rates the sum of 103*l.* 7*s.* 3*d.*, and apportioned the balance among the owners of the premises on the Clerkenwell side of the lane according to their respective frontages.

The amounts apportioned in respect of the respondents premises were 130*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.* and 7*l.* 2*s.* 10*d.*

The respondents having refused to pay these sums, a complaint was preferred under sects. 52 and 53 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862.

It was contended before the justices on behalf of the appellants that so much of Colney Hatch-lane as is within the parish of Clerkenwell was a "new street" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts; that it became a new street by reason of the erection of buildings fronting it as above mentioned; that in order to determine whether it had become a new street, no regard could be had to the portion of the lane in the parish of Hornsey or to the buildings on the Hornsey side, these being in a different parish, district, and county, and subject to entirely different statutes.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that Colney Hatch-lane taken as a whole had become a street in the ordinary sense of the term by reason of the buildings erected along it before the year 1856, and was an old street when the Metropolis Management Act 1855 came into operation; that no part of such street could become a new street subsequently by reason of the erection of additional buildings along it, and that the portion of the lane which is in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself without regard to the portion which is in Hornsey, or to the buildings on the Hornsey side for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts.

The justices found that Colney Hatch-lane taken as a whole was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act 1855 came into operation, and they were of opinion that that portion of the lane which is in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street, and for these reasons they dismissed the summonses.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether that portion of Colney Hatch-lane which is in Clerkenwell could be dealt with by itself without regard to the portion which is in Hornsey or to the buildings on the Hornsey side for the purpose of determining whether it is a new street.

The Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) provides:

Sect. 52. Where any sewer shall, after the passing of this Act, be constructed by any vestry or district board in or for the drainage of any new street, or of any house or houses erected since the 1st day of January 1856, the expense of constructing such sewer and the works appertaining thereto, including the cost of gullies, side entrances, lengths of sewer at the intersection of streets, and other incidental charges and expenses, shall be borne and defrayed by the owners of such street or houses, and of the land bounding or abutting on such street respectively, and the said expenses shall be apportioned by the vestry or district board in such proportion as they may deem just, &c.

Sect. 53. Where any sewer shall be constructed by any vestry or district board in a street in which, previously to such construction, there had been no sewer, or only an open sewer, but where sewers rates have been levied previously to such construction, the expense of constructing such sewer and the works appertaining thereto . . . shall be borne and defrayed in part only by the owners of the houses situated in and of the land bounding and abutting on such street respectively, &c.

Macmorran, Q.C. (C. F. Pritchard with him) for the appellants.—The question is whether this lane, the half of which is in the metropolis and the other half of which is in Middlesex, is a new street within the meaning of these Acts. The magistrates were wrong in holding that it was not a new street. They went on a wrong basis, as they assumed that the road must be treated as a whole. "Street" is defined in sect. 250 of the Act of 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), and it includes "a part of any such highway, &c."; and "new street" is defined in sect. 112 of the Act of 1862, and it applies to "all streets hereafter to be formed or laid out" and "a part of such street." That definition of "new street" may not apply here, but the expressions show that the words "street" and "new street" apply not only to the whole street but to a part of such street. Then sects. 52 and 53 of the Act of 1862 deal with the expenses of constructing sewers in "new streets." Applying these provisions here why should not that portion of the highway which is in Clerkenwell be regarded as a street and a new street for the purpose of the authority doing what they could not otherwise do? Although this lane was an old highway it had become a new street by the erection of these buildings on the Clerkenwell side since the passing of these Acts:

Pound v. Plumstead Board of Works, L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 183.

This half of the road—the Clerkenwell half—is a street in itself, and was not so in 1856, though the lane as a whole is found to be a street, but the Clerkenwell side of the road was not then a street in the ordinary acceptation of the term. The half of the road on the Clerkenwell side can be dealt with by itself as a street and a new street, and in fact had to be so dealt with because in dealing with these matters the local authority cannot go beyond the extent of their local jurisdiction, this part of the road alone being in the county of London. This part of the road ought therefore to be considered by itself. It is the same as if there were a fence down the middle of the road along the boundary line, and in that case there would be houses on the one side—the Clerkenwell side—and a fence on the other, which would constitute the Clerkenwell side a street:

Richards v. Kessick, 59 L. T. Rep. 318.

This vestry would only have jurisdiction to deal with a certain width of this road, and they were not able to deal with this sewerage until they had got an outfall. Instead of considering this lane as one street, there are in fact two streets, namely, that on the Hornsey side, which, being in the county of Middlesex, is under the Public Health Acts, and that on the Clerkenwell side, which, being in the county of London, is under the Metropolis Management Acts. The justices were therefore wrong in holding that the Clerkenwell side of the lane could not be dealt with by itself.

Alexander Glen for the respondents.—The justices were right in treating the road as a whole. Two questions arise, whether this road is a street, and if so, whether it is a new street. The question whether it is a street is a question as to its physical condition at the time, and sect. 52 itself shows that the physical characteristic of the road attaches to the whole street. There is authority for this proposition, as in Simmonds v. Fulham Vestry (82 L. T. Rep. 497; (1900) 2 Q. B. 188), a highway of which one side was covered with houses and the other consisted of vacant building land, was held to be a "street." This Clerkenwell half of the street is the half of an old street, and having once had that characteristic impressed on it, it cannot afterwards acquire a new character. In Richards v. Kessick (ubi sup.), and in White v. Fulham Vestry (74 L. T. Rep. 425), which followed it, the elements of newness had come in since the date of the Act, but it is not so in this case. In White v. Fulham Vestry (ubi sup.), the strip of 13ft. thrown in on the southern side of the road in the year 1888 had never been a street before and had never acquired the character of a street at all; when thrown in it acquired the character of a street, and as it was new it was a new street. That is the distinction between that case and the present, as this road, taken as a whole, had the character of a street, and had, in fact, become a street by the erection of the buildings on the Hornsey side before the year 1856. The question being really one as to the physical character or condition of the road at the time, and this highway having had impressed on it the character of a street before 1856, and being then an old street, no part of it can afterwards become a new street and the justices were right in so holding. He also referred to

Cur. adv. vult.

Nov. 16.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is an appeal from a decision of justices of the county of London sitting at Highgate on a summons to enforce the payment of two sums of 130l. odd and 7l. odd, portions of the expense of making a certain sewer in Colney Hatch-lane which had been charged on the defendants, the respondents in this case, as frontagers. The facts are, and are so found in the case, that Colney Hatch-lane is an old highway forming a boundary between a detached portion of the parish of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell, in the county of London, and the parish and urban district of Hornsey in the county of Middlesex. The actual boundary is nearly in the centre of the lane, but the greater part is within the parish of Clerkenwell. The case then goes on to state that "before the year 1856, when the first of the Metropolis Management Acts came into operation buildings had been erected on the Hornsey or Middlesex side of the lane along nearly the whole of its length, but on the Clerkenwell, or London side of the lane, there were at that time only about seven or eight buildings at various points." The case then states the facts as to the construction of the sewer, and the justices having stated the facts which gave rise to this claim proceed to say: "We found that Colney Hatch-lane, taken as a whole, was sufficiently built upon to be a street before the Metropolis Management Act 1855 came into operation, and we were of opinion that that portion of the lane which is in Clerkenwell could not be dealt with by itself for the purpose of determining whether it was a new street." The summons was taken out and the expenses had been apportioned under sects. 52 and 53 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act of 1862, whereby if drainage is done in a new street, the expenses can be apportioned on the frontagers. Speaking for myself, I should have been glad if I could have seen my way to adopt the argument for the appellants. I think there is a great deal to be said for the view that it was, so far as the county of London and the parish of Clerkenwell are concerned, substantially a new street, and the sewer being put down in the new street it ought to have fallen within the rule which was applied in the Plumstead case (ubi sup.). Of course we do not sit here to review findings of fact, and I might go further and say that there is no reason to doubt, or even to criticise, the findings of fact, but in this case the justices have found as a fact that Colney Hatch-lane had become a street before 1856. I think the street for this purpose must be taken to be the whole road. I think the justices must be taken to have found that the portion of the street which was in Clerkenwell is included within the road which had become a street at the date that was mentioned; and I do not think it is open to the appellants to argue that for the purpose of this section the part of the road so forming part of the street can be regarded as having become a new street because building on that side of it has been carried on very extensively since the year 1862. I think the point taken by the learned counsel for the respondents forms a strong argument that, if the boundary had happened to run just upon the other side of the Hornsey side of the road, even though a new sewer had been put down before there had been a large amount of fresh building, it would have been impossible to divide the road; but, whether that is a conclusive argument or not, I think, in the face of these findings, we must come to the conclusion that the justices here arrived at a right finding in saying that they cannot treat the particular portion of Colney Hatch-lane which is in the county of London as a new street for the purposes of sect. 52 of the Act of 1862. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed with costs.

KENNEDY, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think we fully appreciate the argument for the appellants and the suggestion that practically the street may be treated, for the purpose of the parish of Clerkenwell, as a street of which one side is not the other side of the road physically, but is a line drawn at the boundary of the jurisdiction of Clerkenwell, running longitudinally through the highway. But it appears to me that, in the absence of authority, to create one more artificiality in the understanding of a "street" and "new street" is clearly not to be desired; and, in the face of the finding of the magistrates, from which I see no reason to differ, in following what I may call the primary and natural sense of the words "street" and "new street" we do not violate any interpretation of these terms as given by the courts in reference to kindred Acts of Parliament. I prefer to say that the view taken by the magistrates is right, that they are right in law and that there is nothing to find fault with.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal.

JAMES (app.) v. IVEMEY AND ANOTHER (resps.). (a)

Registration of voters—Borough a county of itself—Freeholders entitled to vote—Borough added to another borough not a county of itself—Right of freeholders to vote in new borough—Representation of the People Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45), ss. 8, 31, 33, and sched. E—Redistribution of Seats Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 23), ss. 2, 7, 11, 17, and scheds. 1, 5.

The borough of Haverfordwest was at the date of the Reform Act 1832 a county of itself having the right of returning a member to Parliament, and the freeholders therein had the right of voting in the election for such member, and this right of the freeholders was preserved under sects. 31 and 33 of that Act and two adjacent places were added to the borough and shared in the right.

By the Redistribution of Seats Act 1885 the borough of Haverfordwest ceased to exist as a borough and was included in the county of Pembroke, and it was then under the Act added to the borough of Pembroke and a new borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest was thus created.

Held, that, as the borough of Haverfordwest was added to the borough of Pembroke by the Act of 1885, the freeholders in Haverfordwest lost the right which they possessed up to 1885 of voting in the Haverfordwest district, and were no longer entitled as freeholders to vote in the new borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest.

CASE stated by Mr. Arthur Lewis, the revising barrister for the borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest.

At a court held on the 10th Sept. 1900 for the revision of the lists of voters for the parish of St. Mary, in Haverfordwest, within the borough, William Charles Ivey, of 17, Princes-street, Pembroke Dock, on the list of Parliamentary electors for the parish of St. Mary, Pembroke, Peter Ward, duly objected to the name of John James being retained in the Parliamentary list of voters for the borough, intitled "List of the persons entitled to be registered as Parliamentary Voters for the Parliamentary Borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest in respect of any right reserved by sects. 31 and 33 of the Reform Act 1832."

The facts of the case as proved or admitted before the revising barrister were as follows:

1. The name of John James appeared in the list as under:

Name of the voter in full, surname being first: James, John.

Place of abode: St. Martin's-crescent.

Nature of qualification: Freehold house.

Description of qualifying property: Fountain-row and Pew-street.

2. The town of Haverfordwest was a county of itself, so constituted by Royal Charter and statute, and possessed a separate Court of Quarter Sessions.

3. Before the Reform Act of 1832 the county of the town of Haverfordwest returned a member to Parliament, and this privilege was not participated in by any contributory place, but by sect. 8 and sched. E of that Act the towns of Fishguard and Narberth were given a share in the election of the member for Haverfordwest.

By the same section and schedule certain places were given a share in the election of the member for the borough of Pembroke, at that time entirely distinct from Haverfordwest.

By the Redistribution of Seats Act 1885 a new borough was constituted, called the borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest, and comprising the places till then included in the distinct constituencies of Pembroke and of Haverfordwest. Freeholders in the town and county of Haverfordwest had the right to vote in the election of a member for Haverfordwest before the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, and have continued to exercise that right without interruption or objection down to the present year.

4. The said John James became a freeholder of the county of the town of Haverfordwest before the passing of the Redistribution of Seats Act 1885, but several of the persons whose names appeared in the lists intituled as aforesaid had been admitted to vote as freeholders of the county of the town of Haverfordwest since the passing of that Act.

5. The form of the objection, omitting the formal parts, was as follows:

That you have no qualification to vote in the election of a member for the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest, the nature of the alleged qualification as mentioned in the third column of the list not being by law a qualification to vote as aforesaid.

6. It was agreed that the decision of the revising barrister should govern the cases of all voters whose names appeared on and of persons claiming to have their names inserted in the lists of Parliamentary electors in respect of freehold qualifications in the parishes of St. Mary, St. Thomas, St. Martin, Prendergast, Cartlett and Furzy Park, and Portfield within the town and county of Haverfordwest, within the said borough.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents as follows:

7. That by sect. 31 of the Reform Act 1832 the rights of the freeholders of the county of the town of Haverfordwest to vote in the election of a member for the county of the town of Haverfordwest were preserved, and that the Act did not interfere with the right of the county of the town to be represented in Parliament except that by sect. 8 and sched. E the adjacent places of Narberth and Fishguard were admitted to share in the election of the member for Haverfordwest, and, together with the county of Haverfordwest, thenceforth constituted the Haverfordwest district or Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest.

8. That by sect. 2 and the 1st schedule of the Redistribution of Seats Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 23) the Haverfordwest district ceased to return any member, and the county of the town of Haverfordwest was for the purpose of Parliamentary elections included in the county at large of Pembroke.

9. That by sect. 17 of the same Act the rights of freeholders in the area of what was formerly the county of the town of Haverfordwest were preserved for the purpose of enabling them to vote in the election of a member for the county of Pembroke at large in respect of the same qualifications which formerly enabled them to vote in the election of a member for the abolished Parliamentary borough.

10. That by sect. 7 of the same Act the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke was for all purposes of and relating to Parliamentary elections enlarged so as to comprise the places comprised in the abolished Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest, and by sect. 11 the law relating to the elections for the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke was made to apply as if the places comprised in the area of the former Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest were named in the Reform Act of 1832 as places sharing in the election of a member for Pembroke, and the new enlarged borough received the name of Pembroke and Haverfordwest.

11. That by the law relating to the elections for the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke, freeholders had no right to vote for the election of the member for the borough, because Pembroke never was, like Haverfordwest or Southampton, a county of a town or of a city like Bristol, Exeter, and Norwich, and therefore the freeholders who used to have a right to vote for the member for the borough of Haverfordwest district were not given any right to vote for the borough of Pembroke, but had instead a right to vote for the member for the county of Pembroke.

12. That sects. 31 and 33 of the Reform Act 1832 are totally inapplicable to give freeholders any right to vote in the election of the member for the borough of Pembroke, because such member serves not merely for the county of the town of Haverfordwest and places sharing therewith, but he serves for the whole new borough which is Pembroke and places sharing with Pembroke.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant as follows:

13. That Haverfordwest as a county could not be distinguished from Haverfordwest as a place. That the effect of the Redistribution Act 1885 was to transfer Haverfordwest with its contributory places of Fishguard and Narberth and all its franchises (including freeholders) to the new borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest, and that no section of that Act dealt with the freeholders of Haverfordwest as a separate class of voters.

14. That the disfranchisement of the Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest as a separate political entity and its junction with the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke in the new borough was sufficiently effected by the first paragraph of sect. 2, the first part of the 1st schedule, sect. 7, and the 5th schedule of the Redistribution Act.

15. That the second paragraph of sect. 2 and the second part of the 1st schedule of that Act made no distinction between Haverfordwest and the other counties of towns and cities mentioned therein (which have become entirely parts of certain counties as set out in the 7th schedule), and no distinction between freeholder and occupation voters in any of the several towns and cities, and that in so far as this section was intended to apply to Haverfordwest (which has not been made part of a county, and is not included in the 7th schedule) it is inconsistent with the later sections of the same Act (sect. 7, sched. 5, sect. 11), and is therefore of no effect.

[Q.B. Div.]

JAMES (app.) v. IVEMEY AND ANOTHER (resps.).

[Q.B. Div.]

16. That sects. 7 and 11 of the Redistribution Act and sched 5 expressly include in the new borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest the old Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest with all the franchises theretofore exercised in Haverfordwest itself.

17. That if Haverfordwest had been named in the Act of 1832 as sharing with Pembroke in the election of a member, its freeholders would have been entitled to the protection of sects. 31 and 33 of that Act, these sections not being limited to constituencies including nothing besides a town and county and Haverfordwest then sharing its representation with two other places.

18. That sect. 17 of the Act of 1885 applied only to the question of time for the first registration and operated as far as the Haverfordwest freeholders were concerned to enable them for the purpose of voting for the new borough to have credit for the time of their holding their qualifications in the old borough. That this section applied to all classes of voters and did not operate to preserve any right of Haverfordwest freeholders to vote in the county of Pembroke.

19. It was alternatively contended that even if the contentions of the objector were well founded, John James, having been on the register prior to 1885, was entitled to remain on under sect. 17 of the Redistribution Act and sect. 10 of the Representation of the People Act 1884.

20. The revising barrister was of opinion that the contentions of the respondents were correct and that for the reasons submitted by him the nature of the qualification of the appellant as alleged in the third column of the list, was not by law a qualification to vote in the election of a member for the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest, and accordingly expunged his name from the list.

21. The appellant having duly delivered a notice in writing that he was desirous of appealing against the decision and having requested the revising barrister to name William Odyerne Hulm, town clerk of the borough of Pembroke, as respondent, in addition to William Charles Ivey, the revising barrister stated the above case accordingly for the opinion of Her Majesty's High Court of Justice, Queen's Bench Division.

22. If the court should be of opinion that the decision of the revising barrister was right the lists of Parliamentary electors intitled as stated in the special case for the several parishes mentioned in par. 6 of this case and of all claimants to be inserted in the respective lists are to remain as revised by him. If the court should be of opinion that his decision was wrong, then the names of voters and claimants are to be restored to and inserted in the lists respectively.

The Representation of the People Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 45)—commonly called the Reform Act 1832—provides:

Sect. 8. And be it enacted, that each of the places named in the first column of the schedule (E) to this Act annexed shall have a share in the election of a member to serve in all future Parliaments for the shire, town, or borough which is mentioned in conjunction therewith and named in the second column of the said schedule (E).

In the sched. (E) the places Narberth and Fishguard are mentioned in the first column as sharing with Haverfordwest mentioned in the second column.

Sect. 31. In every city or town being a county of itself, in the election for which freeholders or burgage tenants, either with or without any superadded qualification, now have a right to vote, every such freeholder or burgage tenant shall be entitled to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in all future Parliaments for such city or town, provided he shall be duly registered according to the provisions hereinafter contained; Provided also, that every freehold or burgage tenement which may be situate without the present limits of any such city or town being a county of itself, but within the limits of such city or town, as the same shall be settled and described by the Act to be passed for that purpose as hereinbefore mentioned, shall confer the right of voting in the election of a member or members to serve in any future Parliament for such city or town in the same manner as if such freehold or burgage tenement were situate within the present limits thereof.

Sect. 33. And be it enacted, that no person shall be entitled to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in any future Parliament for any city or borough; save and except in respect of some right conferred by this Act, or as a burgess or freeman, or as a freeman and liveryman, or, in the case of a city or town being a county of itself, as a freeholder or burgage tenant, as hereinbefore mentioned: Provided always, that every person now having a right to vote in the election for any city or borough (except those enumerated in the said schedule A) in virtue of any other qualification than as a burgess or freeman, or as a freeman and liveryman, or, in the case of a city or town being a county of itself, as a freeholder or burgage tenant, as hereinbefore mentioned, shall retain such right of voting so long as he shall be qualified as an elector according to the usages and customs of such city or borough or any law now in force, and such person shall be entitled to vote in the election of a member or members to serve in any future Parliament for such city or borough, if duly registered according to the provisions hereinafter contained, &c.

The Redistribution of Seats Act 1885 (48 & 49 Vict. c. 23) provides:

Sect. 2. From and after the end of this present Parliament the Parliamentary boroughs named in the first part of the first schedule to this Act shall cease as boroughs to return any member. Each of the counties of cities and towns in the second part of the said schedule named shall, for the purpose of Parliamentary elections, be included in the county at large named opposite thereto in that part of the said schedule.

In the first part of the 1st schedule amongst the boroughs which are to cease as boroughs to return any member is the borough of Haverfordwest (district), in the county of Pembroke.

In part 2 of the 1st schedule it is said: "Each county of a city or of a town named below shall, for the purpose of Parliamentary elections, be included in the county at large placed opposite to it," and in this list the county of Haverfordwest is to be included in the county of Pembroke.

Sect. 7.—(1) From and after the end of this present Parliament each of the Parliamentary boroughs named in the fifth schedule to this Act shall, for all purposes of and relating to Parliamentary elections, include the places and be comprised within the boundaries which are respectively specified and described in the said schedule, and shall not include the places which are either therein specified and described as excluded, or are included by this Act in any other Parliamentary borough. (2) Where, by virtue of this section, any area is added to a borough being a county of a city or of a town in which freeholders are entitled to vote for the borough, that area shall, for all purposes of and relating to Parliamentary elections held after the end of this present Parliament, form part of the county of a city or town, and not of the county at large of which it has heretofore formed part.

In the 5th schedule referred to in sub-sect. 1 of this section, the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke is to include the present Parliamentary borough of Pembroke, and the places comprised in the area of the present Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest.

Sect. 11. The law relating to the elections for the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke shall apply as if the places comprised in the area of the present Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest were named in the Act of the session of the second and third years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter forty-five, as places sharing in the election of a member for Pembroke, and the borough shall be called Pembroke and Haverfordwest.

Sect. 17. Where a place in which the qualifying property of any voter is situate is changed from one Parliamentary area to another, then, on the occasion of the first registration of Parliamentary voters which takes place after the passing of this Act, such voter shall, as respects his right to have his name placed on the register and other rights of registration, whether arising out of successive occupation or the occupation of the same lodgings or otherwise, stand in the same position, so far as circumstances admit, in relation to the new area as he would have stood in if this Act had been in force before the commencement of the period of qualification, and such voter had acquired his rights under the law in force at such commencement as amended by this Act and the Representation of the People Act 1884, and so much of the register of voters existing at the passing of this Act as relates to the new area had been a register for the new area. A place shall be deemed to be changed from one Parliamentary area to another when it becomes part of a constituency of which it did not form part before the passing of this Act, &c.

Dickens, Q.C. (Lewis Coward with him) for the appellant.—The revising barrister was wrong in disallowing the appellant's vote. We start with this, that at the time of the passing of the Reform Act 1832 the town of Haverfordwest was a county of itself, and had the right to return a member of Parliament, and, being a county, freeholders therein had the right to vote in the election of that member. Then came the Reform Act 1832, and sect. 31 of that Act preserved the right of the freeholders in every city or town being a county of itself who then had the right to vote, to vote in the election for all future Parliaments. Haverfordwest comes under this section, as it was then a county of itself and its freeholders had the right to vote, and therefore by this section the right of those freeholders to vote is preserved. By the proviso at the end of the section this right of the freeholders to vote is also preserved so far as regards freehold tenements coming within the district of Haverfordwest which might be added to the town of Haverfordwest in pursuance of the Act. That is to say, the freeholder in Haverfordwest has his right reserved to him to vote in Haverfordwest, and he does not have it the less reserved to him if the election is for the larger area brought in under the Act. Then sect. 8 of the Act shows that Narberth and Fishguard are added to the county of the town of Haverfordwest, and the freeholders in those added districts share in the rights reserved to vote in the Haverfordwest district. Then by sect. 9 the boundaries of certain places are to be settled by an Act to be passed in the same session, and by the Parliamentary Boundaries Act 1832 (2 & 3 Will. 4, c. 64), sched. (O), No. 50, the boundaries of Haverfordwest district — comprising Haverfordwest, Fishguard, and Narberth — were settled and described. Then sect. 33 of the Act expressly recognises the right of the freeholder as such to vote in the city or town which is a county of itself; and in the proviso provides that, in the case of a city or town being a county of itself, every person who has the right to vote as a freeholder shall retain such right of voting, and be entitled to vote in any future elections, if he is duly registered. This applies to the Haverfordwest district, and the rights of the freeholders are thus preserved to vote as freeholders in future elections, as Haverfordwest was and still remained up to 1885 a county of itself. The Act contemplated that the electoral area might be larger than the original city or town, but it did not say that the freeholder was only entitled to vote for this city or town being a county of itself so long as the electoral area remained the same. Therefore it is clear that up to the passing of the Redistribution of Seats Act 1885 the freeholder had a right to vote in the Haverfordwest district. Coming to the Act of 1885, the construction of the Act ought to be in favour of the franchise, and if a person has already got a franchise there ought to be clear and express words before that franchise is taken away. There are no such express words in the Act of 1885 which take away the franchise which the appellant admittedly had before 1885. All that sect. 2 does is to say that the borough of Haverfordwest district is to cease as a separate borough and is to be included in the county of Pembroke at large. Then sect. 7 merely included the then existing borough of Haverfordwest in the borough of Pembroke, and it ought to be taken that it included it with all its franchises, including the freehold franchise, and sect. 11 creates the new borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest, and it is in this new borough that the present vote is claimed. That section is not against the appellant as it does not exclude this right. On the contrary, when taken in conjunction with the definition in sect. 24 of the "law relating to the Parliamentary elections," it seems to preserve the right. Sect. 31 of the Act of 1832 distinctly shows that if you have places sharing in the representation of Haverfordwest, those places are entitled to vote for the whole area. So, under sect. 11, if Haverfordwest shares with Pembroke it shares in the same way, retaining all its franchises. That section does not take away the right which had been preserved by an Act of Parliament; the words of it are not words of exclusion, but of inclusion, and those words of inclusion are not sufficient to exclude the right which had been already reserved. The voter has no less the right to vote for the city or town because the city or town forms part of a larger area. There is nothing in sect. 17 to take away the right, though we do not now rely on it.

Bray, Q.C. and S. G. Lushington, for the respondents, were not called upon to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is somewhat of a tangle until the sections are carefully examined; but when the sections are carefully examined I think the matter is reasonably clear, and that the decision of the revising barrister was right. The case is of importance because we are not dealing here only with the case of the personal claim to vote of this particular appellant, as it has been found by the revising barrister that the decision is to govern the cases of all voters whose names appear on, and of all persons claiming to have their names on, the list of Parliamentary electors in respect of freehold qualifications in certain parishes. Therefore, as was admitted by counsel for the appellant, this is a claim, if it be well founded, for freeholders in Haverfordwest and the two places of Narberth and Fishguard added to Haverfordwest under the Act of 1832, to claim in the borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest not an occupation vote, or not a vote subject to conditions of ordinary borough votes, but a freehold vote—that is to say, a vote in respect of the possession of freeholds. If the contention for the appellant is right, the freeholders of those two places Narberth and Fishguard would be entitled, as well as the freeholders in Haverfordwest itself, to vote in this borough, and it makes no difference that they may never have voted, as has been suggested. But for the purposes of this point I will deal with it as a claim of a freeholder who has acquired a freehold in Haverfordwest; and I only indicate it to show that there is an important question here beyond the question raised by this particular appellant. At the time of the passing of the Reform Act of 1832, Haverfordwest was a city or town which was a county of itself, and it is taken—and it is not disputed by the respondents—that the freeholders in that town or county of itself were entitled to vote. I assent to the argument for the appellant that the effect of the Act of 1832 and the provisions of sect. 31 read together with the provisions of sects. 8 and 9 and the schedules therein referred to was that freeholders in Haverfordwest were entitled to their vote as freeholders. And it seems to me that the effect of one proviso in sect. 31 was to bring in for the purposes of voting for the town or county of Haverfordwest those two districts, namely, Narberth and Fishguard—which counsel for the respondents now says never have claimed in the borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest a separate freehold vote—and to make those two districts part of the town or county of Haverfordwest being a county of itself. The proviso to that sect. 31 in my opinion makes it reasonably clear “that every freehold or burgage tenement which may be situate without the present limits of Haverfordwest”—putting in Haverfordwest instead of the words “any such city or town”—“being a county of itself, but within the limits of such city or town as the same shall be settled and described by the Act to be passed for that purpose as hereinbefore mentioned, shall confer the right of voting in the election of a member or members to serve in any future Parliament for such city or town in the same manner as if such freehold or burgage tenement were situate within the present limits thereof.” Therefore I assent to the view presented to us by counsel for the appellant that after the passing of the Act of 1832 the freeholders in Haverfordwest—and I should myself have thought certainly the freeholders in Narberth and Fishguard—were entitled to their vote by virtue of their freeholds. The important question in this case, as the revising barrister has indicated, is whether the rights are continued and saved by the Redistribution of Seats Act 1885, and if counsel for the appellant had shown us that either the Act is silent, or that the point has not been dealt with sufficiently to alter the character of Haverfordwest with the two additions to it under the Act of 1832, then I think he would have made good his point. But when we look at the Act of 1885, not only has the matter been dealt with, but I think it is reasonably clear that it was dealt with from the point of view of not preserving any longer to Haverfordwest the privileges which it would have had if it had remained a county of itself, and that Haverfordwest both for borough purposes and for county purposes has become part, as to the borough purposes of the borough of Pembroke and as to the county purposes of the county of Pembroke, for the purpose of a person entitled therein having a vote. I will now go through the sections of the Redistribution of Seats Act 1885, which are agreed to be material. First of all, sect. 2 says: “From and after the end of this present Parliament the Parliamentary boroughs named in the first part of the first schedule to this Act shall cease as boroughs to return any member. Each of the counties of cities and towns in the second part of the said schedule named shall, for the purpose of Parliamentary elections, be included in the county at large named opposite thereto in that part of the said schedule.” Again we find that Haverfordwest is in the second part, and therefore becomes part of the county of Pembroke for the purpose of whatever is given by its becoming part of the county. We now come to sect. 7, which, in my opinion, is, taken with sect. 11, the important and governing section. The 1st sub-section of sect. 7 is this: “From and after the end of this present Parliament each of the Parliamentary boroughs named in the fifth schedule to this Act shall for all purposes of and relating to Parliamentary elections include the places and be comprised within the boundaries which are respectively specified and described in the said schedule, and shall not include the places which are either therein specified and described as excluded, or are included by this Act in any other Parliamentary borough.” Then, when we turn to the 5th schedule, we find that the borough of Pembroke includes the present Parliamentary borough of Pembroke and the places comprised in the present Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest. Therefore, if there is nothing else, the effect of that legislation is to take the area which counsel for the appellant has described as having previously been the county of itself of Haverfordwest and to put it into the borough of Pembroke. Now, if it could be shown that the position of Haverfordwest as a county of itself was intended still to be maintained, or if, in other words, Pembroke had been added to the county of Haverfordwest in the same way as Narberth and Fishguard were added to it in the year 1832, I think the appellant's argument would be absolutely unanswerable. But, as far as I have gone, it seems to me reasonably clear that the language says that Haverfordwest shall be added to Pembroke, and not Pembroke added to Haverfordwest. But when I read on to sub-sect. 2 of the same section, I think it is clear that the point was not overlooked, but was intended to be dealt with in the cases where the state of things which counsel for the appellant has contended for did arise, because sub-sect. 2 says this:

JAMES (app.) v. IVEMEY AND ANOTHER (resps.).

Q.B. Div.] WILLIAMSON LIMITED (apps.) v. TIERNEY AND ANOTHER (resps.). [Q.B. Div.]

"Where, by virtue of this section, any area is added to a borough being a county of a city or of a town in which freeholders are entitled to vote for the borough, that area shall, for all purposes of and relating to Parliamentary elections held after the end of this present Parliament, form part of the county of a city or town, and not of the county at large of which it has heretofore formed part." As I have said, if it were true that on the facts Pembroke had been added to Haverfordwest, I think the appellant could then claim the benefit of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 7. Though it is not really necessary for our present purpose to know actually as a fact, yet I believe that there are towns still in the United Kingdom which, since this Act of 1885, have been counties in themselves, and to which sub-sect. 2 of sect. 7 applies. Whether I am right or not in that assumption and belief is immaterial, because it is quite clear that that was the case which the Act of Parliament contemplated. Now, in order to get rid of any difficulty as suggested that this case has been overlooked, this particular district was dealt with by the 2nd sub-section of sect. 11, which is as follows: "The law relating to the elections for the Parliamentary borough of Pembroke shall apply as if the places comprised in the area of the present Parliamentary borough of Haverfordwest were named in the Act of the session of the second and third years of the reign of King William the Fourth, chapter forty-five, as places sharing in the election of a member for Pembroke, and the borough shall be called Pembroke and Haverfordwest." In my opinion, to carry on the benefit to Haverfordwest it would at least have been necessary to say, "and the borough of Pembroke and Haverfordwest shall be deemed to be a county in itself"—words which we do not find. Whether that would have been necessary or not—and other words might have had the same effect—I am clearly of opinion that the effect of this legislation was to add Haverfordwest to Pembroke, and not to add Pembroke to the old borough of Haverfordwest, which was a county of itself. I think sect. 24 to which our attention was properly called by counsel for the appellant, shows that no limited meaning is to be put upon the words "the law relating to Parliamentary elections," because it is expressly said to include all the law respecting the qualifications and registration of voters. I agree with the contention for the appellant that sect. 17 does not tell against him; but I do not think it can be used in his favour. It was, in my opinion, a purely temporary section for the purpose of enabling any qualified voter to put together the qualifications that had arisen from the broken period in the borough when it was being abolished, and add it on to the qualification in point of time in the new borough or county, for it applies to both. I read it as a temporary section enabling the two broken periods of time to be put together. I will only say further that, of course, if the language had admitted of such a construction, I should not have hesitated to decide that freehold voters in this area could now acquire in this borough a vote which no other borough freeholder in other than boroughs which are counties of themselves could have obtained. In my judgment, when the sections are carefully examined, the difficulty which arises when considering the Reform Act of 1832 disappears, and I think the revising barrister in this case was perfectly right.

WILLS, J.—I am entirely of the same opinion, and, as my Lord has expressed what seems to me to be the leading considerations in the case, I wish to add only one remark. From a very early period in this argument for the appellant it has appeared to me that there was a fallacy underlying it from beginning to end, and that is that Pembroke was added to Haverfordwest, instead of Haverfordwest being added to Pembroke, which makes all the difference, because Haverfordwest was a county of itself and Pembroke was not.

WRIGHT, J.—I am of the same opinion.

WILLIAMSON LIMITED (apps.) v. TIERNEY AND ANOTHER (resps.). (a)

Merchandise marks—Watch—Parts imported from abroad—Finished in England—"English lever"—Merchandise Marks Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 28).

The appellants sold a watch for 2l. 5s. to which they applied the description "English lever."

Certain parts were imported into this country from abroad in a more or less unfinished state. The value of these parts in their rough condition, including the mainspring, hairspring, and certain screws, was 8d. The price of these parts when finished in England was estimated to be 4s. 5d. All these parts were dealt with in this country to enable them to go into a watch, and the watch was put together here.

The magistrate held that the imported parts were of foreign origin and of such importance that a description which failed to indicate them was a false description in a material respect, and that the finishing operations in this country were not of such a character as to destroy the characteristics of the foreign country in which they were made and produced.

He accordingly convicted the appellants of applying a false trade description to the watch.

Held, on remitting the case to the magistrate, that if he had come to this conclusion as one of fact on the evidence, and had simply stated the case to determine whether there was anything in point of law to prevent him coming to such conclusion, the court would not disturb his decision; but that if he decided upon the view that the inclusion of certain parts partly manufactured abroad compelled him as a matter of law to hold that "English" was a false description, then his decision could not be supported.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondents against the appellants for that they, the appellants, did on the 4th Oct. 1899, at 81, Farringdon-road, London, unlawfully and with intent to defraud, sell certain goods, to wit, a certain watch numbered 22,889, to which had been applied a false trade description whereby the goods were falsely described as made in England contrary to the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act 1887.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

It was proved upon the hearing of the information that the appellants on the 4th Oct. 1899 sold the watch numbered 22,889, at 81, Farringdon-road, London, to the respondents for 2*l.* 5*s.*, the wholesale selling price of the watch as an English watch.

The watch was inclosed in a watchcase made of silver of the value of 7*s.* or 7*s.* 6*d.* marked with an English hall-mark, and there was no other indication of the place of origin of the watch.

The watch, as distinct from the watchcase, consisted of eighty-nine portions, put together by means of forty six screws. These parts, with the exception of the main and hair springs, are set out by name in two columns marked respectively 1 and 2 in the schedule hereto.

The parts named in column 1 of the schedule, except the ruby, were all presumably of English material, manufactured from the raw material, completed to the finished state fit to put in a watch, the whole of the operations being performed in the appellants' manufactory in Coventry, or by outworkers in this country in the employment of the appellants.

The parts named in column 2 were all imported into this country from abroad in a more or less unfinished state, manufactured in Switzerland according to the orders of and after patterns supplied by the appellants, but each and all of these parts underwent certain operations in the appellants' factory to render them fit—and which did render them fit in their finished state to go into the watch 22,889. The value of these parts in their rough condition, including the value of the hairspring, mainspring, and screws when imported, was 8*d.* The price of the parts in their finished condition after the completion of the operations in the appellants' factory was estimated to be 4*s.* 5*d.*, but the exact value of all the parts of the watch and their cost of production were not proved so as to enable a perfectly satisfactory comparison to be made.

The mainspring and hairspring were of foreign manufacture and imported into this country in a finished state, so far as being finished springs is concerned, though not fit to place in a watch, but they were mounted and adjusted in this country so as to work accurately with the other parts. The screws were imported into this country from abroad in a more or less unfinished condition, and after operations and processes performed upon them in this country were rendered fit for placing in the watch. But it was proved to be a recognised practice universally known in the trade that in all watches (except the most complicated and expensive) the mainspring, hairspring, and screws were commonly of foreign manufacture, and that the presence of such foreign springs and screws does not affect the character of the watch as a whole so as to render it false to describe such watch as English.

The whole of the parts of the watch were adjusted and fitted together and placed in the watchcase in the appellants' manufactory at Coventry.

There was no indication that any part of watch 22,889 had been produced or had come from any foreign country.

It was contended by counsel for the appellants that the watch 22,889 was an English watch; that except the hairspring and mainspring, which are almost universally, and the screws which are commonly, of foreign manufacture, no portion of the watch was or could properly be described as a foreign part; that the watch never became a watch until all the parts set out in columns 1 and 2 of the schedule, together with the hairspring and mainspring, were fitted together and adjusted into their proper positions, and that the watch 22,889 being made of certain unfinished (and or) immaterial foreign parts and English parts, fitted together and adjusted in this country was properly described as an English watch.

The magistrate adjudged and determined that the parts mentioned in column 2 of the schedule hereto were of foreign origin and of such importance that a description which failed to indicate them was a false description in a material respect, and that the finishing operations which they underwent in this country were not of such a character as to destroy the characteristics of the foreign country in which they were made and produced, and in consequence thereof the watch 22,889 was a partly foreign watch, and was a watch to which a false trade description was applied, and he accordingly convicted the appellants.

The grounds upon which he based his findings are set out in the judgment which he delivered in this prosecution, and is set out below.

The question upon which the opinion of the court is desired is whether the magistrate, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct decision in point of law in holding that the parts mentioned in column 2 of the schedule were of foreign make, production, or manufacture, and of sufficient importance as to affect the character of the watch, and that the watch numbered 22,889 was not an English watch, but was a partly foreign watch to which a false trade description was applied, and if not what should be done in the premises.

SCHEDULE.—Column 1.—Third wheel, fourth wheel and pinion, escape wheel, pallet, pallet staff, steel barrel wheel, cannon pinion, hour wheel, minute wheel, index, click, stud, hour hand, minute hand, second hand, balance, pillar plate, balance cock, escape cock, top plate, jewelling, barrel, lever, roller and ruby pin, dial, keyless bar, return spring, washer, bevel wheel, wind-up side wheel, set hands side wheel, click spring. Column 2.—Centre wheel and pinion, pinion of the escape wheel, balance staff, barrel arbor, pinion of the minute wheel, barrel piece.

Three other cases were stated on informations relating to other watches of a different make. The only variance in those cases from the one set out above related to the number of pieces of the watch imported in an unfinished state from abroad.

The judgment of the learned magistrate was as follows:

In this case I find that the defendants have been guilty of applying a false description as to the place or country in which the watches A, B, C, and D, were made or produced. It is not disputed that the watches in question did contain several parts of foreign manufacture, and that they were sold as English lever watches with the English hall-mark upon them. The question for me to determine is whether the trade description is false in a material respect, and after giving the matter my best consideration I have come to the conclusion that it is. The defendants have acted deliberately in what they have done, and seem to have considered the question whether they were justified or not in importing the foreign parts which they have used in their watches. They contend that they have not exceeded the limits which are allowed by the statute and the custom of the watch trade. In my opinion they have exceeded these limits, and it is somewhat significant that since the summons was taken out new machinery has been introduced into their factory by the defendants to manufacture in England those parts which were previously imported from Switzerland. The question of materiality is no doubt one of degree, but it is one upon which the evidence of experts is of importance, and that evidence in this case appears to be almost entirely in favour of the prosecution. The defendants did not call a single witness who was unconnected with their own business to say that in their opinion the foreign parts used by the defendants were so immaterial that they might be disregarded in the description. The relative cost of the foreign parts to the cost of the whole watch is an element of some importance in determining the materiality, but the defendants did not call the best evidence upon this point, and I am bound to assume that they refrained from calling it advisedly. It was admitted by Mr. Tucker that the train is a most essential part of a watch, and that the train in each of these watches, consisting of at least three wheels and four pinions, was of foreign origin, in addition to several other parts of greater or less importance. It would, in my opinion, reduce the Act to an absurdity if I were to hold that such parts were not material to the correct description of a watch, in the same way as screws or the dial might be considered immaterial. It was contended for the defendants that the train and other foreign parts used in these watches were on the same footing as the mainspring and hairspring, which are nearly always of foreign origin in what are honestly called English watches. I think they are not on the same footing, because by the custom of the watch trade the main and hair springs are known and allowed to be of foreign origin in nearly every watch, so that no trader could be deceived by their not being taken into account in the description. It was further urged for the defendants that these foreign parts need not be considered in the description, because they were imported in the rough and had to be shaped, polished and fitted in this country. That plan was deliberately adopted by the defendants for some reason which they have not disclosed. The evidence is that the imported parts were made in Switzerland in accordance with the defendants' order, and in my opinion they were essentially made or produced in Switzerland, and that the place of origin was not altered by the fact that they had more or less of work done upon them in England before they fitted into the watch. The orders sent to Switzerland were not produced by the defendants. It was contended by Mr. Moulton, on the authority of Bischof v. Toler (73 L. T. Rep. 402; 18 Cox C. C. 199), that a watch was not made or produced until all its parts were put together, in the same way as the materials which, compounded together, made the product known as le Dansk, in that case. In my opinion there is a real distinction between a mechanical combination in which all the parts remain unaltered and a chemical combination in which the several parts are lost in the whole composition. Mr. Moulton was not inclined to quarrel with the decision of Mr. Horace Smith in the Raymond movement case, in which a seller was convicted for selling as English a watch which had a French movement, and yet the movement is only part of the watch, although no doubt the most important part. Lastly, as to motive, the onus of proving innocent intention is thrown upon the defendants, and by not calling Mr. Errington they have failed to bring before me any satisfactory evidence to account for their conduct. They have, it is true, frankly acknowledged what they have done, and I think were justified in having the question brought to a test which will affect my decision on the question of costs. In regard to the watches seized as similar to A, B, C, and D, I can only go by what Mr. Tucker and Mr. Hewitt have told me, and I believe that they were given up as being similar to those found fault with by Mr. Hewitt. If a mistake was made in so doing, the defendants should have an opportunity of correcting that mistake. My order is that the defendants be fined 20*l.* and pay 10*l.* costs, and that the watches in court be confiscated, except such as the defendants may prove to the satisfaction of an independent expert not to contain foreign parts similar to those in A, B, C, or D, such expert to be agreed upon by the parties, or, failing agreement, to be appointed by myself.

Moulton, Q.C. and Lewis Thomas for the appellants.—The representation in this case referred to the completed watch, and was not a representation that each and every part was completely manufactured in England. The watch as a watch was English, and the fact that some of the parts were sent from abroad in an incomplete state, and useless to be used in the watch until worked upon in England, cannot make any difference. It would have been a false representation had the watch been described as Swiss. That was decided in Bischof v. Toler (73 L. T. Rep. 402; 18 Cox C. C. 199). The magistrate was therefore wrong in convicting.

Lawson Walton, Q.U., Bodkin, and Maurice Hill, for the respondents.—The conviction is right. The question whether the trade description of the watch as English was true was a question of fact for the magistrate. He said that the description "English watch" would imply that the watch was of English design, or English workmanship, made substantially of English materials. The proper description of the watch in question is an "Anglo-Swiss" watch. A watch is not English because it is put together in England. An article is made where its material and characteristic parts are made. It was held in Kirshenboim v. Salmon and Gluckstein (78 L. T. Rep. 658; (1898) 2 Q. B. 19) that, as "false trade description" in sect. 3 of the Merchandise Marks Act 1887 "means a trade description which is false in a material respect as regards the goods to which it is applied," calling machine-made cigarettes hand-made cigarettes is an offence, although they were of equally good quality. Bischof v. Toler (sup.) is in our favour when the whole facts of the case are looked at.

Dec. 19.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—These are appeals from the decision of Mr. Chapman, Metropolitan Police Magistrate, upon four informations preferred against the appellants alleging that they unlawfully and with intent to defraud sold certain watches to which had been applied a false trade description, contrary to the provisions of the Merchandise Marks Act 1887. The questions raised are of very considerable importance. The alleged false description was that the watches were sold under the name "English lever" and were inclosed in cases with an English hall mark. From the facts stated in the case it appears that certain parts of the watch varying in number and importance had been manufactured in a more or less unfinished state according to the orders and patterns of the appellants, and that when they were received in this country they were not fit to place in a watch and had to be mounted and adjusted so as to work accurately with the other parts of the watch, which were made throughout in England. The adjustment of every part of the watch and its fitting together took place at the appellants' factory at Coventry. We have carefully considered the case, and we have arrived at the opinion that the case should go back to the learned magistrate to be restated on one distinct and important point. It appears to us that we ought not to deal finally with the case without ascertaining from a more explicit statement than appears in the case at present whether the magistrate has held as a matter of law that, because some parts of the watch other than the mainspring, hairspring, and screws were partly manufactured abroad, he was bound to convict the appellants of applying in the term "English lever" a false description; or whether he has arrived at his conclusion as a determination of fact upon evidence, by which we mean evidence, if any, as to a recognised meaning of the epithet "English" as applied to watches in the watch trade, or any other facts proved before him, and showing or tending to show what the term "English" as applied to such watches is understood to connote, as well as the nature of the parts, their importance, and the degree of foreign skill and labour employed in them. If his conclusion is one of fact, and if the question he intended to raise upon this part of the case is whether or not there was anything in point of law to prevent his coming to this conclusion upon the evidence, we are agreed that he dealt with the case rightly, and that we could not disturb his decision. If, on the other hand, he has decided against the appellants upon a view that the mere fact of the inclusion in the watch of certain parts which have been partly manufactured in a foreign country obliged him necessarily as a matter of law to hold that the description "English" was false, we are also agreed that the decision could not be supported. In order, as I have said, to ascertain this to the satisfaction of the court we are of opinion that the case should be sent back so that the point of doubt may be clearly settled. We have only to add that in our view the appellants' contention that the conviction should be quashed upon the ground that the article sold was a watch, and that the watch never existed until the component parts were put together in England, goes too far and cannot be sustained. It would include a case in which all the parts of a watch were made abroad and brought from abroad in a condition to be put together, and the only thing done in England was the actual putting of them together.

Case remitted to magistrate.

REG. v. COCKERTON; Ex parte HAMILTON AND OTHERS. (a)

Education—London School Board—Power to make payments out of the rates—Science and art schools or classes in day schools and evening continuation schools—Legality—Elementary Education Acts 1870-1891—Technical Instruction Acts 1889-1891—Education Code (1890) Act 1890.

The London School Board have no power to provide at the expense of the ratepayers science and art schools and classes in day schools.

The only education contemplated by the Education Acts is the education of children, and so the teaching of adults must not be defrayed out of the rates.

Inasmuch as science and art schools and classes must, according to the "Directory" published by the Science and Art Department, be carried on in day classes, the question of the power of the board to carry on such schools and classes in evening schools cannot arise.

Science and art classes in evening continuation schools are as much beyond the scope of rate-aided education as in day schools.

Semble, that, by sect. 13 of the Elementary Education Act 1873, there is no objection to any school board expending money, arising from subscriptions or donations, in teaching adults and in other teaching, outside the range of what ought to fall upon the rates, provided that it does not expend any money out of the rates towards such teaching.

CAUSE shown on behalf of T. B. Cockerton, the auditor appointed under the Elementary Education Act 1870, to audit the accounts of the School Board for London against a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash certificates, made by him in regard to the accounts of the board, of disallowances and surcharges of three separate sums which had been expended upon the maintenance of classes registered under the Science and Art Department.

The applicants for the certiorari were three members of the School Board for London.

The total expenditure of the board for the half-year ending the 29th Sept. 1898, amounted to 1,582,504*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.* out of which a considerable sum represented expenditure incurred by the board in connection with day and evening science and art schools and classes and schools of science maintained and registered under the Science and Art Department.

The auditor disallowed seven separate sums, selected as representative or test items, entered and charged in the accounts of the board for the half-year as being payments illegally made out of the funds of the board, and surcharged those sums upon members of the board.

Three of the sums selected by the board for the purpose of this case were surcharged upon the applicants respectively.

All the above-mentioned three sums, the payment of which had been disallowed, were paid out of the school fund of the board referred to in sect. 53 of the Elementary Education Act 1870.

The three sums were expended in maintaining and keeping efficient science and art schools and classes which were held in buildings provided and maintained by the board.

The first was a sum of 32*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* paid for salary to a drawing instructor who was appointed instructor in drawing by a resolution of the board dated the 28th March 1889, and it was provided that he should give the whole of his time to the work at a salary of 300*l.* per annum, rising by annual increases to a maximum of 350*l.* per annum. The principal part of his time was given to the supervision of drawing in accordance with the code of regulations for day schools under the Education Department. Among the classes and schools so supervised by him were art schools and classes under the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council on Education.

A directory published by this department contained the provisions under which these schools and classes were carried out.

The second of the three sums was 4*l.* paid for special instruction in chemistry at science class No. 7229, held at M.-street Evening Continuation Schools.

The instructor was appointed by a resolution of the board dated the 21st Oct. 1897. Under that resolution he taught theoretical and practical chemistry in evening schools. A large part of his duty was to supervise the science classes held in day schools and evening continuation schools.

The third sum was 58*l.* paid to the Polytechnic for science and art papers and as the remuneration for the services of the local secretary of the Polytechnic in conducting science and art examinations, held in accordance with clause XX. of the directory of the Department of Science and Art.

The remaining four sums were the subject of appeals to the Local Government Board by the persons aggrieved by the disallowances and surcharges thereof, and were not included in the present rule.

The questions for the decision of the court were: (1) Whether it was within the powers of the board, as a statutory corporation to provide science and art schools or classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools; (2) Whether it was lawful for them to pay the expenses of maintaining these schools or classes out of the school board rate or school fund; (3) Whether the rule should be made absolute in regard to any and which of the disallowances and surcharges.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, Q.C.) and Sutton showed cause on behalf of the auditor. —The procedure to be followed in the audit is set forth in sect. 60 of the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75). Sub-sect. 6 brings in the remedy allowed by 7 & 8 Vict. c. 101, ss. 32 and 33. Three items only are the subject of this rule; the others have been referred to the Local Government Board. The question is, whether under the present law the expenditure of money out of the rates by the school board upon teaching the subjects comprised in the curriculum of the Science and Art Department, as set forth in their directory, is an expenditure authorised by the Legislature. That question depends upon the Elementary Education Acts of 1870, 1873, 1876, 1890, and 1891, and upon the Technical Instruction Acts of 1889 and 1891. Our contention is that the Elementary Education Acts relate only to the elementary teaching of certain subjects, and that what is authorised to be taught under the Technical Instruction Acts is something quite different. By sect. 3 of the Elementary Education Act 1870 the term "elementary school" means "a school or a department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given," and by sect. 5 of the same Act elementary schools are to be provided available for all children "for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision is not otherwise made. They referred to

Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75);

Elementary Education Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86);

Elementary Education Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 79);

Technical Instruction Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 76);

Education Code (1890) Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 22);

Technical Instruction Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 4);

Elementary Education Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 56);

The result of all these Acts is to show that the Legislature has only authorised the teaching in board schools of elementary education. At what point education ceases to be elementary it is difficult to say, but, at any rate, the education given in the science and art classes goes beyond the limits of elementary education; and this education also goes beyond what was comprised in the code of regulations issued by the Education Department for day schools and for evening continuation schools. The day school and evening continuation school codes contain the maximum of what may be taught in the elementary schools. The question is how far the school board has been allowed by all these statutes to apply the rates for any purpose other than elementary education. The school board has power under sect. 13 of the Elementary Education Act 1873 to accept gifts for educational purposes, but due regard should be had to the proviso of that section. We submit that, taking all the provisions of the Acts into consideration, the rates may only be used for elementary education, and it is impossible to say that the limits of the present classes are within the bounds of elementary education.

Lord Robert Cecil, Q.C. and Hon. M. M. Macnaghten showed cause on behalf of the Camden School.

Danckwerts, Q.C. and Lochnis showed cause on behalf of the Corporation of the City of London.

Asquith, Q.C. and Llewelyn Davies in support of the rule.—The whole question here depends upon the construction to be placed on the definition of "elementary school" given in sect. 3 of the Act of 1870. There is no definition of "elementary education." It is true that elementary education was defined in reference to the duty of a parent towards his child. For that purpose it was defined to include "reading, writing, and arithmetic." But when dealing with the powers of the school board the Legislature purposely abstained from defining the term. The term is flexible, and no fetter is placed upon the authorities appointed to administer the Act. The term may mean "the three R.'s" or it may be confined to the subjects mentioned in the codes or only to those which were obligatory, or it may extend to all subjects taught through both the Education Departments. The Legislature has, however, defined elementary school as "A school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given." That is to say, not the education given to each child but at the school. Therefore, where at a school in which the principal part of the education given is elementary education, that school is within the Act of 1870, and, provided it conforms to the other conditions of the Act, it is one which a school board has power to carry on and maintain out of the rates. With regard to evening schools the case was even stronger, because the restriction that the principal education taught there must be elementary has been removed. The only limitation on teaching advanced subjects is that the school must essentially teach elementary subjects. Otherwise you cannot go to the rates. The code has nothing to do with the matter. Statutory recognition is to be found of this power existing in the school board. They referred to Technical Instruction Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 4), s. 1 (1). If this was not so these provisions would be meaningless.

Dec. 20.—WILLS, J.—The concrete question we have to determine is whether certain items in the account of the London School Board have been properly disallowed by the auditor. It is common ground that such a question involves an inquiry whether the expense of maintaining either schools or classes of science and art in which the teaching follows the lines laid down by the Science and Art Department in its "directory" as distinguished from those laid down by the Education Department in its code, can be thrown upon the rates by which the board schools are maintained or assisted. The latter question is not, in my opinion, and for reasons which will hereafter appear, exhaustive, but it may be usefully dealt with in the first instance. It will be convenient, and indeed necessary, to preface a description of the Acts of Parliament the construction of which is involved, by a short statement as to the constitution and functions of the two departments. The Education Department means in the phraseology of the first Elementary Education Act, and of every other Act unless the contrary intention appears (52 & 53 Vict. c. 63, s. 12), which it never does, "The Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education." It is a department of Government having offices at Whitehall and exercising a number of definite functions. It was, in fact, a Government office for the conduct of which the Lord President of the Privy Council was the Minister responsible to Parliament; and for many years before 1870 Parliament had annually allotted to it in the Appropriation Acts large sums of money for the promotion of public education to be distributed under rules framed by the department. The distribution took the form of grants made to schools carried on otherwise than for profit. The Science and Art Department was also a branch of the establishment of the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, and separate grants were made to it which were similarly distributed under its regulations to schools and institutions not for private profit where science or art was taught. It is described as having then been "a department of the Government established for the promotion of science and art, and being under the superintendence of the Lord President of the Privy Council and the Vice-President of the Committee on Education of the Privy Council," but in the year 1864, by a Royal Charter, from the recitals in which the foregoing description is taken, the Lord President of the Privy Council for the time being, and the Vice-President of the Committee on Education for the time being were constituted a body corporate with perpetual succession, a common seal, &c., under the name of the Department of Science and Art. And, therefore, in 1870, the two departments, though having no doubt a common policy, were essentially distinct, and it is only in popular language that they can be described as branches of the same administration. The Science and Art Department has for very many years had its offices and its seat of administration at South Kensington. The forms which the grants assumed in the Appropriation Acts were generally "for public education in Great Britain" and "to defray the expenses of the general management of the Department of Science and Art of the schools throughout the kingdom in connection with that department, and of the Geological Survey of Great Britain and Ireland." The same language was used in the Appropriation Act of 1864, which received the Royal Assent three months later than the date of charter of incorporation of the Science and Art Department. In 1865 the two grants were: (1) "For public education in Great Britain"; (2) "for the general management of the Department of Science and Art and of the establishments connected therewith." In 1867 the first vote was described as "for public education in England and Wales, including the expenses of the Education Office in London. In 1868 the second vote was described as "for the salaries and expenses of the Department of Science and Art and of the establishments connected therewith," and since these respective dates practically the same designations have been used in every Appropriation Act down to the present time. The departments were, therefore, in 1870 separate in name, separate in habitation, separate in constitution, and separately intrusted with public funds to be administered by each department independently of the other. Each has from time to time published its own prospectus and laid down for itself the conditions under which it would make grants from the annual vote to schools and institutions engaged in teaching. For the sake, I presume, of avoiding confusion, the Education or Whitehall Department has called its syllabus of conditions "the code." The analogous publication of the Science and Art or South Kensington Department has been called "the directory." A comparison of the code and directory now in force shows that the code deals with many subjects not embraced in the directory and with an education much less advanced in the subjects common to both than those dealt with by the directory. To some extent the course of study with which the Whitehall establishment is concerned in the common subjects may overlap

the lower portions of the South Kensington scheme, but the broad distinction remains that the South Kensington curriculum, while narrower than the Whitehall scheme, is of a much more advanced character. South Kensington makes grants substantially larger than Whitehall, and the extreme limit of the teaching which it aims at encouraging reaches a very high standard and extends into the higher mathematics, into chemistry of a very advanced character, both theoretical and practical, into hygiene, geology, physiography, and a multitude of subjects in the domain of science which are carried as far as might well suffice to give a successful student a high place in a Tripos or in the honour list of most of our Universities. The department aims at the encouragement of what it calls science schools and science classes as well as schools of science. A school of science is an establishment with all the necessary appliances for a complete and methodical scientific education adapted for students whose education is such as would fit them to enter standard 7 of the code (see directory, arts. 56, 57, and passim.) No definition is given of science schools and science classes, but they are at all events schools or classes of the South Kensington as distinguished from the Whitehall type, and giving instruction in the subjects which they may happen to teach, aiming at the South Kensington standard and intended to earn the South Kensington grant. The Act upon the provisions of which the present questions chiefly turn is the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75). By sect. 5, where in any school district (as defined by the Act) there is not a sufficient amount of public school accommodation in public elementary schools, in the Act referred to as "public school accommodation," available for all the children resident in such district for whose elementary education provision is not otherwise supplied, the deficiency shall be supplied in manner provided by the Act—that is to say, by the creation of a school board and the establishment of board schools. By sect. 19 the school board may, for the purpose of providing sufficient "public school accommodation" provide schoolhouses and supply everything necessary for the efficiency of the schools provided by them. By sect. 53 the expenses of the school board shall be paid out of the school fund, which is to consist of fees from scholars, money provided by Parliament or raised by loan or in any manner whatsoever by the school board, and any deficiency is to be made up out of the rates to be raised as provided by the Act. The condition, therefore, of the existence of a school board, other than the School Board for London, is the want of proper provision by the existing schools for the elementary education of all the children in the district; and in determining the question whether such deficiency exists, the Education Department is to take into consideration every school in the neighbourhood which gives efficient elementary education to the children in the district. The School Board for London was constituted by sect. 37 of the Act without such inquiry, it being assumed, apparently, that there was no need of it. The board is directed to "supply their district with sufficient public school accommodation" (defined in sect. 8), which is exactly what any other school board has to do, and I cannot find in the Act any trace of any difference between the powers and duties of the School Board for London and those of any other school board. Wherever the deficiency does exist it is to be supplied by accommodation in public elementary schools as therein defined. This throws us upon sect. 7, which enacts that every elementary school which is conducted in accordance with the regulations that follow shall be a public elementary school. I pause here to say that in sect. 2 an elementary school is defined as meaning "a school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given," so that sect. 7 says that every school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given shall be a public elementary school if it conforms to the regulations therein contained, and as a board school by sect. 14 must be a public elementary school, it follows that it must be conducted in accordance with those regulations. The only regulation that is material here is that it shall be conducted in accordance with the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain an annual Parliamentary grant (sub-sect. 4). A Parliamentary grant means (by sect. 2) a grant made in aid of an elementary school out of moneys provided by Parliament for the civil service, entitled "for public education in Great Britain," which, as I have shown, is always a distinct thing from the grant to the Science and Art Department, and is the fund which, from its establishment, has been administered by the Whitehall Education Department. The conditions in question, by sect. 97, shall be those contained in the minutes of the Education Department for the time being—i.e., in the present case the code of 1898. That code provides for certain subjects as obligatory, and, unless they are taught to the satisfaction of the Department, no grant can be obtained. Additional grants can be earned by efficient teaching in the other subjects mentioned as optional, the grant being so much per head in respect of scholars showing a certain proficiency. The board school, therefore, under the Act of 1870, must be one in which the principal part of the education is elementary, and, as the school board cannot come into existence unless there is a deficiency in the provision in the district for elementary education, it might very well have been enacted that the education to be provided out of the rates should be elementary only. Indeed, such would have been the natural conclusion had not a contrary intention appeared. I think, however, that it does appear. The definition of "elementary school" is not that it shall include a school at which the principal part of the education is elementary, but that it means such a school; and I do not see how any other conclusion can be arrived at than that the board schools may go beyond mere elementary education if the school board be so minded. It is quite clear to my mind that they are under no obligation to go beyond the subjects and the amount of education required by the Education Code in order to earn a Parliamentary grant. The extent of this obligatory teaching, though a varying quantity, has always been extremely moderate. But I see no indication of anything like a definite superior limit to what may be taught except in so far as such a limitation is involved in the proposition which I hope in due course to make clear—viz., that the only education contemplated by the Act

[Q.B. Div.]

REG. v. COCKERTON; Ex parte HAMILTON AND OTHERS.

as within the province of the school boards is education for children. I think there was good reason for the abstention in the Act from any provisions for a superior limit. The work of the Education Department in 1870 and for some two or three years later had very modest aims, and did not go beyond reading, writing, and arithmetic. No doubt the general standard of primary education was then extremely low. It must have been evident to everyone that if reading, writing, and arithmetic were properly taught there would soon be a great many children who, if they were to be taught anything fresh during their childhood, must learn something beyond that restricted range of instruction, and that there would certainly be exceptional children who would go far beyond it. The code at that time provided for no grants for any instruction beyond what have been called the three R's. I cannot believe for a moment that it ever was intended that in board schools nothing beyond the very low standard to which alone elementary education as then understood had reached should be aimed at by the board schools. The legislation is general. It applies alike to board schools and to schools—not for private profit—maintained out of endowments or by voluntary contributions. Neither the Acts nor the codes are confined to either voluntary or board schools. A great deal of confusion and misunderstanding has, I think, arisen from a failure to appreciate this cardinal fact, and the most extravagant arguments have been founded upon the use of expressions of a general character and intended to apply to all elementary schools (as defined by the Act) and upon the application of them as if board schools were the only schools with which they dealt. It seems to me, therefore, that so long as the board school is devoted principally to elementary education there is not only no provision, express or implied, that the instruction shall not go beyond it, but a distinct intimation that it may, and that the only condition expressly imposed as to the quantum of education is that it must at least come up to the lowest standard required in order to obtain a Parliamentary grant—i.e., must satisfactorily teach the obligatory subjects. Such subjects must almost necessarily form the principal part of the instruction to be administered in a board school which admits children from five years of age upwards, and to which children from five till fourteen can be compelled to go. The higher the age the fewer the children, inasmuch as every child of ten or twelve must have been a child of five, whereas it is not every child of five who lives to be ten or twelve. There is, however, as it appears to me a very important and a very reasonable practical limit imposed on the education to be given at board schools. From first to last the whole series of Acts relating to this subject, which are invariably designated as the Elementary Education Acts, deal with children. No definition is given of "elementary education," which is obviously a term that may shift with the growth of general instruction and attainment. The code, however, in many instances, draws a line, in dealing with subjects for which grants may be made, between the elementary and advanced stages, but such division affects only the amount of the grants, and has really no bearing at all upon any question involved in the present case. Except for the purposes of one Act, dealing with compulsory attendance, no definition has been given of "child." It is impossible to lay down any definite boundary as separating "children" from young men or young women, or any other description by which an advance beyond childhood may be indicated. Practically I suppose that at somewhere between sixteen and seventeen at the highest, an age has been arrived at which no one would ordinarily call childhood. It seems to me that as far as mere quantum is concerned, any education suitable for a child may be given by the school board, but that the one condition must always be fulfilled by the school—viz., that it is conducted in accordance with the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain a Parliamentary grant, which by the interpretation clause means the Whitehall grant. I think the clear intention of Parliament was to place the elementary schools under the sole administration of Whitehall. South Kensington is never alluded to. The code at one time placed one of its subjects—drawing—under the Science and Art Department, but always with the proviso that the grant would come from that department. Of course, there was nothing to prevent either department from making or withholding a grant upon any terms not inconsistent with the Acts which it chose to impose, but that has absolutely nothing to do with what the public elementary school may, or may not, do. That depends entirely upon the Act of Parliament, which meant, I think, to give to public elementary schools of every sort the same rights and to subject them to the same control. And I think sect. 7, sub-sect. 4, meant to place them all under the control of Whitehall, and to say that all must teach what Whitehall laid down as obligatory in order to get a grant, and that in regard to instruction outside that narrow area, if and in so far as it was given, it was to follow the rules of the Whitehall Code, whatever they might be, from time to time. I have dealt at considerable length upon the Act of 1870, because I believe that it strikes the keynote of all the subsequent legislation on this subject. Between 1870 and 1893 no fewer than nine Acts supplementary to the principal Act were passed, and in every Act the same phraseology is kept up, and in the last of them (the Elementary Education (School Attendance) Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 51) the whole of the preceding Acts are styled "The Elementary Education Acts 1870 to 1891." In 1873 an Act was passed (36 & 37 Vict. c. 86) under which a school board was enabled, with certain exceptions not material, to accept and administer any educational trust or endowment. It was provided sect. 13 (2) that any school connected with such a trust or endowment shall be deemed to be a school provided by the school board—in other words, a board school. But then follows the significant qualification that nothing in that section shall authorise the school board to expend any money out of the school rate for any purpose other than elementary education. That is to say, no additional burden was to be thrown on the rates in order to carry out the objects of the trust or endowment. The same Act, in sect. 22, refers to "registers and other books and documents containing information with respect to the attendance of children" at the board school, and sects. 24 and

25 contain various other provisions with regard to the attendance of children. The Act of 1876 enacts that it shall be the duty of the parent of every child to cause such child to receive elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and is full of provisions about "children" attending the school. Further control in respect to the degrees of instruction and efficiency required to obtain certificates of exemption from attendance at school is given to the Education Department by sect. 24, thus enabling them to raise the standard from time to time. A child is defined to mean in this Act a person between five and fourteen (sect. 48). The only place in which the word "scholars" and not "children" is used is in a section which refers to schools that are not board schools (the third paragraph of sect. 48). The next important Act was that of 1891, which abolished school fees for children between three and fifteen. It appears, I think, to assume that there may be children over fifteen years of age attending the board schools, but I can find no phrase or expression indicating that anything but children were contemplated. Stress has been laid upon the use of the word "scholars" (and not "children") in sect. 8, which provides that nothing in sect. 17 of the Act of 1870 shall prevent a school board from admitting scholars to any school provided by the board without requiring a fee, as if it indicated that the Acts referred to scholars who are not children. But inasmuch as sect. 17 applies to children, and children only, there is absolutely nothing in this argument. The two passages just referred to are the only ones in the whole series in which the pupils are referred to otherwise than as children. The Act of 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 51) simply raises the age under which a child cannot be employed except under a certificate of exemption from ten to eleven. Reference has been made in the course of the argument to the Technical Instruction Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 76), but, as it relates entirely to schools to be established and maintained by various local authorities, the enumeration of which excludes school boards, and the only Parliamentary grant contemplated by it is one by the Science and Art Department, its bearing upon the present question is so extremely remote that it is not worth serious consideration. Sect. 1 (a) says in effect that the local authority shall not supply or aid the supply of technical or manual instruction to scholars receiving instruction at an elementary school in the obligatory or standard subjects prescribed by the minutes of the Education Department. Another clause—sect. 1 (3)—says that nothing in the Act shall be construed so as to interfere with any existing powers of school boards with respect to the provision of technical and manual instruction. But in the first place I suppose that it never would have entered into anyone's head to doubt that some technical and manual instruction may properly fall within elementary education, and, further, such instruction had by that time found its way into the code. In my opinion, therefore the board schools can provide instruction more than elementary so long as it is for children, but are placed expressly under the Whitehall Department, and in so far as they teach either elementary or advanced subjects must conform to the Whitehall Code. It follows that they have no statutory authority to do more, and, therefore, if they do go substantially beyond it, must not spend the ratepayers' money upon the excess. In so far as, while following the Whitehall Code, they may be able to earn the South Kensington grants, I see nothing in the Acts to prevent them from doing so, but, as far as I can gather the facts from the very obscure case in which they are stated, the money expended upon science schools and science classes in respect of which the disallowances were made by the auditor were those which were incurred by teaching the South Kensington subjects in accordance with the South Kensington Directory. So far what I have said applies equally to day schools and evening schools. Before I proceed to deal specially with the evening schools I think it may be useful to trace succinctly the course of action which has been followed by the Education Department. By the courtesy of the Education Department I have been able to see the whole of the codes from 1870 to 1898, and the following summary may be relied upon as accurate, though it does not profess to be absolutely exhaustive. Down to and including 1891 there was one code embracing both day schools and evening schools, though the regulations applying to each have long been on somewhat different lines. From 1870 to 1874 the only education contemplated or spoken of was in reading, writing, and arithmetic. Various modifications had taken place between 1870 and 1875, always in the direction of what I may call natural development, but always confined to these three subjects. But in 1875 a change of the most far-reaching kind was made. To the then elementary subjects were added grammar, geography, and history; a long list was also given of subjects called "specific," for proficiency in which a grant could be made. They included mathematics, Latin, French, German, mechanics, animal physiology, physical geography, botany, and domestic economy (this for girls only). This alteration was coincident with no fresh legislation, but was solely a departmental act. It was, in my opinion, entirely within the competence of the department, and it could have no operation unless the Legislature granted the necessary supplies. What is the effect upon the limits of education to be observed in board schools is a totally different matter which I will deal with in its proper place. The successive codes for some years made no further change, except in the shape of a continual increase in the extent to which the teaching was to be carried. But in 1882 there was a further change of an important character. In this code, as in all the subsequent ones, the subjects for which grants could be made are divided into two classes, obligatory and optional, and for the first time it is stated with regard to evening schools that no attendance of a person over twenty-one or under fourteen will be recognised for a grant. The optional subjects are again subdivided into class subjects (to be taken by classes) and specific classes (to be taken by individuals). It is a curious fact that, though the specific subjects would naturally be selected by the more advanced scholars, who may be between twenty and twenty-one, a note is appended to the schedule of specific subjects that the science subjects are to be taught chiefly by experiment and illustration, inasmuch as if they are taught to children by definition and verbal description they will be worthless as means of education. This note did not drop out till 1893, when I suppose it struck someone as absurd under the existing conditions. The code for a long time coquetted with drawing. It was introduced in 1885 as an optional class subject; in 1886 it was made obligatory; in 1887 it was dropped altogether; in 1890 it was restored as an optional subject for boys in infant schools or classes; in 1893 it was promoted to be an obligatory subject for boys in schools for older scholars, but always with a notice that the grant would be made by the Science and Art Department, and upon examinations conducted by that department. It was at length finally taken to itself by the Education Department in 1898, the grants thenceforth being made by the Education Department and the rules applicable being transferred from the South Kensington Directory to the Whitehall Code. No other department of art has eo nomine been introduced into the Whitehall Code except in so far as anything that may be called art may fall under the head of "manual instruction." In 1892 for the first time separate codes were issued for day schools and evening schools still called by that name. In 1893 appears for the first time the phrase "evening continuation schools." I do not know, and the learned counsel could not tell us, who invented the expression. It is not to be found in any of the Elementary Education Acts nor in any Act which has been brought under our notice. I gather, however, from two extracts from speeches of Mr. Mundella, given in Murray's Dictionary under the word "continuation," and dated respectively 1887 and 1888, that it was introduced from the educational technology of Germany. They are defined in Murray as "schools in which the education of the elementary school is continued to a more advanced age." By the explanatory memorandum prefixed to the code for each year after 1892 they are to include schools to which "the principal part of the work will be preparatory to the special studies directed by the Science and Art Department or other forms of secondary or higher education." Elsewhere they are spoken of as designed to provide the means for "those who are leaving the day schools to continue their education at evening schools" and as "one of the most important means for turning to better account than at present the money and time now spent in the day schools" (Code of 1893, arts. 6 and 7), which means, I suppose, the money now spent upon and time spent in the day schools. Thenceforth, it is announced, the attendance of persons over twenty-one years of age will be recognised; no limit of age is prescribed; no scholar will be compelled to take the elementary subjects. As to one of the subjects, "The Life and Duties of the Citizen," the code contains the very reasonable statement that it will be found difficult to teach it except to those scholars who are in the habit of reading and thinking intelligently about public affairs. The case finds that a large number of the persons taught at the evening schools in respect of which disallowances have been made were adults. It appears to me, again, to have been perfectly within the competence of the department to lay down the conditions under which it would make grants, and I am not in the least surprised that where it found schools de facto fulfilling those conditions the grant followed as a matter of course. But to argue, as has been done, that such action on the part of the department sets the school board free to teach at the expense of the rate-payers to adults and to children indiscriminately the higher mathematics, advanced chemistry (both theoretical and practical), political economy, art of a kind wholly beyond anything that can be taught to children, French, German, history, I know not what, appears to me to be the ne plus ultra of extravagance. If the Acts of which the primary object was elementary education and the whole object was education for children are to be transformed into Acts for the higher education—education of a kind usual rather in a college of a university than in a school—of grown-up men and women it must be done by Act of Parliament and not by a stroke of the pen of a Government department. The department has never affected to do anything of the kind, or to do more than lay down the conditions under which a grant of money may be earned. The extravagance is in the application that has been made by the school board of the successive developments of the code. The department is under no restrictions as to the conditions under which it shall grant public money, Parliament being at liberty to withhold or ratify the grant. But it is the strangest of arguments to say that, because the department is prepared to grant money for teaching adults to any school in a position to teach them, it follows that a board, created and existing to supply education for children and for no other purpose, has a right to spend money out of the rates for teaching those who are not children. London and the large towns in the country are full of working-men's colleges, polytechnic institutions, and other similar establishments, which afford teaching for adults, and to whose legitimate work the provisions of the code for instruction to adults apply. An equally extravagant argument has been founded upon the Education Code (1890) Act 1890. The code of 1890 had made some new provisions as to special grants to schools in relation to population and some other local circumstances which it was obviously apprehended might be ultra vires. These are confirmed by this Act. The code made no provision that I have been able to find altering the definition of an "elementary school," and in so far as the Act effects that alteration I do not see that it has anything to do with the code of 1890. It is styled "an Act for the purpose of making operative certain articles in the Education Code 1890." This description may well perhaps apply to the provision in question, since there would not be more scope for the work of any evening school than for that of a day school without the removal of the restriction in sect. 2 of the Act of 1870. Be that as it may, it provides specifically that it shall not be required as a condition of a Parliamentary grant to an evening school that a principal part of the education there given shall be elementary, and it is a significant fact that it is silent as to any alteration of the Elementary Education Acts in the way of providing education for adults. This provision is not an alteration of any regulation of the code, and it does not touch the question of whether or not a school is conducted in accordance with the conditions, required by the minutes of the Education Department to be fulfilled in order to get a grant.

[Q.B. Div.]

The section means just what it says and no more—namely, that in order to get the grant the school need no longer be confined to teaching principally elementary matter. It is again a general section, not applicable merely to board schools, but to voluntary evening schools and all others which are in other respects public elementary schools. It does not, in my opinion, alter in the least the powers or duties of school boards, and certainly does not confer an entirely new power to teach adults by the aid of the rates. Another matter has been argued as being also a statutory recognition of the practice in question. The Local Government Board has directed board schools to show in their accounts what grants they receive from South Kensington. The Local Government Board has statutory powers to direct in what form accounts shall be kept and returns made, and their orders have to be laid before both Houses of Parliament. Therefore it is said there is a Parliamentary recognition of the fact that school boards are earning Science and Art Department grants. Such an argument only serves to show the straits in which the case for the applicants is found. The Local Government Board, like the Education Department, deals with schools as they find them. De facto they teach this and that which earn grants from South Kensington. Parliament votes the money and the department pays it. It is, therefore, natural that orders should be made that the school board should show how much it receives and what is done with it. It is not the business of either department to inquire whether any particular school, voluntary or board, is exceeding its rights with regard either to the public or to individuals by giving the education which has satisfied the conditions and earned the grant. It is, I think, equally futile to say that, because subsidies in respect of the schools and classes objected to in this case have been annually voted by the House of Commons and sanctioned by the Appropriation Acts, the school board must have a right to contribute to the cost of such schools and classes out of the rates. The Appropriation Acts legalise the expenditure of public money in the way proposed. They have absolutely nothing to do with the question whether the school board has exceeded its powers in levying rates to pay for the excess of cost over and above the grants; and, again I have to say that if the case of the applicants depends upon such an argument it must be in a bad way. In my opinion, therefore, in so far as the expenses in question were incurred for science and art schools and classes or for teaching adults they are indefensible, and the auditor was right in dealing with them. We have been asked by both sides to treat the case as if the question of adult instruction had not arisen. I do not know why the respondents joined in the invitation, but it is one which I cannot accept. The question is directly raised by the case, and it is impossible to ignore it. It is immaterial that it is not one of the reasons given by the auditor, but it is quite impossible to exclude it in dealing with the second question proposed to us. If, as stated in the case, it is really impossible to dissect the items and apportion them between the legitimate objects of the schools and those which are ultra vires, his disallowance of the whole must stand. But he has power to reduce as well as to disallow items (order of Local Government Board, the 14th July 1880, art. 25), and it seems to me to be little short of absurd to say as the case does that the task of apportionment is impossible. Far more difficult tasks of the same nature are habitually performed by judges and juries, and I can see no insuperable obstacle. The question, however, is probably not important. I do not suppose that any one will even wish that the gentlemen surcharged, who I do not doubt for a moment honestly did what they conceived to be their duty, should be mulcted in the amounts surcharged or in any other amounts. There can be no doubt that the importance of the subject demands that the questions raised should be decided by the House of Lords. Until that is done there can hardly be any disturbance of the existing order of things without the most enormous inconvenience. When the question is finally set at rest, if the views I have expressed be maintained, I can see nothing whatever to prevent the applicants from applying to the Local Government Board under the provisions of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 91), s. 36, to remit the surcharges. It will be only when it is finally decided that the surcharges were proper that the occasion will arise for resorting to that section. Before giving my formal answers to the specific questions which the case presents, I wish to observe that, in respect to expenditure, whether for teaching adults or for maintaining science schools or other teaching, which appears to me to be outside the range of what ought to fall upon the rates, I conceive that under the ample words of sect. 13 (1) of the Act of 1873 any school board which can get subscriptions or donations sufficient to enable them to give such instruction is at liberty to do so, provided that it bonâ fide conforms to sub-sect. 3 and expends no money of the rates towards such education. It is true that in the Act of 1870 the school fund is to consist of all moneys received in any manner whatever by the school board, but the provisions of the Act of 1873, s. 13, could not be complied with unless the funds specially allocated, which that Act enabled the school board to accept and administer, were made the subjects of separate accounts, and to that extent the Act of 1873 clearly modifies the Act of 1870. As to question 1, therefore, my answer is that it is not within the power of the board to provide at the expense of the ratepayers science and art schools or classes in day schools; that the question of providing science and art schools in evening schools cannot arise, inasmuch as by art. lvi., of the directory the work of such a school must be carried on in day classes; that science and art classes in evening continuation schools are as much beyond the scope of rate-aided education as in day schools; but that in both such educational work may be carried on by the school board provided the whole of the funds required for it are furnished from sources other than contributions from the rates. (2) Assuming the impossibility of apportioning the items which have been disallowed between legitimate and illegitimate expenditure, the disallowances were properly made. (3) The rule must be discharged.

KENNEDY, J.—In this case I have had the opportunity of reading the judgment which my brother Wills has just pronounced; and, it deals so thoroughly and fully with the historical and general aspects of the very grave and important matters before us, that I may without preface, approach the particular questions which the court has to decide. These questions, as stated in the special case, are three in number; but the real and substantial point of controversy is raised in the second of them, and I shall deal with it first. Is it lawful for the school board to pay out of rates levied under the Public Elementary Acts as the London School Board has done in the circumstances stated in the special case, expenses incurred in providing and maintaining science and art schools or classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools? I will take first the case of day schools. It appears to me that we must chiefly be guided by the enactments of the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75). It was by that Act that school boards were created. It prescribed their purpose, their powers and their duties; and I have been unable to find that its provisions, so far as the present issues are concerned, are in any essential point affected either by the later statutes relating to elementary education or by the Technical Instruction Acts of 1889 and 1891 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 76; 54 & 55 Vict. c. 4). The central purpose of the Elementary Education Act 1870 is plain and definite—to provide education for children in public elementary schools. The school board, which this Act brings into being, is a piece of administrative machinery whose primary work is to produce within a definite district a sufficiency of such educational provision. "Child" is not defined, as, for the purposes of that Act, it is defined in the Elementary Education Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 79). Elementary education is not defined. I infer that Parliament intended both terms to be elastic. "Child" is not to be read as designating a person under fourteen years of age as it is (see sect. 48) in the Education Act 1876. All that is clear, is that it is for the education of persons in statu pupillari that the Act intends to provide. "Elementary education" may mean, and in my opinion it does mean, something more than the efficient elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, which under sect. 4 of the Act of 1876 the parent of every child between the ages of five and fourteen, is bound to cause that child to receive. This Act gives it neither description nor limit. Now, let us examine the Act in order to see what the school board is to do. According to sect. 5 there is to be provided for every school district a sufficient amount of accommodation in public elementary schools available for all the children resident in such district for whose elementary education, efficient and suitable provision (referred to in the Acts as "public school accommodation") is not otherwise made. Where there is an insufficiency of such accommodation the school board is entitled (sects. 18, 19), and under sect. 10 may be required, to provide and maintain schools. The funds for the attainment of this end are stated in sects. 53 and 54, which give a right of recourse to the rates. These schools must be public elementary schools. What then is meant by a "public elementary school"? We have the answer in sects. 3, 7, and 97. It is, in the first place, a school or a department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given; by which phrase I understand to be meant the principal part of the education of each of the children who attend the school. Secondly, it is to be a school whose scholars are free from any religious test and from compulsion to attend any religious teaching or religious service or Sunday school, and where any religious observance or instruction to those whose parents desire it is subject to certain conditions. Thirdly, it is to be open to inspection by Her Majesty's inspectors of schools under the Education Department; and, fourthly, we have the important stipulation that, in sect. 7 (4), "the school shall be conducted in accordance with the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain an annual Parliamentary grant." The term "Parliamentary grant" is explained by sect. 3 to mean a grant made in aid of an elementary school, either annual or otherwise, out of moneys provided by Parliament for the Civil Service, intitled "For Public Education in Great Britain." Sect. 97 provides that the conditions required to be fulfilled by an elementary school in order to obtain the annual Parliamentary grant shall be those contained in the minutes of the Education Department in force for the time being. The crucial question in this case, in my view is this: Does the phrase "public elementary school"—that is, the school which the school board is to provide and maintain—as defined by the Elementary Education Act 1870, involve or connote any, and, if so, what limitation upon the character or extent of the secular instruction to be given, so far, at any rate, as regards instruction the cost of which may be defrayed out of the rates under sect. 54? Two things, I think, are clear. First, that the education is to be that of children, and not of adults; secondly, that only the principal part of the education and not the whole of it must be elementary education. Is there any further limitation? In my opinion there is. I agree with my brother Wills in thinking that, if the provisions of the Elementary Education Act 1870, and especially sect. 7 (4), are duly considered, it was the clear intention of Parliament to place public elementary schools (it is only such that the board may legally provide and maintain) under the sole administration of the Education Department at Whitehall. I think that the education which might be paid for out of the rates was intended to be education either prescribed or approved by that department as the responsible authority. The minutes of that department now in force are contained in the code of 1898. It lays down certain conditions as necessary for the obtaining of a grant. Some subjects—reading, writing, and arithmetic, needlework (for girls), drawing (for boys), and one "class" subject—it prescribes as obligatory subjects of instruction, and denotes them as "the elementary subjects." Others, less elementary, it authorises as optional subjects, either "class" or "specific"; and after giving a list of these it adds, in art. 16, that a subject outside the list of "specific" subjects may be substituted for one of these optional subjects, "provided that a graduated scheme for teaching it be submitted to and approved of by the inspector." These, obligatory and optional alike, are grant-earning subjects. But further, in art. 17, the code declares that instruction may be given in other secular subjects although they can earn no grant, but they must be subjects approved by the department. So that this Day Schools Code of 1898 contains a scheme of general secular education for children in a public elementary school, part of which is obligatory and part optional, but all of which is either prescribed by or requires the sanction of the Education Department at Whitehall, and is subjected annually to examination by the inspectors who belong to that department. It appears to me that the Elementary Education Act 1870, when carefully considered and fairly construed, sufficiently shows that it is for the provision and maintenance of a school where the secular instruction does not pass beyond these limitations, that it has given to the school board statutory authority to draw upon the rates. That which the school board here has done—that which has caused the making of these disallowances and surcharges by the auditor—has been the expenditure of money from this source upon an elaborate system of advanced instruction outside the Day School Code, and with regard to which the Education Department at Whitehall, the director of public elementary education designated, as I read it, by the fundamental statute, has neither responsibility nor control, nor power of maintenance or reward. The science and art schools and classes are schools and classes organised, governed, and examined by the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. As my brother Wills has fully explained, the department, although at its head, as they are also at the head of the Education Department at Whitehall, are the Lord President of the Council and the Vice-President of the Committee in Council on Education, is really distinct and different from the Education Department. It has a separate staff and organisation, separate offices, separate registration of students, separate examinations and separate inspectors. It administers moneys voted annually by Parliament under a separate head of appropriation for instruction in science and art in the United Kingdom; it has no concern with general public education, or any duty towards public elementary schools. Its directory (revised to June 1898), which corresponds to the code of the Education Department, contains in a volume of some 428 pages a statement of the organisation of the schools and classes, the subjects of instruction, the admission of students, the methods of inspection and examination, the conditions upon which grants, &c., are given to teachers and students, and a quantity of important detailed information upon other branches of the organisation and working of the Science and Art Department. A very short inspection of this volume and of a volume of the Science Examination Papers for 1898, which is also in evidence, suffices to show the vast difference between the scope, the method, and the character of the general education provided for children by the code and those of the special education provided by the directory for the science and art students. Art. xviii. of the directory, I may add, provides that no student may be registered for a grant for attendance under the department of science and art whose name is on the register for day attendance under the English Education Department, subject to the exception that a scholar of an elementary school who has been placed altogether in standard VII. of the code may, on personal application, be registered in an evening class with the approval of the department. I feel compelled to hold that the payment by the school board out of rates for the provision and maintenance of science and art schools and classes in day schools is ultra vires. The position of the school board in regard to evening continuation schools does not appear to me to be in any essential respect different from its position in regard to day schools. Whilst upon the whole I have come to the conclusion that I cannot hold as we were asked by Lord Robert Cecil, in his clear and able argument, to hold, that a school board cannot legally expend rate-provided money upon instruction in evening continuation schools, I certainly do hold that in providing and maintaining such schools, they must not in their instruction go outside the system prescribed and sanctioned and controlled by the Education Department in Whitehall. The Education Department has a code of regulations for these evening continuation schools, which corresponds to the code of regulations for day schools. The code in force is that of 1897. It embodies (Appendix I.) many of the regulations of the Day Schools Code, and amongst others (see No. 77) the regulation that every school must be conducted as a public elementary school. Naturally, and, as one would assume from the title, the curriculum of the Evening Continuation School Code is less elementary, more advanced, and more extensive than the Day School Code. It recognises (art. 3) drawing for the purpose of the fixed grant, and seems in the same article to stipulate as a condition of the grant, inspection in that subject by the Science and Art Department. But, as I understand the provision of arts. 3 and 130 and appendix 3, and, as I understand from an inspection of drawings submitted to us, the scheme of drawing contemplated by the code and rewarded by grant from the education department is something of a far less advanced character than the scheme of the Science and Art Department in art schools and classes; and in art. 3 it is provided expressly that no scholar may be registered in an evening continuation school for drawing who is receiving instruction in a School of Art class under the Science and Art Department or has been successful in an examination of the Science and Art Department in connection with the School of Art or art class. In regard to science (p. 8) it is prescribed that "any scheme submitted for approval in a science subject which differs from that given for such subject in this schedule must be more elementary than the elementary stage of the subject as shown in the directory of the Science and Art Department." It appears to me that the curriculum of education marked out for evening continuation schools as public elementary schools by the Education Department at Whitehall in the code of 1897, gives the limits of the instruction in such schools for which the school board is authorised to make provision out of the funds obtained by the rates, and that to go outside these limits and provide out of the rates in such schools science and art schools or classes, not under the Education Department, but under the Science and Art Department and not included in the code of the Education Department is ultra vires. In coming to this conclusion I have not lost sight of the Education Code (1890) Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 22), s. 1, which enacts in substance that for the Parliamentary grant to an evening school it should not be necessary that elementary education should be the principal part of the education there given, and to that extent, and for the purpose of the Parliamentary grant, alters, in regard to evening schools, the definition of "elementary school," and therefore of "public elementary school" in the Education Act 1870. I am unable to see how this enactment entitles the school board to spend the money drawn from the rates on instruction authorised and controlled by a department different from that to which sect. 7 (4) of the Elementary Education Act 1870 refers when it speaks of a Parliamentary grant. The reduction under the Act of 1890 of the quantum of the undefined thing called "elementary education" which was required by the Act of 1870 to constitute a school an "elementary school" does not touch the principle upon which, in my judgment, the propriety of school board expenditures out of rates is to be ascertained. As appears in the Evening School Continuation Code (appendix I, p 57) the evening school must, like the day school, be conducted as a public elementary school. If it were not, it could not legally be provided and maintained by a school board. As it is a public elementary school, the system of instruction in it must, for the reasons which I have felt it my duty to give at length, so far as that instruction is provided by the school board out of the rates, be the system of instruction which is sanctioned and controlled by the Education Department and not that which is administered by the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. I ought, I think, before leaving the subject of evening continuation schools, to advert to one matter relating to their administration which was the topic of discussion in the course of the argument of this case. The code of 1897 (explanatory memorandum, p. 7) declares that "the attendances of persons over twenty-one years of age will henceforth be recognised." In the special case it is stated that "there is no superior limit of age in the evening continuation schools, and a great number of scholars were adults." The special case does not submit to us any question as to the provision and maintenance of science and art schools and classes for adults as distinguished from youthful scholars; and it is, of course, conceivable that all the scholars so instructed in our evening continuation schools might be under age. Having regard, however, to the facts stated in the special case, and the importance of the matter, I feel it to be my duty to say that, in my judgment to educate adults in a public elementary school by means of funds taken out of rates under sect. 54 of the Education Act 1870 is certainly beyond the legal powers of a school board. However wide an interpretation be given to the words "child" and "children" in that statute, they plainly do not include "adults." The fact that the Education Department has deemed it right, for the purposes of a grant, to recognise the attendances of adults in an evening continuation school, cannot, as it appears to me, legally justify the action of the school board in applying to the education of adults, funds to which an Act of Parliament has given a right of recourse only for the purpose of the education of children. I have now dealt with the second and the really important question. The first question, which asks our judgment as to the power to the school board, as a statutory authority, to provide science and art schools or classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools, I may, I think, deal with briefly, for, as I understand the facts set forth in the special case, this is an academical and not really a practical question. It is stated in the case that the expenses incurred by the board in respect of science and art schools and classes under the Science and Art Department has always considerably exceeded the grants obtained from the Science and Art Department, and the deficiency has always been made good by the board out of the school fund and the rates levied under the Elementary Education Acts. By the first question, as I understand it, having regard to the terms of the second question, it is intended to ask us whether it is within the power of the school board, as a statutory corporation, to provide science and art schools and classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools, in cases where there is no need, in order to defray the cost, to have recourse to the rates levied under the Elementary Education Act. I am, upon the whole, inclined to think that there might be circumstances under which a school board might act as suggested without legal objections. In so saying I have in view the provisions of sect. 13 of the Education Act 1873. It appears to me that there might be a gift to a school board for educational purposes under that section, which would enable a school board legally to provide and maintain by means of it a science and art school or class. That is not the present case. In answer to the third question I have only to say that in my judgment the rule must be discharged. No distinction in principle between the disallowances and surcharges was supported by counsel at the Bar, and I do not see how any such distinction could properly be drawn.

Rule discharged.

REG. v. STODDART. (a)

Gaming—Betting—Coupon competition—Continuity relating to horse race—Place kept for betting—Newspaper office—Receiving money at newspaper office—Betting Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), s. 1.

The defendant was the proprietor of a newspaper, each number of which contained coupons entitling the purchaser of the copy to take part in a competition.

The competitions were for money prizes, to be awarded to the person or persons who named on the coupon the winning horses in certain races; the system being that the purchaser of a copy of the newspaper wrote on the coupon the names of the horses he selected as the probable winners of the races named on the coupon, and transmitted the filled-up coupon to the office of the newspaper.

(a) Reported by A. A. BETHUNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

REG. v. STODDART.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

On each coupon one guess was allowed free, and subsequent guesses on payment of one penny for each guess.

Sums of money were paid by the defendant to the persons who had correctly named the winning horses.

Held, that the defendant did keep and use the office of the newspaper for the purpose of money being received by her on consideration for undertakings to pay thereafter money on events relating to horse races.

Stoddart v. Sagar considered.

THE case stated for the opinion of the court by Channell, J. was as follows:—

1. Ada Jane Stoddart was tried before me on the 30th Oct. 1900, at the Central Criminal Court, on an indictment charging that she, on the 23rd March 1900 and on divers other days between that day and the 22nd June, in the city of London, being then the occupier of a certain office at 10, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street, in the said City, unlawfully did open, keep, and use the said office for the purpose of money and valuable things being received by and on her behalf as the consideration for undertakings to pay thereafter money and valuable things on events relating to horse races. There were other counts in the indictment, and a copy of it is to be taken to be part of this case.

2. The defendant had been proceeded against summarily for the alleged offence under 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, and she had, pursuant to sect. 17 of 42 & 43 Vict. c. 49, claimed to be tried by a jury.

3. The defendant was proved to be the occupier of an office at 10, Red Lion-court, Fleet-street, and to be the registered proprietor of a newspaper called Sporting Luck, which was published weekly at that office. It was also proved that she personally took some part in the management, but was assisted by her husband and others.

4. The last page of each number of the newspaper contained conditions of a so-called competition, and was similar to the following, which is the last page of the number of the 15th June 1900.

The page was, so far as is material, as follows:

Sporting Luck coupon contests, promoted since 1890, and legalised by Baron Pollock and Justice Wright in the action Sporting Luck against the Police of London (Stoddart v. Sagar), August 1895.—Coupons for this contest may be posted to Sporting Luck not later than (midnight) Monday, and will be qualified to compete if received by post not later than midday (Tuesday); Scotch and Irish letters and those from Isle of Man, South and North Wales, Northumberland, Cumberland, Westmoreland, and the Channel Islands are accepted if received by Sporting Luck by post not later than 8 o'clock Tuesday night and have been posted not later than midnight (Monday).

petitor. Combination coupons are accepted as per scale of charges stated below. Cash must accompany each batch of coupons, and if not sent, the coupons will be disqualified. Cross all postal orders, and take a copy of the number. Make postal orders or cheques payable to "A. J. Stoddart." Selections can be made in ink or pencil. A horse's name must be given, "trainer's selected," or "owner's selected," or jockey's mounts are not permitted to qualify. If more than one succeed in securing the prize, the money offered will be equally divided. Only No. 1 coupon in the sheet of coupons is allowed to be used free of charge. This coupon can be filled up, despatched to us, and will be accepted for competition without any charges or fee being sent with it. The three winners or the placed horses, if the contest is a placing competition, must be on any one coupon (one line). In case of dead heats which are not run off, both horses are counted as winners. Where any races selected for coupon contests are postponed, the result of the contest will be held over until the races are decided. If in any week where three winners comprise the contest, and only two races are run, the prize, without any deduction, will be given for those races decided. If two or all the races of any contest are abandoned all money sent in with coupons will be credited to the competitors sending them in, and must be used in the following week's contest. If subscribers desire to make more than one attempt, any number of extra coupons can be filled up if one penny stamp is forwarded with each of these coupons, and thus if forty-nine different attempts are made, and forty-nine of the lines in our coupon sheet are filled up, 4s. must be remitted. If a remittance is sent in excess of the amount required for coupons received the proprietors of Sporting Luck do not hold themselves liable to return such excess cash. A successful competitor can only take one share of any prize.

PARTICULARS OF REMITTANCES SENT WITH COUPONS.

5. Copies of the papers of the 23rd March, the 30th March, the 15th June, the 22nd June, and the 7th Sept. were put in evidence, and they are to be taken as forming part of this case. The events the subject of the competition varied every week, but in each case between March and June the events were horse races. The prizes also varied, being usually 1000l. and sometimes 3000l.

6. It was proved that a large number of persons every week sent in coupons filled up in accordance with the conditions of the coupon competitions, and sent remittances of money, and that large sums were so received by the defendant, and large sums were paid away by her in respect of the so-called prizes. One witness proved the receipt by himself of 1000*l.*, being successful in one of sixty-eight coupons which he had sent in, and in respect of which he had paid 5*s.* 6*d.*

7. Special arrangements were made by the Post Office for the delivery of letters at the office on Tuesday mornings, and on those days there were usually twenty to twenty-two sacks of letters delivered. Most of these were marked outside "Competition," and the business of dealing with the coupons and remittances requires a much larger staff than would be required merely for the sale and publication of the said newspaper.

Large sums were paid by the defendant to her banking account every week, the total sum so paid in the year 1900 to the month of June being proved to be 60,000*l.* or thereabouts, but this would include sums received in respect of the newspaper other than sums received with coupons.

8. In the newspaper of the 7th Sept. it was stated that 46,000*l.* had been paid away in prizes since January.

9. Counsel for the prosecution contended that the use of the office for receipt of the money paid by the so-called competitors in these competitions was a contravention of the second part of the 1st section of 16 & 17 Vict. c. 119. He admitted that the facts of the case were identical with those proved in Stoddart v. Sagar (73 L. T. Rep. 215; (1895) 2 Q. B. 474; 18 Cox C. C. 165), but contended that that decision was wrong, or only to be accounted for by the fact that in that case there had been a finding of the alderman acquitting the defendant. He stated that both sides had expressed a wish when before the magistrate in the present case that the decision in Stoddart v. Sagar might be reconsidered by the Court for Crown Cases Reserved. He relied on Hart v. Hay, Nisbet, and Co. (37 Sc. L. Rep. 652, number for June 1900).

10. Counsel for the defendant said that the facts were not disputed. He relied on Stoddart v. Sagar and contended that the statute did not apply to a receipt of money unless the transaction was a bet, and that in this case there was no bet.

11. I held that if the money sent by the competitors with their coupons to the office (being all the pennies other than those which they paid for the newspapers) was the consideration for the promise by the defendant to pay the so-called prizes depending as they did upon the events of horse races, the case came within the statute, and I asked counsel on each side whether they desired me to leave any question of fact to the jury. Neither counsel did so, and counsel for the defendant said that he would not ask the jury to find that the money received with the coupons was not the consideration for the promise to pay the prizes.

12. I directed the jury that upon the facts proved, which were not disputed, the defendant had contravened the statute, and the jury on that direction found the defendant guilty on the first count of the indictment.

13. The defendant's counsel asked me to state a case for the Court of Crown Cases Reserved which I agreed to do solely in deference to the opinion of the judges as reported in Stoddart v.

Sagar. I myself agreed entirely with the views of the Scotch judges particularly with the last paragraph of the judgment of Lord Adam in which he pointed out that the Act sets forth certain things that are declared to be a breach of the Act, and that the things described are exactly what had been done in the case before him and also in that before me. I also thought that if it was necessary that the promise or agreement to pay money referred to in the Act must be an agreement by way of wagering these agreements in fact were so.

14. The jury are to be taken to have found as a fact that the money received by the defendant at the office in respect of the coupons was received as the consideration for her promise to pay the prizes according to the terms set out in the newspapers.

I postponed sentence and directed the defendant to enter into recognisances to come up for judgment after the decision of this case.

The question for the court is whether my direction to the jury was right. If right, the conviction is to stand. If wrong, the conviction is to be quashed.—A. M. CHANNELL.—Dated the 2nd Nov. 1900.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (L. Kershaw with him) for the defendant.—Sect. 1 of the Betting Act 1853 applies only to houses kept for betting, betting being that which is described in the latter part of the section. The transaction in question is not betting. A competitor for the penny he pays acquires a right to guess a winner. If he guesses correctly, the proprietor of the newspaper pays the agreed sum of money to him, but in every case the proprietor must pay the money to some competitor. Neither is the transaction a lottery, because of the competitor's exercise of skill. The contingency in which the money is payable is not the horse race, but the guess, for it does not matter to the competitor which horse wins the race; his prize depends on his having guessed the right horse. He referred to Horace Avory and J. G. Mackay for the prosecution were not called upon to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The defendant in this case was indicted under sect. 1 of the Betting Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), which provides that "no house, office, room or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof or any person procured or employed by or acting on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management, or in any manner conducting the business thereof, betting with persons resorting thereto, or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper or person as aforesaid, as or for the consideration for any promise or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race." The facts, which are not in dispute, are that the defendant was the proprietor of a newspaper, each copy of which had attached to it a coupon entitling the holder to take part in a competition for prizes. The conditions of the competition allowed competitors to have extra coupons on payment of one penny for each coupon. The prize depended upon the guessing of the winner in a horse race. It cannot, I think, be denied that the transaction does amount to an undertaking to pay money on the event or contingency of a horse race. It is said by Mr. Walton that we ought to put some limitation on the statute. But in my opinion we ought not to put any limit on the words of the statute directly the case comes within the words "event or contingency relating to a horse race." I think that the framers of the statute did intend to prohibit the receipt of money on consideration of a promise to pay a sum on the contingency of a horse race, and we ought not to decline to give effect to the plain words of the statute. We cannot see the difference between this transaction and ordinary betting. The person who pays the money pays it because the person who receives it becomes entitled to it on the horse winning the race. There is no consideration for any further promise; the substance of the transaction is that the money shall be paid if the event of the guessing is that the horse named by a competitor wins the race. In Stoddart v. Sagar it was open to the court to find that the transaction was not only not betting but not an offence under the statute at all. But that the court did not find itself open to draw that conclusion is clear from the words of Wright, J. I read that as reserving the very question with which we have to deal. In Reg v. Hobbs there was no promise by the defendant to pay money, he was the custodian only of the money contributed. Caminada v. Hulton may clearly be distinguished. On the whole I think that though this transaction is not in popular language "betting" it nevertheless comes within the express words of the statute.

WILLS, J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that the transaction falls within the express words of sect. 1—the receiving of money "as or for the consideration for an assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement" to pay money "on the event or contingency of or relating to" a horse race. It is said that the 1st section ought to be confined to betting "with persons resorting thereto"; the argument may reasonably be turned the other way, that it means "betting as aforesaid." To my mind this is about as clear a case of betting pure and simple as can be imagined. It is mischievous to refine when in substance there is no doubt as to what has taken place. Supposing the person who buys a coupon backs his chance conglomeration of names, to the extent of 5*l*. He pays 5*l*. to the defendant, and if successful receives 1000*l*.; if unsuccessful, nothing. In substance the defendant becomes a stakeholder until the race is over, when she pays not 1000*l*. plus 5*l*., but 1000*l*., so that the bettor wins 995*l*. Why this is not a bet of 5*l*. to 1000*l*. contingent on a horse race, I cannot see. That it is complicated by the liability of the prize of 1000*l*. to be divided amongst several does not alter the nature of the transaction. The view that I have expressed receives the high authority of the Scotch courts, being that of the Lord Justice General and of Lord Adam in Hart v.

Hay, Nisbet, and Co. (37 Sc. L. Rep., at p. 655). On both these grounds it is perfectly clear that the offence prohibited by the statute has been committed.

WRIGHT, J.—I agree for two reasons, which have been stated by my Lord, although I am not sure that for all purposes this transaction is "betting."

KENNEDY, J.—It is difficult to define what is a wagering contract so as to define what is meant by "bet." But however, that may be I think this case is covered by the statute. In Reg. v. Hobbs the person convicted had not entered into any contractual relation with the persons who entered into the competition, and the drawing was not similar to the contingency in this case. In my opinion this conviction should be affirmed.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree.

Conviction affirmed.

COURT OF APPEAL.

Thursday, Nov. 8, 1900.

(Before SMITH, M.R., COLLINS and STIRLING, L.JJ.)

WHYLER v. BINGHAM RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)

APPLICATION FOR A NEW TRIAL.

Highway — Local authority — Misfeasance — Removal of fence — Injury to traveller — Liability of highway authority.

A post and rail fence was erected by the highway authority, the predecessors of the defendants, by the side of a road, which was liable to be flooded from an adjacent watercourse, in order to protect the public from danger in times of flood.

Many years after the defendants, acting upon the report of their surveyor that this fence was in bad repair and was unnecessary, ordered it to be removed and a short length to be erected at each end instead. The fence was removed, but nothing further was done, and about three weeks later, when the road was flooded, a man drove off the road into the watercourse and was drowned.

Held (dismissing the appeal), that there was evidence upon which it could properly be found that the defendants had been guilty of an act of misfeasance which caused the death.

THIS was an application by the defendants for judgment or for a new trial upon appeal from the verdict and judgment at the trial before Wills, J. with a jury at Nottingham.

In this action the plaintiff claimed damages for the death of her husband, under the Fatal Accidents Act 1846 (9 & 10 Vict. c. 93), alleging that his death was caused by the wrongful act, neglect, or default of the defendants.

The defendants were the highway authority of the Bingham Rural District.

[CT. OF APP.]

WHYLER v. BINGHAM RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

There was a road within the district of the defendants along a part of which the defendants' predecessors had, in 1877, erected a post and rail fence in order to protect persons passing along the road from danger in times of flood.

At the time when this fence was erected, there was a stream by the side of the road, from which floods arose at times and covered the road. This stream was subsequently diverted, but the old watercourse in times of flood became filled with water which sometimes overflowed on to the road.

In 1899 the surveyor of the defendants reported that this fence was in a bad state of repair and would cost a large sum to repair properly, and that it was not needed, except a short length at each end, and that sufficient posts and rails could be got out of the fence to do all that was required.

The defendants ordered that this work should be done.

On the 26th Jan. 1900 the fence was entirely removed, and on the 16th Feb. nothing had been done to replace the fence or to protect that part of the road.

The surveyor of the defendants said, when giving evidence, that it was his intention to place posts at intervals by the side of the road in order to show the course of the road when it was covered with water in times of flood.

On the 16th Feb. the old watercourse was flooded, and the road was covered with water.

The deceased, while driving a carriage along this part of the road on the night of the 16th Feb., drove off the road into the old watercourse and was drowned.

The action was tried before Wills, J. with a jury.

The learned judge directed the jury that if they thought that this removal of the fence under the circumstances was not consistent with reasonable regard for the safety of persons using the road, they could find a verdict for the plaintiff.

The jury found a verdict for the plaintiff for 250*l.*, and the learned judge held that there was evidence upon which the defendants might be held liable, and ordered judgment to be entered for the plaintiff.

The defendants applied for judgment or for a new trial upon the ground that there was no evidence upon which they could be found liable.

Hugo Young, Q.C. and W. Appleton for the appellants.—There was no evidence upon which the appellants could be found liable. As highway authority they cannot be made liable to pay damages for any injury arising from any mere nonfeasance on their part, such as the omission to fence the road :

Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, 67 L. T. Rep. 486; (1892) A. C. 345;

Thompson v. Brighton Corporation, 70 L. T. Rep. 206; (1894) 1 Q. B. 332.

There was no duty upon the defendants to protect persons using the road from danger by fencing the road, or by maintaining the fence erected by their predecessors :

Rees v. Llandilo Commissioners, 2 T. R. 232; 1 B. R. 466;

Wilson v. Halifax Corporation, 17 L. T. Rep. 680; L. Rep. 3 Ex. 114.

Therefore the removal of the fence was not an act of misfeasance for which the appellants could be made liable. The removal of the fence was not the cause of the accident to the deceased; it was caused by the absence of a fence. The fence had been removed three weeks before the accident happened, and it might just as well be said that, if the fence had been removed ten or twenty years before, the removal was the cause of the accident. The cause of the accident was the omission to fence, and that is mere nonfeasance for which the defendants cannot be sued.

Etherington Smith for the respondent.—The fence along the part of the road in question was erected in order to protect the public from danger; the defendants decided that this fence should be altered, and that a different kind of fence should be provided for the protection of the public; in carrying out that alteration the defendants were guilty of misfeasance in not completing the alteration within a reasonable time after pulling down the old fence, and in not taking reasonable care to protect the public while the alteration was being carried out. The defendants were negligent in carrying out the work which they had undertaken, and that is misfeasance and not mere nonfeasance. The pulling down of the fence without due regard for the safety of the public was misfeasance.

Hugo Young, Q.C. replied.

SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal by the defendants from the judgment entered for the plaintiff by Wills, J. after the jury had found a verdict for the plaintiff. It is admitted that the position of the defendants is the same as the position of the former surveyors of highways, and that their liability is neither greater nor less than was the liability of surveyors of highways. Long ago, in the case of Russell v. Men of Devon (2 T. R. 667; 1 R. R. 585), it was decided that surveyors of highways were not liable for nonfeasance—that is, for doing nothing. The remedy in such case is by indictment. It has also been decided that the law is the same in the case of local authorities in the position of surveyors of highways: (Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, 67 L. T. Rep. 486; (1892) A. C. 345). The real question in this case is whether the plaintiff has not shown that the defendants have been guilty of misfeasance. The facts of this case are that, in 1877, there was a stream by the side of this road which, in times of flood, overflowed the road, and that, this being dangerous to persons using the road, a post and rail fence was erected by the then highway authority in order to protect the public in times of flood. It is said by the defendants that there was no obligation to put up a fence, and I do not say that there was any such obligation. There are indeed provisions, in sect. 24 of the Highway Act 1835, as to the duty of surveyors of highways with respect to highways which are liable to floods, but I am not sure that they apply to the present case. The provisions of sect. 6 of the Highway Rate Assessment Act 1882 have also been referred to, which seem to indicate some kind of duty to put up posts and rails for the protection of travellers from danger; but it is said that merely gives power to charge the expenses upon the highway rate and does not impose any duty, and I do not intend to decide any question as to liability under that Act. Now, the fence erected by the defendants' predecessors continued to exist for many years. The defendants, upon the report of their surveyor, in Oct. 1899 ordered this fence to be taken down, and that instead a short length of posts and rails should be put up at each end. On the 26th Jan. 1900 the old fence had been removed in pursuance of their order, but nothing at all was put up in its place, and the ditch was left without protection. Nothing had been done by the 16th Feb. 1900. On that day there was a flood which covered the road, and the deceased drove off the road into the ditch and was drowned, because there was nothing to show the course of the road after the posts and rails had been removed. It is contended by the defendants that at the most there has been mere nonfeasance on their part in not putting up posts or a fence, and that no action will lie because the plaintiff can only complain of their omission to do something. The plaintiff, however, alleges an act of misfeasance on the part of the defendants in pulling down the old fence. In my opinion, the accident was caused by an act of misfeasance on the part of the defendants in pulling down the old fence, for if they had not removed it the accident would not have happened. The jury found that the removal of the fence by the defendants in the manner and under the circumstances in which it was removed was not consistent with a reasonable regard for the safety of persons using the road. In my opinion, the learned judge was right in holding, upon that finding of the jury, that the defendants were liable for a misfeasance. The verdict and judgment must therefore stand, and this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The short question in this case is whether the plaintiff's husband met with his death by reason of an act of misfeasance on the part of the defendants. Unless the plaintiff can prove both that there was an act of misfeasance by the defendants and that the death was due to that act, she cannot succeed in her action. It must be admitted upon the authorities that the liability of a highway authority is only for acts of misfeasance, and that there is no liability for mere nonfeasance. This case must, therefore, be dealt with upon the footing that the defendants were not bound to put up a fence by the side of this road. The predecessors of the defendants had in fact erected a fence along this road, because they thought it necessary to protect the public who used the road from danger in times of flood. They thereby brought about a new state of facts. In the exercise of their powers as the highway authority they had turned an unsafe highway into a safe highway. The defendants by what they did afterwards turned this highway, which was safe and not a source of danger to the public, into a dangerous highway by altering its then existing condition by removing the fence. It appears to me that this was clear evidence of misfeasance on the part of the defendants, and also that the death of the plaintiff's husband was the result of that misfeasance. It was argued by the appellants that, if a long interval of time had elapsed between the removal of the fence and the happening of an accident from the absence of a fence, it could not be said that the accident was caused by the act of misfeasance. But that argument does not carry the defendants' case far enough, for it omits the material element that the fence was only required in times of flood, and in this case the mischief arose from the act of misfeasance at the very time when the floods came. The case might be very different if a long interval elapsed so that it would be difficult to connect the accident with the act of misfeasance. I agree, therefore, that this appeal fails, and must be dismissed.

REG. (on the Prosecution of the Guardians of the Hendon Union) v. LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD AND THE GUARDIANS OF WILLESDEN. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Local government—Poor law—Separation of parish from union—Division of "property" of union—Sum payable yearly by county council to union—Capitalised value of interest of parish—"Fixing" amount to be paid by union to parish—Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 32—Local Government Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), s. 26.

When a union is altered under the provisions of sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 by the separation from it of a parish, the Local Government Board is required by that section to ascertain the proportionate value to such parish of "the workhouses or other property" held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or benefit of the ratepayers, and to "fix the amount" to be received or paid by every parish affected by such alteration.

Under sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888, every county council, except the London County Council, shall grant to the guardians of every poor law union in their county an annual sum for certain purposes there named.

Held, that the annual sum to be granted under sect. 26 (1) is "property" of a union within the meaning of sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834.

Held also, that it is the duty of the Local Government Board under sect. 32 to ascertain, at the date of the separation of the parish from the union, what is then the proportionate value of the share of the parish in the annual sums to be thereafter received by the union under sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888, and to fix definitely as from that moment the amount to be paid by the union to the parish in respect of such share.

THIS was an appeal by the guardians of the Hendon Union from a decision of the Queen's Bench Division (Bigham and Channell, J.J.) discharging a rule for a certiorari, which had been obtained by the guardians of the Hendon Union, to bring up and quash part of an order made by the Local Government Board.

(a) Reported by E. MANLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Up to the year 1896 the parish of Willesden was included in and formed part of the Hendon Union.

At that time the Middlesex County Council was liable, under sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888, to pay to the Hendon Union the yearly sum of 2597*l.*, and also another yearly sum of 18*l.* under sect. 24 of the same Act.

The Local Government Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41) provides as follows:

Sect. 26.—(1) After the 31st March next after the passing of this Act, every county council, other than the London County Council, shall grant to the guardians of every poor law union wholly or partly in their county an annual sum for the costs of the officers of the union and of district schools to which the union contributes; and, until Parliament otherwise determine, the said annual sum shall be such sum as the Local Government Board certify to have been expended by the guardians of each poor law union during the financial year ending the 25th March next before the passing of this Act, on the salaries, remuneration, and superannuation allowances of the said officers (other than teachers in poor law schools), and on drugs and medical appliances.

On the 12th Aug. 1896 the Local Government Board issued an order whereby the parish of Willesden was, on and after the 3rd Oct. 1896, separated from the Hendon Union.

On the 13th Aug. 1896 the board issued another order whereby it was ordered (inter alia) that the laws for the relief of the poor in the parish of Willesden should, on and after the 3rd Oct. 1896, be administered by a board of guardians elected for that parish.

On the 23rd Dec. 1898 the board issued another order by which they dealt with the division of the property of the Hendon Union, as it existed up to 1896, between the union as it existed after the separation of the parish of Willesden, and the parish of Willesden. This order dealt with the workhouse, infirmary, schools, and such like matters, and, after reciting that it was necessary to provide for the apportionment of the above-mentioned annual sums of 18*l.* and 2597*l.*, it contained the following article:

Art. 5. As and when the sums of 18*l.* and 2597*l.* are received by the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union from the County Council of Middlesex in pursuance of the provisions of sect. 24 (2) (d) and of sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888, in respect of the financial year ending the 31st March 1889, and in respect of each succeeding financial year, such sums shall be apportioned by the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union between the Hendon Union and the parish of Willesden according to the respective rateable values of the union and parish for the purposes of the poor rate, according to the valuation lists in force on the 25th March next preceding the financial year in respect of which the payment is made, and the guardians of the poor of the Hendon Union shall forthwith pay to the guardians of the poor of the parish of Willesden the amount so apportioned to that parish.

For the purpose of quashing the order contained in art. 5, the guardians of the Hendon Union obtained a rule nisi for a certiorari.

Upon cause being shown, the Queen's Bench Division (Bigham and Channell, JJ.) discharged the rule.

The case is reported 19 Mag. Cas. 553; 82 L. T. Rep. 385.

The guardians of the Hendon Union appealed.

The Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 (4 & 5 Will. 4, c. 76) provides as follows:

Sect. 32. And be it further enacted that it shall be lawful for the said commissioners—(the Local Government Board has since been substituted for the commissioners)—from time to time as they may see fit by order under their hands and seal to declare any union . . . to be dissolved, or any parish or parishes, specifying the same, to be separated from or added to any such union, and as the case may be such union shall thereupon be dissolved, or such parish or parishes shall thereupon be separated from or added to such union accordingly. . . . Provided always that in every such case the said commissioners shall and they are hereby required to ascertain the proportionate value to every parish of such union of the workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or benefit of the ratepayers therein, and also the proportionate amount chargeable on every parish in respect of all the liabilities of such union existing at the time of such dissolution or alteration of the same; and the said commissioners shall thereupon fix the amount to be received, or paid, or secured to be paid, by every parish affected by such alteration; and the sum to be received, if any, by such parish shall be paid or, as the said commissioners shall direct, be secured to be paid to the overseers or guardians of the same, for the benefit of such parish and in diminution of the rates thereof and of the expense attending such alteration; and the sum to be so paid or secured to be paid by every such parish shall be raised under the direction of the said commissioners by the overseers or guardians of such parish or charged on the poor rates of such parish, as the said commissioners may see fit, and shall be paid or secured for the use and benefit of the union from which the same parish shall have been so separated, or of the persons or parishes otherwise entitled thereto, as the case may be. . . .

Page, Q.C. and Bartley Dennis for the Hendon Union.—The Local Government Board had no jurisdiction to make the order contained in art. 5 of their order of the 23rd Dec. 1898. First, the board had no jurisdiction to make any order at all with reference to the annual sums of 18*l.* and 2597*l.* payable by the Middlesex County Council to the Hendon Union under the Local Government Act 1888. Under sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834 the board is empowered to make orders as to the division of "the workhouses or other property" held by the union. These annual sums are not "property" within the meaning of sect. 32. The annuity of 2597*l.* is only payable by sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888 "until Parliament otherwise determine." The continued payment of the sum is therefore so uncertain that the expectation of receiving it regularly cannot be considered as "property" now in existence. The Legislature, in passing the Act of 1834, did not contemplate the existence of anything in the nature of the annual payments which were introduced by the Act of 1888. "Other property" refers to buildings and land, besides the actual workhouse which a union may have. Secondly, if these annual payments are "property" within sect. 32, the Local Government Board has exceeded its jurisdiction in directing an apportionment to be made every year between the union and Willesden Parish. The duty of the board under sect. 32 is to "fix the amount," once and for all, which is to be paid by the union to the parish. What they have done is to direct a new calculation to be made every year as to the amount which the union is to pay the parish. The board had no power to do that. There is under this order no finality between the parties such as the Act directs. The board should have ascertained the capitalised value of the annuity and then directed the union to pay, or secure to be paid, to the parish of Willesden the proportionate value of the interest of the parish in the annuity.

The Attorney-General (Sir Robert Finlay, Q.C.) (H. Sutton with him) for the Local Government Board.—The order of the board has been lawfully made. The right to be paid these annual sums is "property" within the meaning of sect. 32. "Property" is the widest term that could be used to include everything having a pecuniary value:

Jones v. Skinner, 5 L. J. 87, Ch.;

Potter v. Commissioners of Inland Revenue, 10 Ex. 147.

An annuity payable under a deed of separation and post-nuptial settlement has been held to be "property":

Jump v. Jump, 8 P. Div. 159.

It would be strange if an annuity payable under an Act of Parliament were not "property." The provision that it shall be payable "until Parliament otherwise determine" need not be considered, because a provision of that sort is implied in every Act of Parliament. Parliament can always repeal an Act that it has passed. Then, it being the duty of the Local Government Board to deal with this annuity, it is submitted that the mode in which the board has dealt with it is the proper mode. No directions are given in the Act as to how the property is to be adjusted. That is left to the discretion of the board. It has not been shown that there is anything inequitable in the way that the board has dealt with the matter. They have "fixed the amount" to be paid by the union to Willesden Parish. Id certum est quod certum reddi potest. The mode in which each year, as the union receives a payment, the amount which it shall pay over to the parish is to be calculated is perfectly definite.

SMITH, M.R.—It is impossible to read the judgments delivered in this case in the court below without seeing that my brother Channell felt considerable difficulty in coming to the conclusion which he finally arrived at, in agreement with my brother Bigham, that the rule ought to be discharged. The guardians of the Hendon Union, who had obtained the rule nisi for a certiorari, have appealed from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division. The real point in dispute is as to the true construction of sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834. Now, the facts which raise that point are very short. The parishes of Hendon and Willesden were formerly parts of one union called the Hendon Union. In 1896 the parish of Willesden was separated from the Hendon Union. Thereupon a question arose as to how the property which belonged to the union at the date of the separation should be divided between the parish of Willesden on the one side and the Hendon Union, as it now exists, on the other side. The question depends on the true construction of sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834, which runs as follows: [His Lordship read it.] The first question that arises on reading that section is at what moment are the commissioners—now the Local Government Board—to "ascertain the proportionate value to every parish of such union of the workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union"? It seems to me clear that the intention of the Legislature was that, upon the separation of a parish from a union, the property of the union is then to be divided, once and for all, between the parish and the union that is left, so that after the separation the division between the parish and the union shall be complete, and they need have nothing more to do with each other in the future. Then comes the question what is the meaning of the words "workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union." It is well known that in many parts of England fields and lands are sometimes owned by parishes, and I think that the words "or other property" were intended to refer to such lands or any other property besides the workhouse which a union might happen to own. The Legislature could not in 1834 have had in its mind such a different class of property as that which, for short, I may call the Parliamentary annuity, which only came into existence under sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888. Under that Act the Hendon Union, as well as every other union in England, became entitled to an annual sum payable by the county council. It is true that in this section the expression "until Parliament otherwise determine" is used, but I do not think that there is much virtue in these words, because an Act of Parliament can always alter any previous Act. Under that section, then, the Hendon Union up to 1896 had an annuity from the county council of 2597l. a year, and as long as the parish of Willesden remained part of the Hendon Union, the ratepayers of Willesden participated in the benefits of that annuity jointly with the ratepayers of other parishes in the union. But now that Willesden has been separated from the union, it is in future to pay its own expenses, and the property of the union is to be divided between Willesden and the union as it remains after the separation, under the provisions of sect. 32 of the Act of 1834. How does that section affect the rights of the union to this annuity? In my opinion the difficulty has arisen in consequence of this new kind of property being given to the union by the Act of 1888. The learned counsel who appeared for the Hendon Union argued in the first place that this annuity is not "property" within the meaning of sect. 32, because it could not have been in the contemplation of the Legislature in 1834. I agree that the annuity was not in the minds of the Legislature in 1834 when the Act was passed, but it seems to me impossible to say that a sum of money payable de anno in annum under the sanction of an Act of Parliament is not property. In my judgment the annuity payable to the Hendon Union under sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888 is "property" within the meaning of sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834. The next question is, How is "the proportionate value to every parish of such union" of that annuity of 2597l. to be ascertained? I agree that that is a difficult matter, but in my judgment it is not impossible. If this annuity could be put up for sale by auction I am sure that there are plenty of persons who would be ready to buy it, although they did not know how long its payment would continue to be sanctioned by Parliament. The annuity is payable under an Act of Parliament and, in my opinion, has a marketable value, or, if that be not a correct expression to use, it has an ascertainable value. That is the kind of value that was contemplated by sect. 32. The section contemplates the capitalisation of the value of the workhouse for the purpose of ascertaining the proportions in which the division of the value of the workhouse is to be made between the union and the parish that is separated from it. And in the same way I think that the ready money value or capitalised value of this annuity of 2597l. ought to be found for the purpose of making the division between the Hendon Union and the parish of Willesden. If the Local Government Board had come to the conclusion that the value of the annuity ought to be divided between the union and the parish in proportion to their rateable values, I do not think I should have said that the board had done wrong. But that is not what the board has done. It has arrived at a proportionate value by reference to the rateable values of these two bodies in future years. That, I think, is the vice of the order issued by the board on the 23rd Dec. 1898. With reference to the division of the property of the union, the Act, in my opinion, does not contemplate anything being left to be settled in the future, but requires the adjustment to be made in presenti, at the time when the separation takes place. That this was the scheme of the Act is shown, I think, by the subsequent words of sect. 32: "And the said commissioners shall thereupon fix the amount to be received, or paid, or secured to be paid, by every parish affected by such alteration; and the sum to be received, if any, by such parish shall be paid or, as the said commissioners shall direct, be secured to be paid to the overseers or guardians of the same, for the benefit of such parish, and in diminution of the rates thereof and of the expense attending such alteration." The Local Government Board has, in my opinion, exceeded its jurisdiction in making the order contained in par. 5 of their order of the 23rd Dec. 1898, and the rule for a certiorari to bring up and quash that paragraph must, in my opinion, be made absolute. For these reasons I think the appeal should be allowed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I think that Channell, J. has put admirably the reason why he ought not to have concurred with the judgment of Bigham, J., but should have insisted on his own doubt in the matter. He says this: "The difficulty in my mind was this—whether or not the Local Government Board had not in this case fixed the proportion between the two new unions in reference to a matter which it was the very object and intention of the order to put an end to. When this area was one union, the different parts of it profited by any increase in the value of any other part; and, if Willesden increased in value, the ratepayers of Hendon profited by that increase of value when the two formed one body. If Hendon increased in value, the ratepayers in Willesden profited by that increase in value; and one of the very objects of dividing the union was, because both Hendon and Willesden had grown rather large, to make each of them entirely independent of any increase in the other." I agree with Channell, J. that that really is the scheme of this legislation of 1834, and I think that, when the Act is carefully read, there will be found in the language used a direct confirmation of this view. The first proviso in sect. 32 runs as follows: "Provided always that in every such case the said commissioners shall and they are hereby required to ascertain the proportionate value to every parish of such union of the workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union for the use of the poor or benefit of the ratepayers therein, and also the proportionate amount chargeable on every parish in respect of all the liabilities of such union existing at the time of such dissolution or alteration of the same; and the said commissioners shall thereupon fix the amount to be received, or paid, or secured to be paid, by every parish affected by such alteration." Surely that is an amount which is to be ascertained in reference to the state of facts existing at the time of such dissolution or alteration. These are the words used in the Act in respect of the liabilities of a union, and they seem to me to involve, with reference to rights as well as liabilities, an ascertainment, then and there, in presenti, of the respective rights of the two parties; the object being that they shall no longer be partners in a joint adventure, each reaping the benefit of the fluctuating fortunes of the other, which previously had all enured to their common benefit or their common liabilities, but that in future each should stand on its own base, and that before they are parted their rights inter se should be finally ascertained. Now, when we come to consider what is to be done under this proviso, what do we find? The Legislature contemplated that this valuation, when made, was to be made once and for all, so that the result will be, not an obligation to be renewed afterwards from time to time according to a fluctuating standard, but an amount then and there ascertainable, an amount which by the terms of the statute can only be paid or secured to be paid in a particular way. But what has been done in the present case? It seems to me that that which is called a valuation is in point of fact, when it is analysed, a refusal to value at the time. Take the case of a freehold property owned by a union and bringing in certain rents. The Attorney-General hardly disputed, in fact I think he admitted, that the proper way of ascertaining the value of that freehold property under this section would be to take the value of the corpus and then ascertain the proportionate values to the parties by reference to the then existing condition of affairs. That would be one way, and it seems to me it would be the right way. I have the authority of the Attorney-General for saying that at all events it would not be a wrong way. It would certainly be an ascertaining there and then, in presenti, of the actual value. Now let us contrast with that the proposed alternative. Instead of assessing the value of the corpus at once, the Local Government Board has left the rights of the parties in each future year to be ascertained by the standard of their then respective rateable values. That is to say, the Local Government Board has declined to fix the valuation, but has left the question to be determined in the future by reference to the yearly varying fortunes of the two parties. That seems to me, as it did to Channell, J., to be the very thing which the Legislature wished to be avoided. With reference to the question whether these annual payments under sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888 are "property" within sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834, I feel no doubt whatever. I entirely agree with all that my Lord has said. Though it may be difficult to appraise the capitalised value of this uncertain annuity, it is not impossible. The fact that the Legislature appears to have contemplated the possibility of its being withdrawn does not appear to me to alter the case materially, because whether or not the provision, "until Parliament otherwise determine," was actually inserted in the section it would be equally part of the law, since the Legislature can always repeal that which it has enacted. Therefore I think this annuity is "property," and that its value is capable of assessment, and it seems to me that the proper way to adjust its division is by reference to the existing proportions in which the parties are entitled to it. I do not think it is conceivable that it would be right to apportion the capitalised value of the workhouses or any freehold property possessed by the union except upon one principle—that is, the principle of dividing it there and then, once and for all, upon the existing rateable values. I do not think it would be possible to conciliate with that view a claim to divide an annual sum upon a different principle altogether—namely, upon the principle of the fluctuating values of the future. If one is right, the other seems to me to be wrong. I think that the right principle is that which has reference to values on the existing basis.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. In this case a union has been divided by the separation from it of a particular parish under the provisions of sect. 32 of the Poor Law Amendment Act 1834. The question is as to the mode in which the property of the union is to be dealt with. Now, it seems to me that one cannot read the enactment without seeing that the scheme of the Legislature was that the rights of the parishes, or rather of the separated bodies, were to be ascertained once for all at the time when the separation takes place. The scheme is not very minute or elaborate, but the general outline of it appears to me to be that one of the separated bodies is to take, not necessarily the whole, but, it may be, a part of the property of the union, and to pay the other the value, to be ascertained at that time, of the interest of that other body in the property which has been thus taken. For that purpose the commissioners, who are now represented by the Local Government Board, are required to ascertain the proportionate value to every parish of such union of the workhouses or other property held or enjoyed by such union. They are to "ascertain the value." No particular mode of doing this is prescribed, but no difference is drawn between the mode of ascertaining the value of a workhouse and the mode of ascertaining the value of other property. As regards a workhouse, it is obvious that the view of the Legislature was that a capital value should be put upon it, and then, if it were kept by one of the separating bodies, that body should pay to the other bodies the proportionate value of the interests which they had in it. The section goes on: "And the said commissioners shall thereupon"—i.e., upon the ascertainment of the proportional values—"fix the amount to be received, or paid, or secured to be paid, by every parish affected by such alteration; and the sum to be received, if any, by such parish shall be paid, or as the said commissioners shall direct, be secured to be paid to the overseers or guardians of the same for the benefit of such parish and in diminution of the rates thereof and of the expense attending such alteration; and the sum to be so paid or secured to be paid by every such parish shall be raised, under the direction of the said commissioners, by the overseers or guardians of such parish or charged on the poor rates of such parish, as the said commissioners may see fit." This, therefore, is a direction to the commissioners to ascertain first of all the fixed amount to be received or paid, and then the mode in which that sum, when it has been ascertained, is to be received or paid. There is no difficulty in working that scheme out in regard to workhouses and the other property which the Legislature probably had in mind when the Act was passed. The difficulty which has arisen in the present case springs from the fact that in 1888 an Act was passed in which the Legislature provided for the payment by county councils to parishes and unions of annual sums of money. Those payments are property of a totally different kind from anything that they enjoyed in 1834. I need not read the sections of the Local Government Act 1888 which provide for the payment of these annual sums, but it is quite clear that the payment is subject to the future will of Parliament and may hereafter be withdrawn. Consequently a difficulty arises in putting a capital value upon these sums, in the same way as a value might be put upon property like a workhouse. Still, it seems to me that it is possible to put a value upon these annual sums. I have no doubt that they are "property" within the meaning of sect. 32 of the Act of 1834, and that a value can be put upon them. When a value has been put upon them, then the proper sum which is to be received or paid, as the case may be, is to be ascertained on the same principle as the value of the interest of a parish in the union workhouse. For example, if the workhouse in the present case remains in the possession of the Hendon Union, the union would have to pay to the parish of Willesden the value of that parish's interest in the workhouse. So if under the scheme these annual sums continue to be paid to the Hendon Union, it would be the duty of the union to pay to the parish of Willesden the value of the interest of the parish in those sums, such value to be ascertained upon the same principles and at the same time as the value of the interest of the parish in the workhouse. I do not think that there is any difference in principle between the two cases. That being so, it seems to me that the Local Government Board have not complied with the terms of the Act of 1834, and consequently that the appeal ought to be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

FARNHAM FLINT COMPANY v. FARNHAM UNION.

[Ct. of App.]

Wednesday, Dec. 12, 1900.

(Before SMITH, M.R., COLLINS and STIBLING, L.JJ.)FARNHAM FLINT COMPANY v. FARNHAM UNION (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

*Poor rate — Assessment — Gravel pit — Gravel exhausted in part — Annual value — Mode of ascertaining annual value.By three agreements, made respectively on the 24th June 1897, the 15th April 1898, and the 14th Nov. 1898, a company purchased from the landowner three plots of gravel comprising respectively one acre and a half, one acre, and one acre of land.The company was entitled to the exclusive occupation of the plots until the expiration of the respective agreements, the first being for one year and a half and the other two for one year each.A poor rate was made on the 8th Dec. 1898, and the company were rated as occupiers of the three and a half acres, of which they were then in rate-able occupation.At that date the gravel was exhausted in the two acres and a half comprised in the two earlier agreements, and the land was used only for the purpose of storing gravel already dug, and the gravel in the remaining acre was being dug.
The price paid for the first plot was 150l., and for each of the other plots 175l.The company were rated at 400l. rateable value.The quarter sessions, on appeal, held that the annual value of the land at the date of the rate ought to be taken at the amount of rent at which the land could then reasonably be expected to be let to a yearly tenant, regard being had to the value of the gravel in the unexhausted acre of land and to the value of the other two acres and a half for storage purposes, and upon that principle reduced the assessment to 242l. rateable value.Held (dismissing the appeal), that the quarter sessions had applied the proper principle in ascertaining the annual value of the hereditament in question.Rex v. Bedworth (8 East, 387) approved; Reg. v.
Whaddon (32 L. T. Rep. 633; L. Rep. 10 Q. B.
230) distinguished.*

THIS was an appeal by the Farnham Union from the order of the Divisional Court (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.) upon a special case stated by quarter sessions.

A special case was stated by the quarter sessions for the county of Surrey upon an appeal against a rate, made on the 8th Dec. 1898, in which rate the Farnham Flint Company were rated as the occupiers of a gravel pit.

The company carried on business as gravel and sand merchants, and for the purposes of their business from time to time entered into agreements with the owners of land for the purchase of gravel therein. By those agreements full right of entry upon the land was given for the purpose of digging for and carrying away the gravel. The company, having dug and removed the gravel, levelled the ground from which the gravel had been taken, replaced the top sod, and restored the land to the owner.

For some time prior to the making of the rate appealed against, the company had been in the habit of making such agreements with the owner in respect of portions of a certain piece of land known as Ward's Pit, each plot of land containing gravel being the subject of a separate agreement.

Upon an agreement being entered into for the sale to the company by the owner of the gravel under any plot of land, the extent of land to which such agreement related was marked out by stumps, and the exclusive occupation of the land so marked out was given to the company upon signature of the agreement. The work of digging for gravel was then commenced by the company.

The land from which the gravel was actually being extracted was constantly shifting as the work progressed, and, when the gravel in any portion of the land was exhausted, that portion of the land was used by the company as a store for gravel not yet sold and removed. Upon the expiration of the period allowed by any agreement, the portion of the land from which the gravel had been dug was made level with the rest of the land, and the whole of the land comprised in the agreement was restored to the owner.

The company purchased gravel from the owner on the following dates and in the following quantities: On the 14th May 1897, one acre; on the 24th June 1897, one acre and a half; on the 15th April 1898, one acre; on the 14th Nov. 1898, one acre; and on the 21st March 1899, one acre.

The agreements were all in writing. The price paid under each agreement was 175l., except under the agreement of the 24th June 1897 when the price was 150l. only, the gravel sold under that agreement being less valuable than the gravel sold under the other agreements. The period allowed under each agreement for the extraction of the gravel was one year, except under the agreement of the 24th June 1897, by which the period of one year and a half was allowed.

At the date of the rate, the 8th Dec. 1898, the company were in rateable occupation of three and a half acres of land. In two and a half acres, being the lands comprised in the agreements of the 24th June 1897 and the 15th April 1898, the gravel was exhausted. The gravel comprised in the former agreement was exhausted in March 1898, and that comprised in the latter agreement on the 1st Sept. 1898. The two and a half acres, however, continued to be in the occupation of the company, and were used by them for the purpose of storing gravel already dug. In the remaining one acre, being the land comprised in the agreement of the 14th Nov. 1898, the gravel was in process of being got.

The company were rated in respect of the land at 420l. gross estimated rental and 400l. rateable value.

The company contended that they were rateable in respect of the land in their occupation at the date of the rate appealed against; that the value of such occupation, so far as the unexhausted land was concerned, was to be ascertained from the consideration paid by the company for the occupation of such land under the agreement relating thereto in force at the date of the rate, including as part of such consideration the cost of making good the land occupied thereunder upon the expiration of the terms thereby created; that the value of such occupation, so far as the exhausted land was concerned, was to be ascertained upon the basis of what such land would let for occupation as storing ground in connection with the other lands occupied by the company; and that, if the value of the company's occupation was not to be so ascertained, it was to be ascertained from the value of the gravel in the unexhausted land then in their occupation, added to the value of so much of the exhausted land (then in their occupation) as was used by them for storage purposes.

The union contended that the proper way to ascertain the rateable value of the land was to ascertain the output of gravel dug during the year immediately preceding the making of the rate appealed against from so much of Ward's Pit as had been in their occupation at any time during such year, and to assess the rateable value of the gravel pit at a sum based upon the total royalty which (having regard to the market value of gravel during the year in the neighbourhood) the company would have paid to the owner of the land if, instead of buying the gravel, they had agreed to dig and work the gravel on payment of a royalty on each yard of gravel dug, which method of payment was admittedly frequently adopted in the neighbourhood, and that this method of calculating the rateable value was correct in point of law.

Alternatively, the union contended that the company were in occupation of more than two acres of land; that, having regard to the obligation to level the surface of the ground and replace the surface soil after removing the gravel (which would cost about 40*l.* an acre), the company had, in effect, paid or agreed to pay about 220*l.* per acre for the right to occupy the land for one year, with liberty to dig the gravel therein; that the sum of 220*l.* was equivalent to an annual rent for the land paid by a tenant who had liberty to dig gravel therein; that the company, as occupiers of the land, must be rated at the full annual value thereof during the whole period of their occupation, although during part of that period a portion of the land was available only for the purpose of storing gravel; that the decision of the Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Whaddon (32 L. T. Rep. 633; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 230) showed that the company should be rated during the whole of their occupation of the land under the written agreements at the value thereof as enhanced by the right to dig gravel therein; and that, if the principle of valuation herein stated was correct in law, the assessment appealed against was supported in fact.

The quarter sessions held that the first contention of the union was wrong in law, but that, if it were permissible to adopt that method of calculation, the assessment appealed against would be correct. They further held that the second contention of the union was wrong in law, and that the annual value of the land in the company's occupation at the date of the making of the rate ought to be taken at the amount of rent or royalty at which the same could then be reasonably expected to be let to a tenant for one year, regard being had to the value of the gravel in the unexhausted acre of land, added to the value of the two and a half acres of land for storage purposes, and on this principle they found as a fact that the amount at which the land could reasonably be expected to be so let was 252*l.*, and they accordingly fixed the gross estimated rental of the land at 252*l.* and the rateable value thereof at 242*l.* They therefore allowed the appeal, and ordered the assessments of the company's land, and the rates, to be reduced accordingly.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the quarter sessions were right in their determination.

The Parochial Assessment Act 1836 (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96) provides:

Sect. 1. Whereas it is desirable to establish one uniform mode of rating for the relief of the poor throughout England and Wales, and to lessen the cost of appeal against an unfair rate: Be it enacted by the King's most excellent Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Lords Spiritual and Temporal and Commons, in this present Parliament assembled, and by the authority of the same, that from and after such period, not being earlier than the twenty-first day of March next after the passing of this Act, as the Poor Law Commissioners shall by any order under their seal of office direct, no rate for the relief of the poor in England and Wales shall be allowed by any justices, or be of any force, which shall not be made upon an estimate of the net annual value of the several hereditaments rated thereunto; that is to say, of the rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year, free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes, and tithe commutation rentcharge, if any, and deducting therefrom the probable average annual cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent: Provided always, that nothing herein contained shall be construed to alter or affect the principles or different relative liabilities (if any) according to which different kinds of hereditaments are now by law rateable.

The learned judges in the Divisional Court differed in opinion, O'hannell, J. holding that the determination of the quarter sessions was wrong, and Bucknill, J. that it was right. The appeal was accordingly dismissed (19 Mag. Cas. 475; 82 L. T. Rep. 123).

The Farnham Union appealed.

F. Marshall, Q.C. and W. C. Byde for the appellants.—The order of quarter sessions was wrong. The judgment of O'hannell, J. in the Divisional Court, that this case was governed by the decision in Reg. v. Whaddon Overseers (32 L. T. Rep. 633; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 230), was correct, and the judgment of Bucknill, J. was wrong. In Reg. v. Whaddon Overseers (ubi sup.) the appellants were assessed in respect of ten acres of coprolite land at the full enhanced value of the whole, although they were never in profitable occupation at any one time of more than three and a half acres for the purpose of getting coprolites, and the occupation of ten acres was a shifting occupation, and the Court of Queen's Bench held that the appellants were properly rated. The case of Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company (29 L. T. Rep. 174; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 515) is strongly in favour of the appellants. In that case it was held that the cemetery company, which owned the burial ground and sold plots for graves, was properly assessed at the amount received during the preceding year for the sale of plots. Blackburn, J. in that case said: "The Legislature . . . has taken as a basis the rent which a tenant from year to year would give during the year preceding the time of making the rate"; and that "No injustice will be done if the company are rated in every year according to the value which a hypothetical tenant would give for the occupation in the preceding year, and according to this rule the company's receipts in one year will govern the rateable value of the cemetery in the next." The case of Staley v. Castleton Overseers (33 L. J. 178, M. C.), upon which the respondents rely, does not touch the question in the present case. That case was discountenanced in Hoyle and Jackson v. Oldham Union (70 L. T. Rep. 741; (1894) 2 Q. B. 372), in which it was held that mills which were closed owing to a strike were properly assessed at the same value as before the strike, and not as mere warehouses for the machinery. The difficulty in a case like this arises from the difficulty of applying the rule laid down in sect. 1 of the Parochial Assessment Act 1836 to a case in which it is singularly inapplicable because the subject-matter is not such as is let upon a tenancy from year to year. In such a case the words of sect. 1 must have "some reasonable cy-près intendment given to them," as was said in Great Eastern Railway Company v. Haughley Churchwardens (14 L. T. Rep. 548; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 666, 685). The definition in sect. 1 ought to be read in the light of the preamble so as to establish "one uniform mode of rating." In cases of this kind that uniformity is obtained by assessing the premises upon the principle for which the appellants contend.

R. Cunningham Glen for the respondents.—The decision of the quarter sessions was based upon the right principle and should be upheld. The appellants are seeking to apply some new principle to the rating of hereditaments of this kind, instead of that which is established by sect. 1 of the Parochial Assessment Act 1836. The principle established by the statute must be applied in a case like this, where the rateable property diminishes or wastes, and the annual value must be ascertained at the time when the rate is made. In East London Railway Company v. Whitechurch (30 L. T. Rep. 412; L. Rep. 7 H. L. 81, 85) Lord Cairns, L.C. said: "When an Act of Parliament is passed authorising the construction of a railway—authorising lands and houses to be taken for the purpose of its construction, and the railway to be made upon the site of the houses, if nothing farther should be found in the Act of Parliament, it would of course follow that the railway company would be at liberty to pull down the houses which it had purchased, and to make the line. And if, in the process of constructing the railway, the premises along the line became of a less assessable value than they were before, that, in the absence of any statutable provision upon the subject, would be an occurrence within those ordinary powers which every landowner has over his own land in any parish—powers which enable him to use it for any purpose which he thinks fit. And if, in the course of using it, he renders the land of less assessable value, the parish and parochial authorities have no choice but to submit." All that applies exactly to the present case. The value of this hereditament must be taken at the time of making the rate by ascertaining what a tenant from year to year would then give for it in its then condition. The case of Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company (ubi sup.) was one of those exceptional cases in which there is no other method of ascertaining what the hypothetical tenant will give except by ascertaining what he can afford to give by considering what has been, and therefore is likely to be, made out of the premises:

Cartwright v. Sculcoates Union, 82 L. T. Rep. 157; (1900) A. C. 150.

This is not an exceptional case, and the ordinary rule can be applied. The case of Rez v. Bedworth (8 East, 387; 9 E. R. 476) is a direct authority in favour of the respondents. That case has always been followed and applied in practice. The dictum of Blackburn, J. in Staley v. Castleton Overseers (ubi sup.), that Rez v. Bedworth "is not law at the present time," which is reported in 33 L. J. 178, 180, M. C., is not to be found in the other reports of the case. The passages in the judgment of Blackburn, J. in Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company (ubi sup.), which have been cited by the appellants, do not appear in any reports except the Law Reports, and, if he said that the value for the preceding year must be taken, he was clearly wrong.

F. Marshall, Q.C. replied.

SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal by the Farnham Union from the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division dismissing their appeal from the decision of the quarter sessions. The judges of the Queen's Bench Division differed, Bucknill, J. holding that the quarter sessions were right in altering the rate, and Channell, J. holding that the quarter sessions were wrong and that the rate as made was correct. Now, I am going to confine my judgment to the questions which have been stated in the special case, for we have no power to travel outside of those questions. I must say that the learned judges in the court below did not confine their judgments to the questions stated in the special case, but went far outside of those questions, which they had no right to do. The material facts of this case are short and clear. The point raised in the case relates to a tract of gravel, near Farnham, which is called a gravel field. The Farnham Flint Company took from the owner of the gravel field three and a half acres. When those three and a half acres had to be assessed to the rate, in what way ought the rateable value to be ascertained? There can be no doubt that the way in which the rateable value must be ascertained is the way laid down by sect. 1 of the statute 6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 96—that is, it must be ascertained what a hypothetical tenant would give for the hereditament as tenant from year to year, and certain specified deductions must be made. The rating authority must find out what a hypothetical tenant would give for the hereditament as tenant from year to year; they have nothing to do with the occupying tenant. Now, with regard to these three and a half acres of gravel, what has the assessment committee to ascertain? They must find out what a hypothetical tenant would give for the hereditament as tenant from year to year with a right to exhaust the gravel. I will refer to a passage in the judgment of Lord Esher, M.R. in Hoyle and Jackson v. Oldham Assessment Committee (70 L. T. Rep. 741; (1894) 2 Q. B. 372), where he said: "It seems to me a plainer case never could be. It is admitted by everybody that what the assessment committee had to do was to assess the occupiers of this mill in respect of their occupation for the coming year, and they had to say what at that moment in their judgment a hypothetical tenant from year to year would give as rent for those premises, after making allowance for the Parliamentary deductions." That is an absolutely correct statement of the duty of the assessment committee in ascertaining the rateable value of the hereditament which has to be rated. In the present case the company had been assessed and rated in respect of their previous occupation. Time went on and a new rate was about to be made upon the company in respect of their occupation of the three and a half acres. At that time it happened that the gravel was exhausted in two and a half acres, and unexhausted in the remaining acre. The assessment committee has said that a tenant from year to year for the coming year would give as much for the whole hereditament as if the whole of the gravel had been unexhausted. That cannot be a true proposition. It might just as well be said that, if all the gravel had been exhausted when the new rate came to be made, the hypothetical tenant would pay the same rent for the three and a half acres without any gravel as if all the gravel were still there. It is only necessary to state that proposition to show that it cannot be true. That is really the position of this case when once the facts are made clear. The company say that the assessment committee were wrong in assessing them at the same value as when all the gravel was in the land, because at that time there was only one acre of gravel and the hypothetical tenant would not give as much rent as he would have done when all the gravel was there. It is admitted that if a house was burnt down, the assessment committee could not assess the land upon which it stood at the same rate as before the house was burnt down. The assessment committee here say that the occupiers cannot take the point that the value of the hereditament is not the same as it was before, because they themselves have used up the gravel. What authority is there for such a contention as that? There is none. The position is the same whether the occupiers themselves or anyone else exhausted the gravel. The fact is that the hereditament is of less value than it was before. Those being the facts, What is the result in this case? There are many decisions in respect of exceptional cases in which no comparison with other similar premises is possible. What has to be done in such cases? As was pointed out by Blackburn, J., long ago, in Jones v. Mersey Docks and Harbour Board (11 H. of L. Cas. 443), in such cases one must get the best test which one can get in order to ascertain what rent the hypothetical tenant from year to year would give for the premises. In the case of houses a comparison with similar houses is possible, and it is only in exceptional cases that recourse to exceptional means must be had in order to ascertain what the hypothetical tenant would give for the premises because the ordinary means are not applicable. The case decided by Lord Ellenborough, C.J., Res v. Bedworth (8 East, 387; 9 R. R. 476), is, in my opinion, of the highest importance upon this question, and governs the present case. Then, as to the questions stated in this special case. The first statement is as follows: "The assessment committee contend that the proper way to ascertain the rateable value of the land was to ascertain the output of gravel dug during the year immediately preceding the making of the rate appealed against from so much of Ward's Pit as had been in their occupation at any time during such year, and to assess the rateable value of the gravel pit at a sum based upon the total royalty which (having regard to the market value of gravel during the year in the neighbourhood) the company would have paid to the owners of the land if instead of buying the gravel they had agreed to dig and work the gravel on payment of a royalty on each yard of gravel dug, which method of payment was admittedly frequently adopted in the neighbourhood, and that this method of calculating the rateable value was correct in law." That is the first question which arises. I do not agree that the assessment committee ought to take the value to the sitting tenant during the preceding year; they must take the rent which the hypothetical tenant would give for the succeeding year. Therefore I answer that first question against the contention of the assessment committee, and think that the quarter sessions were right. Then comes the second question: "Alternatively, the assessment committee contended that the company were in occupation of more than two acres of land; that, having regard to the burden of the covenant to level the surface of the ground and replace the surface soil after removing the gravel (which work it was found would cost about 40l. an acre) the appellants had in effect paid or agreed to pay about 220l. per acre for the right to occupy the land for one year with liberty to dig the gravel therein; that the sum of 220l. was equivalent to an annual rent for the land paid by a tenant who had liberty to dig gravel therein; that the company as occupiers of the land must be rated at the full annual value thereof during the whole period of their occupation, although during part of that period a portion of the land was available only for the purpose of storing gravel; that the decision of the Queen's Bench in Reg. v. Whaddon (32 L. T. Rep. 633; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 230) showed that the company should be rated during the whole of the occupation of the land under the written agreements at the value thereof as enhanced by the right to dig gravel therein; and that, if the principle of valuation herein stated was correct in law, the assessment appealed against was supported in fact." That contention is not according to the rule laid down in sect. 1 of the Parochial Assessment Act 1836. All that the Act says is that the value is the rent at which the premises might reasonably be expected to let from year to year. Then there is the third, and last, question: "The quarter sessions held that the first contention of the assessment committee was wrong in law, but that, if it were permissible to adopt the method of calculation therein set forth, the assessment appealed against would be correct. They further held that the second contention of the assessment committee was wrong in law, and that the annual value of the land in the company's occupation at the date of the making of the rate ought to be taken at the amount of rent or royalty at which the same could then be reasonably expected to be let to a tenant for one year, regard being had to the value of the gravel in the said unexhausted acre of land added to the value of the exhausted two and a half acres of land for storage purposes, and on that principle they found as a fact that the amount at which the land could reasonably be expected to be so let was 252*l.*, and they accordingly fixed the gross estimated rental of the lands at 252*l.*, and the rateable value thereof at 242*l.*, and allowed the appeal, and ordered the assessments of the company's land and the rate to be reduced accordingly." With the correction that they ought to have said, "let to a tenant from year to year" and not "to a tenant for one year," the answer to that question is that the quarter sessions were right in their view and followed the rule laid down in sect. 1 of the Parochial Assessment Act 1836 in all essentials, and found the rateable value upon the proper principle. I therefore come to the clear conclusion that the quarter sessions were right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

FARNHAM FLINT COMPANY v. FARNHAM UNION.

[OT. OF APP.]

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The standard to be applied must be that which is prescribed by sect. 1 of the Parochial Assessment Act 1836, which is this: "The rent at which the same might reasonably be expected to let from year to year free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes," &c. That, in its terms, points to an estimate of a future value, and not to a standard of that which is already ascertained in fact—that is, the antecedent sum paid by a tenant. The assessment committee are to find an estimate of what the hypothetical tenant from year to year would give rebus sic stantibus. In the present case there is eliminated one of the elements found in the case of Reg. v. Whaddon (ubi sup.), for we find in the special case the statement that the company were "at the date of the rate in rateable occupation of three and a half acres of land," and that in two and a half of those acres the gravel was exhausted, and that the company occupied those two and a half acres for the purpose of storing gravel already dug. Now, we have to deal with those three and a half acres, and not with any possible accretion thereto by a subsequent letting; and we must consider only those three and a half acres. The main difference between the view taken by Channell, J. in the court below and the view taken by quarter sessions is upon the question whether the annual value is to be ascertained by reference to what was paid by the occupiers during the preceding year, or by reference to what might be got during the coming year. But for the judgment of Channell, J. and some observations of Blackburn, J. in Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company (29 L. T. Rep. 174; L. Rep. 8 Q. B. 515), I would have thought that the point was too clear for discussion. The former means of ascertaining the annual value is only to be employed in special and exceptional cases. It is said that Channell, J. relied mainly upon the decision in Reg. v. Whaddon (ubi sup.). Now, that case is open to this obvious and cardinal distinction: In that case there was the initial difficulty that the person rated had a shifting occupation which at all times amounted to a holding of ten acres. The court got over that difficulty, and treated the hereditament occupied as being one of ten acres. Then all the rest followed easily; the tenant had a right to take fresh land, and therefore, in considering what the hypothetical tenant from year to year would give, the fact that the occupier had that right was always kept in view. In the present case, as I have already pointed out, the hereditament in question is limited to the three and a half acres, and we cannot take into consideration the possibility of the occupier getting more land. Now, the quarter sessions have found that "the annual value of the land in the company's occupation at the date of the making of the rate ought to be taken at the amount of rent or royalty at which the same could then be reasonably expected to be let to a tenant for one year, regard being had to the value of the gravel in the said unexhausted acre of land added to the value of the exhausted two and a half acres of land for storage purposes," and fixed the rateable value upon that principle. The only exception which can be taken to that is that they say "tenant for one year," instead of "tenant from year to year," but that is not a material error in this particular case, for it is only by straining the principle of ascertaining what a tenant from year to year would give that it can be applied here. That error could not have made any difference in this case. Subject to that correction, the quarter sessions have clearly laid down the right principle. It is necessary, I think, in view of the judgment delivered by Channell, J., and the authorities upon which he relied, to say a few words thereon. The learned judge lays it down that the value during the antecedent year must be considered, upon the authority of the case of Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company (ubi sup.) and the observations of Blackburn, J. in that case. Channell, J. said: "If any particular year is to be taken for the hypothetical tenancy, it is in cases of this class the year preceding the rate and not the year after. In Reg. v. Abney Park Cemetery Company (ubi sup.) Blackburn, J. is reported as saying, 'the Legislature has taken as the basis the rent which a tenant from year to year would give during the year preceding the time of making the rate.' If that dictum is correct, it is conclusive of the present case. In the same case Blackburn, J., at p. 250 of the Law Reports, repeats almost the same proposition: 'No injustice will be done if the company are rated in every year according to the value which a hypothetical tenant would give for the occupation in the preceding year, and, according to this rule, the company's receipts in one year will govern the rateable value of the cemetery in the next.' My brother Bucknill has drawn my attention to the fact that these two passages are omitted in the report of the Abney Park case in the Law Journal (42 L. J. 124, M. C.) and in the LAW TIMES (29 L. T. Rep. 174)." It seems to me that there are two errors in that part of the judgment of Channell, J. His first error is in relying on those observations of Blackburn, J. as holding what he thought was held, because I do not think that they are an authority for his proposition. The second error is that there is a fallacy underlying his proposition, because he confounds the duration of the tenancy with the continuance of the hereditament occupied. I do not think that Blackburn, J. decided that the preceding year was to be taken as finally fixing the value. The passages in his judgment which have been cited do not appear in the other reports. It was not necessary for that learned judge to say so in that case, and, if he did say so, it would be contrary to the authorities, because there the company received so much during the preceding year, and it was possible to get as much during the next year, and therefore the hypothetical tenant might reasonably be expected to give as much for the next year. Another dictum of Blackburn, J. in Staley v. Castleton Overseers (33 L. J. 178, 180, M. C.) has been referred to and relied on by the appellants, that Rex v. Bedworth (ubi sup.) "is not law at the present time." There, again, that dictum does not appear in the report in 5 B. & S. 505 and the other contemporary reports. On the other hand, the case of Rex v. Bedworth is still regarded as an authority. In that case, where the question arose as to the rating of a coal mine, which had ceased to be productive and was not being worked, Lord Ellenborough, C.J., said: "Here the mine itself is exhausted, the subject-matter of profit is gone, although the rent, which was no doubt calculated upon the probable average produced during the whole term, be still payable. The failure of the coal will not discharge the lessee's covenant to pay rent: perhaps he may have calculated upon that event, and may have received during the former part of his term an adequate value from the then produce of the mine to compensate the continuance of the rent to the end of the term. But, with respect to the parish, he is only rateable for the concurrent annual value during the period for which the rate is made; and when the thing which he occupies no longer affords any such concurrent value the subject-matter of the rating is gone." If that is true in a case where the whole subject-matter is gone, it must be equally true, in my opinion, when a part of the subject-matter is gone. I find that that case was cited in Reg. v. Westbrook (10 Q. B. 178), and to a large extent was the basis of the judgment of Lord Denman, C.J. therein. The observations of Lord Denman, C.J. in the latter case are very much in point in the present case. He said: "The rate is always imposed with reference to the existing value; whether temporary or enduring is immaterial. A case was supposed of a brickfield worked out in less than a year to meet the demand of some enormous contract for a public work; the consequence would be that the land would have a very much increased value for the year, and it would be only reasonable that it should have an increased rate for that year: in the following year its value might sink almost to nothing, and the rate ought to fall proportionately, even to nothing, if, the brick earth being exhausted, the land, like a exhausted coal mine, should become entirely unproductive." Now, that reference to an exhausted coal mine is obviously taken from the case of Rex v. Bedworth (ubi sup.). Lord Denman further goes on to say: "No injustice would be done if in every year the occupier could be assessed according to the actual value in that year; and it is the duty of the overseers to arrive at this as nearly as they can." That seems to me to be exactly in point in the present case, and the observations as to the position when the brick earth is exhausted apply here. Upon these grounds I think that the judgment of Bucknill, J. was right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. WILSON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Practice—Trial—Venue—Transfer of action—Prerogative of Crown—Selection of tribunal—Discretion of Attorney-General.

Where an action is brought by the Attorney-General, at the relation of private individuals, it is not his practice to exercise the prerogative of the Crown and to select the tribunal by which the action shall be tried. He does not interfere with the discretion of the court. All that he does is by his fiat to authorise the relators to proceed in a matter involving public interest. But he does not clothe them with the prerogative of the Crown, nor has he any intention of so doing.

Decision of Kekewich, J. reversed.

THIS action was brought by the Attorney-General (at the relation of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Sunderland) and the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of the borough of Sunderland as plaintiffs against J. and W. Wilson and Sons as defendants.

The writ, to which the fiat of the Attorney-General had been duly obtained, was taken out in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice on the 18th April 1900.

The plaintiffs by their statement of claim alleged that the defendants had excavated the soil of certain premises in their occupation, adjoining a street in the borough of Sunderland, which they alleged was a public highway, and had neglected to maintain a retaining wall, and that by reason thereof large portions of the retaining wall had fallen down and a large area of the street had subsided, rendering the highway impassable and dangerous; and they claimed an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing the alleged public nuisances and requiring them to restore the surface of the street and re-erect the wall; and they also claimed damages.

The defence amounted to a general denial of the allegations of the plaintiffs.

An application was made by the defendants, upon a general summons for directions, asking that the action might be transferred from the Chancery Division to the Durham Assizes for trial by a special jury.

The main ground for the application was that it was desirable that there should be a view of the locus in quo.

The application was opposed by the plaintiffs on the ground that it was an interference with the prerogative right of the Crown to select its own court; and also on the merits.

It was decided by Kekewich, J. (83 L. T. Rep. 569) that the Attorney-General having, in the deliberate exercise of his discretion, selected the Chancery Division for the trial of the action, and in so doing he was exercising the prerogative of the Crown, his selection could not be interfered with by the court unless an extremely strong case were made against the propriety of his choice. His Lordship accordingly decided that in the present case the action must remain in the Chancery Division, although he was of opinion that if the question had to be decided simply upon the ground of convenience, a transfer of the action to the Queen's Bench Division to be tried at the Durham Assizes ought to be ordered.

Subsequently to that decision, the Attorney-General intimated to the defendants that, as a matter of fact, he had not exercised any discretion in the case, and had not selected the Chancery Division as the tribunal by which the action should be tried.

The defendants accordingly now appealed from the decision of Kekewich, J.

Renshaw, Q.C. (with him Edward Shortt) for the appellants.—In deciding the question raised upon the defendants' application in this case, Kekewich, J. did so on the mistaken assumption, as it now appears, that the Attorney-General, when granting his fiat, had exercised his discretion as to the Division in which the action should be tried. But since the hearing of the application before the learned judge, the Attorney-General has authorised the defendants to state that, as a matter of fact, he exercised no discretion of the kind. It is not apparently the practice for him to do so. He does not go into the facts of the case for the purpose of determining in which court it shall be tried. On the contrary, the selection of the court rests entirely with the plaintiff in each particular case. As regards the present case, the matter in dispute being a purely local one, it would be more convenient that it should be tried on the spot with a jury who would have a view, and that can only take place at Durham. There would consequently be a saving of expense, and I accordingly ask that there should be a transfer of the action to the Queen's Bench Division, in order that there may be a trial at the Durham Assizes with a special jury. The case comes within the principles laid down in Jenkins v. Bushby, 64 L. T. Rep. 213; (1891) 1 Ch. 484.

The court has a complete discretion as to the mode of trial in the present case, just as if it were an action between private parties:

President, &c., of the College of St. Mary Magdalen, Oxford, v. Attorney-General, 6 H. L. Cas. 189, at p. 210.

Attorney-General v. Vivian, 1 Buss. 226, at p. 236.

Although Kekewich, J. decided against the defendants, under the misapprehension as to the Attorney-General having exercised a discretion, he expressed his opinion that on the ground of convenience it would be better that the transfer asked for should be made; and therefore he would have so directed if it had been left entirely to him to determine the question.

Alexander Glen (Warrington, Q.C. with him) for the respondents.—There is no difference between the Attorney-General suing ex officio and at the relation of private individuals. He might have sued alone for an injunction for obstruction:

Attorney-General v. Cockermouth Local Board, 30 L. T. Rep. 590; L. Rep. 18 Eq. 172;

Attorney-General v. Barker, 4 My. & Cr. 262.

The Judicature Acts have not abrogated the right of the Attorney-General:

Attorney-General v. Constable, 4 Ex. Div. 172;

Dixon v. Farrer, 17 Q. B. Div. 658;

Ann. Pr. 1901, note to Order V., r. 9.

As to the merits, the only thing suggested is that there should be a view. But a view would not assist. Moreover it would be inconvenient to transfer this action. It is too heavy a case for the assizes, and there is a point of law which would involve two hearings.

No reply was called for.

RIGBY, L.J.—In this case the learned judge in the court below, as I read his judgment, has thought that, on the merits properly so-called, he would have sent the case for trial to the Queen's Bench Division without deciding now whether it should be tried with or without a jury, leaving all that to be determined in the Queen's Bench Division. But he felt himself hampered because he supposed that as Her Majesty's Attorney-General had elected the Chancery Division as his tribunal in which he chose to have the case tried, he was exercising the prerogative right of the Crown, and the court had no right to interfere. Now, with regard to that last point, I think it is perfectly plain. Perfectly plain it is now in one sense, because we have it from the Attorney-General that he never intended to exercise any such prerogative right; and he does not wish to interfere with the discretion of the court in any way. Even if he had not given us that information, I should have arrived at precisely the same conclusion, for, from all that I know of the practice of the Attorney-General, and, I will add, the reason of the case, I think it never has been the practice for the Attorney-General to exercise in that manner the prerogative of the Crown, assuming him to have it. All that he does is by his fiat to authorise the relators to go on with the matter involving public interest, so long as he thinks it right that they shall be permitted to go on. He does not clothe them with the prerogative of the Crown. He has no intention of doing so. They take the step which they think right and proper, and they take it with no greater sanction, no greater solemnity, than they would if they were only acting as plaintiffs. I therefore come to the conclusion that the Attorney-General has not expressed his election, and that, therefore, the question of election by him is altogether out of the case. That seems to me to resolve the question without going into questions which may be of importance as to what would take place if he had elected. I think we are at liberty, and we are bound, to treat the case as if it were only an election by the plaintiffs, who are also relators, to bring their action where it has been brought. That being so, I see no reason to differ from the opinion which I understand to be held by Kekewich, J. on the merits of the case. And I think we now ought to make the order for the transfer which he would have made if he had not felt himself hampered by the prerogative of the Crown. The appeal will accordingly be allowed. The appellants will get the costs of the appeal in any event, and the costs below will be costs in the action.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. Assuming that the Attorney-General was an actor in this case—that is, assuming that he had to be treated as a party to these proceedings, and assuming that he had chosen his court, which I take it the Attorney-General in a case in which the Crown was interested would have a right to do, it still seems to me quite plain, on what we now know the

UPPERTON v. RIDLEY AND ANOTHER. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Police—Pension—Mode of calculation—"Annual pay"—Special duty allowance—Police Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45), s. 1; sched. 1, part 1, r. 1; part 3, r. 11.

By the Police Act 1890 a constable, who has completed a certain time of service, is entitled to a pension which, by rule 11 of the 1st schedule, is to be calculated "according to the amount of his annual pay at the date of his retirement."

A constable was selected for permanent special duty at the House of Lords, and continued to serve in that capacity for some years up to the date of his retirement."

During the whole period of this special service the constable received a special allowance of 7s. a week in addition to his ordinary pay under the scale for the time being in force by the authority of the Home Secretary.

Held (dismissing the appeal), that the special allowance was not part of the "annual pay" of the constable, within the meaning of the Act, for the purpose of calculating his pension.

THIS was an appeal by Upperton from the decision of the Divisional Court (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.) upon a special case stated by quarter sessions.

Upperton appealed to the quarter sessions for the county of London from the decision of the police authority for the metropolitan police district, under the police Act 1890, refusing to reconsider his claim for an increased amount of pension.

The respondents were Sir Matthew White Ridley, the Home Secretary, and Sir Edward Bradford, the Commissioner of Police of the metropolis.

The appeal was dismissed subject to the opinion of the High Court upon a case stated, which, so far as is material, stated the following facts:

Upperton joined the metropolitan police force on the 30th Dec. 1872, and on the 1st Jan. 1899 he had completed not less than twenty-five years' approved service as a police constable. He had previously duly signed an acceptance of the provisions of the Police Act 1890. He had given all requisite notices of his desire to retire and to receive a pension, and he was entitled as of right by the Police Act 1890 to retire and receive a pension for life of two-thirds of his annual pay at the date of his retirement.

On the 11th March 1894 Upperton, having already served for nine years as a police constable at the Houses of Parliament, was selected by the Commissioners of Police for permanent duty at the House of Lords, and continued to serve in that capacity until the 2nd Jan. 1899, the date of his retirement.

The duties of Upperton at the House of Lords were to preserve the peace, to keep order, to protect the person and property of the High Court of Parliament and of persons resorting thereto, to attend fire drill, and generally to act as a police constable in pursuance of his oath and under the orders of the commissioners.

From the 11th March 1894 to the 2nd Jan. 1899 Upperton was paid every week the sum of 32s., being the ordinary pay of a constable of his rank and service, and an additional sum of 7s. in respect of the special duty upon which he was employed.

Some constables attend at the Houses of Parliament for special duty during the session of Parliament only; but all constables attending there, whether permanently or for the session only equally receive a special duty allowance of 1s. a day.

It was stated in evidence by Mr. Bathurst, chief clerk to the Commissioners of Police, that the commissioners were under no obligation to pay Upperton the additional sum of 7s. even while he remained on special service, though that is done partly as a recognition of the good conduct for which a constable is placed on special service, and partly because, by being withdrawn from ordinary duty, he loses to some extent his chance of promotion.

From the said sum of 32s. the sum of 7d. was deducted as a contribution towards the pension fund, in accordance with sect. 15 of the Police Act 1890.

The sum of 7s. was paid without any deduction for pension being made therefrom.

Upperton signed the weekly pay list, which contained one column headed "Amount of Pay," and another column headed "Allowance for Special Duties." The sum of 32s. appeared in the former column, and the sum of 7s. in the latter, along with allowances in lieu of coals and boots.

By sect. 15 of the Police Act 1890 the police authority of every police force is authorised and directed to deduct from the pay of every constable such stoppage during sickness as may be provided by the regulations respecting the force.

In the metropolitan police force, during absence owing to sickness, 1s. a day is usually stopped from the ordinary pay of a constable, and in the case of a constable employed on special duty and receiving a special allowance in respect thereof, that allowance is usually stopped in addition to the stoppage of 1s. a day. During the period of his absence the amount of the said allowance would be paid to the constable who actually performed the special duty.

Upon Upperton's retirement the police authority, the respondents, awarded him a pension of 55l. 9s. 4d. a year, being fifty-two times the sum of 21s. 4d., which was two-thirds of the sum of 32s.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On behalf of Upperton it was contended (a) that he was entitled to receive a pension at the rate of two-thirds of 39s. a week, and that the sum of 7s., which was expressly voted by Parliament as a special duty allowance and had been paid to him for a period of nearly five years, was "pay" within the meaning of sched. 1, part 1, of the Police Act 1890, and that the purpose of that Act would be defeated if a police authority could treat as non-pensionable a special duty allowance attached to a permanent appointment; (b) that his "annual pay" was 365 times his daily pay, and not fifty-two times his weekly pay.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended (a) that Upperton was only entitled to a pension at the rate of two-thirds of 32s. a week, and that the sum of 7s. was not part of his pay as a constable, but was only an allowance in the nature of a gratuity, and that the said sum of 7s. was properly not taken into account in arriving at the pension due to him; (b) that his "annual pay" meant fifty-two times his weekly pay and no more.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Whether the sum of 7s., though called an allowance, was "pay" within the meaning of the Police Act 1890, and as such ought to have been taken into consideration in arriving at the amount of the pension due to Upperton; (2) whether "annual pay" means fifty-two times the weekly pay, or 365 times the daily pay.

The Metropolitan Police Act 1829 (10 Geo. 4, c. 44) provides:

Sect. 12. The receiver, out of the moneys so received by him, shall be allowed a yearly salary not exceeding seven hundred pounds, to be payable quarterly; and the receiver, out of the same moneys, shall from time to time pay to the persons belonging to the police force appointed under this Act, such salaries, wages and allowances, and at such periods, as one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State shall direct.

The Police Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45) provides:

Sect. 1. Subject to the provisions of this Act every constable in a police force:—(a) If he has completed not less than twenty-five years' approved service, and, where a limit of age is prescribed by the pension scale in force under this Act, is of an age not less than the age so prescribed, shall, on the expiration of such time not exceeding four months after he has given written notice to the police authority of his desire to retire as the police authority may fix, be entitled without a medical certificate to retire and receive a pension for life.

Sect. 3.—(1) The pensions . . . shall be in accordance with the pension scale for the force. (2) The pension scale for a police force shall be (a) as regards ordinary pensions, a fixed scale adopted by the police authority within the maximum and minimum limits set forth in part 1 of the first schedule to this Act.

Sect. 11. In any of the following cases—(b) Where a constable . . . claims a pension . . . under this Act as of right and the police authority do not admit the claim the constable . . . may apply to the police authority for a reconsideration of the claim to the pension . . . and if aggrieved by the decision upon such reconsideration may apply to the next practicable court of quarter sessions . . . and that court, after inquiry into the case, may make such order in the matter as appears to the court just, which order shall be final.

Sect. 15. The police authority of every police force shall deduct from the pay of every constable in the force—(a) Sums at a rate not exceeding two and a half per cent. per annum on his pay.

Sect. 16.—(1) There shall be a pension fund of every police force, and there shall be carried to that fund (a) The deductions . . . made in pursuance of this Act from the pay of the constables in the force.

Sched. 1, part 1.—Ordinary Pensions: (1) The pension to a constable on retirement shall be within the maximum and minimum limits following, that is to say—(c) If he has completed twenty-five years' approved service, an annual sum not less than thirty-sixtieths nor more than thirty-one-fiftieths of his annual pay, with an addition of not less than one-sixtieth nor more than three-fiftieths of his annual pay for every completed year of approved service above twenty-five years, so, however, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of the annual pay.

Sched. 1, part 3, rule 11.—In estimating any pension, gratuity, or allowance for the purposes of this Act—(a) a pension or gratuity to a constable shall be calculated according to the amount of his annual pay at the date of his retirement.

Under the scale of pay for metropolitan police constables directed by the Home Secretary, and in force at the date of Upperton's retirement, his pay was 32s. a week only.

The pension scale adopted for the metropolitan police force is the maximum limit allowed by sched. 1, part 1, of the Police Act 1890.

The Divisional Court (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.) held that "annual pay" meant three hundred and sixty-five times the daily pay and not fifty-two times the amount of the weekly pay. Upon the other question the learned judges differed in opinion, Channell, J. holding that the 7s. a week was not part of the "annual pay" of the constable and Bucknill, J. that it was. Upon this point, therefore, the appeal was dismissed (19 Mag. Cas. 495; 32 L. T. Rep. 233).

Upperton appealed.

E. H. Pickersgill for the appellant.—The question on this appeal turns upon the meaning of "annual pay" in the 1st schedule to the Police Act 1890. The pension, to which the police constable is entitled as of right, is to be calculated according to the amount of his "annual pay" at the date of his retirement. This expression "annual pay" is used for the first time in this Act, which contains no definition of "pay" or "annual pay." The statute which provides for the pay of constables in the metropolitan police force is 10 Geo. 4, c. 44, s. 12, which provides that the receiver shall pay to the members of the force "such salaries, wages, and allowances, and at such periods, as one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State shall direct," and in the Metropolitan Police Act 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 44), s. 22, the expression used is "pay of every constable"; the expression "pay" therefore seems to be used to include the "salaries, wages, and allowances," provided for in the earlier Act. This special allowance of 7s. a week was part of the constable's pay. It was increased remuneration given to the constable in recognition of his previous good conduct and as recompense for losing his chance of promotion. His employment on special services in the House of Lords was permanent, and the allowance of 7s. a week was permanent. The money out of which this special allowance was paid was provided by Parliament expressly for the purpose of paying these allowances. Upon being appointed on

UPPERTON v. RIDLEY AND ANOTHER.

[Ct. of App.]

special duty at the House of Lords a new contract was made with the constable to pay him his former ordinary rate of pay, and also this further special amount in respect of the special duty. The whole amount, ordinary pay and special allowance, then became his "pay," and it was his "annual" pay, for it continued for several years. The fact that no deduction was made from the special allowance for the pension fund was the fault of the police authority, and the constable ought not to be prejudiced by that omission of the police authority to make the proper deductions. If this constable had not been placed on this special duty he might have been promoted and so obtained increased pay which would have increased the amount of his pension, and he ought not to be placed in a worse position as regards pension because he took this special duty with a special allowance, and thereby lost his chance of promotion. "Pay" is a reward or remuneration for services rendered, and in this case the constable secured the whole of the 7s. a week as remuneration for his services; it was not an allowance to meet expenses or disbursements.

Macmorran, Q.C. and J. P. Grain for the respondents.—This special allowance was not a part of the pay of the constable, within the meaning of the Act. The scale of pay of metropolitan police constables is that which is authorised and directed by the Home Secretary, pursuant to sect. 12 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1829. By that scale the "pay" of this constable at the date of his retirement was 32s. a week only, and did not include this special allowance. The contract under which the constable was employed entitled him to "pay" only in accordance with the scale; he was bound to serve wherever he might be sent; he had no option as to performing, and no permanency of employment, in respect of the special duties at the House of Lords; he had no right to claim payment of the special allowance, which was merely a gratuity paid out of a fund provided by Parliament. This special allowance was never treated as "pay" by anyone, as appears from the pay lists signed by the constable. [They were stopped by the Court.]

SMITH, M.R.—This is an appeal from the Queen's Bench Division in a case in which the two learned judges differed. The question arises as to the meaning in the Police Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 45) of the words "annual pay," according to the amount of which the pension of a police constable is to be calculated. The amount of the pension depends upon the amount of the "annual pay" of the constable. In order to see what is the position of this police constable in the metropolitan police force it appears to me to be necessary to consider carefully the document which the police constable signed in order to see what are the terms in respect of "pay" under which he served. When that document is looked at, it seems to me to be perfectly clear that the conditions under which the police constable served in the metropolitan police force were that he was to receive 24s. a week while in the first class, and to advance to 27s. and 30s. a week in the higher classes. This last sum of 30s. a week was subsequently increased to 32s. a week by the direction of the Home Secretary, the proper authority for that purpose. Under those circumstances what is the amount of pension to which the police constable is entitled? It seems to me, from this document which he signed, that the pay there contracted and stipulated for was the prescribed amount as directed by the Home Secretary and nothing else. Over and above the sum of 32s. a week, the pay according to the prescribed scale, what was the police constable entitled to sue for as the reward for his services? There was no contract under which he could claim or receive the additional sum of 7s. a week. In my opinion, upon considering the statutes and documents, there was nothing whatever to entitle the police constable to any pay over and above the different sums stated in the scale directed by the Secretary of State. The case, however, by no means rests there, because there is in the special case this very material statement: "It was stated in evidence by Mr. Bathurst, chief clerk to the Commissioners of Police, that 'the commissioners were under no obligation to pay the appellant the additional sum of 7s., even while he remained on special service, though that is done partly as a recognition of the good conduct for which a constable is placed on special service, and partly because by being withdrawn from ordinary duty he loses to some extent his chance of promotion.' Therefore, this police constable, who asserts that he is entitled to have taken into consideration as part of his pay this sum of 7s. a week, cannot show any contract to pay that sum, and the above paragraph of the special case shows that there was no obligation to pay that sum. Again, what has been the practice for many years with respect to this special allowance in the police force? It appears from the pay sheets that it has been the practice for many years to treat this as a gratuity or special allowance, but not as pay. If it had been treated as pay, there must have been made a deduction from the 7s. a week for the pension fund in accordance with the provisions of sect. 15 of the Police Act 1890; but this deduction was never made. In my opinion, this sum of 7s. a week was not pay at all within the meaning of the Act. I agree, therefore, with the judgment of Channell, J. in the court below, and I think that this appeal must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I would have been very glad to be able to differ from the judgment of Channell, J. in this case if it were possible to do so, because of the long and meritorious service of this good and respectable police constable. His right, however, to pension depends upon the terms of the Act of Parliament, and the amount of the pension must be a certain proportion of his "annual pay" at the date of his retirement. Now, the person who alone can determine the amount of the annual pay of a police constable in the metropolitan police force is the Secretary of State. Sect. 12 of 10 Geo. 4, c. 44, provides that "the receiver . . . shall from time to time pay to the persons belonging to the police force appointed under this Act such salaries, wages, and allowances, and at such periods, as one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State shall direct," and that provision does not appear to have been since altered. The only evidence before us upon which we are entitled to act is that the scale of pay which was set out in the document signed by the police constable himself was the scale of pay directed by the Secretary of State. In that it is stated in terms that the pay of the constable is so much, and it does not include this allowance for special duty. We have it, therefore, upon the highest authority—that of the Secretary of State himself—that this was his pay. We cannot travel outside of that; by that the pay of the constable is defined. The amount of the pension follows absolutely upon that pay. Further, in this very case the Secretary of State has himself in effect stated what in his opinion the pay of this constable was, for he has decided that the pension is to be calculated only upon the pay of 32s. a week, and he is the authority to determine the rate of pay of metropolitan police constables. Again, the whole course of practice of the parties as to deductions for the pension fund points to the same conclusion—that the pay of the constable was only 32s. a week. I agree, therefore, that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.—I think that this is a hard case for this constable, but I agree that the appeal must fail. Upon the facts it appears to me to be clear that the sum of 7s. a week received by the police constable for service at the House of Lords was expressly paid and received upon the footing that it was not pay, but was a voluntary or gratuitous gift. That is shown by the pay sheets signed by the police constable, and by the fact that no deduction was made from the 7s. for the pension fund, which it was obligatory to make if this sum was pay within the meaning of the Act of 1890, and also by the fact that during absence for sickness the whole of this 7s. was usually stopped and not merely a small part of it, as in the case of ordinary pay. It appears to me, therefore, upon these facts to be impossible to come to the conclusion that this sum of 7s. a week was in the nature of pay. The appeal therefore fails and must be dismissed. Appeal dismissed.

BRADFORD CORPORATION. (a)

Public authority — Costs — Taxation — Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), s. 1.

An action was brought against a public authority to restrain it from infringing a patent by the use of electric meters. The public authority used the meters under powers conferred on it by a provisional order duly confirmed by Act of Parliament. The action was dismissed with costs. Upon summons to review taxation:

Held, that the public authority was entitled to costs as between solicitor and client under sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893.

THIS was a summons by the plaintiffs in an action to review taxation.

The action was brought by Chamberlain and Hookham Limited against the Bradford Corporation to restrain them from infringing certain letters patent of the plaintiffs for an invention for improvements in electricity meters. The defendant corporation, it appeared, having been empowered by the Bradford Electric Lighting Order of 1883, duly confirmed by Act of Parliament, to supply electricity within their district, had obtained from certain manufacturers electric meters which they had then let on hire to users of the electricity supplied by them under the powers given them by sect. 53 of their order, which provided:

The undertakers may let for hire any meter for ascertaining the value of the supply of electricity by them to any customer.

These were the meters which the plaintiffs alleged infringed their patents.

The action was dismissed with costs, to be taxed on the higher scale, and when taxed to be paid by the plaintiffs to the defendant corporation.

Upon taxation the taxing master held that the defendant corporation were entitled to costs as between solicitor and client under sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 61), which provides:

Where . . . any action, prosecution, or other proceeding is commenced in the United Kingdom against any person for any act done in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament or of any public duty or authority . . . the following provisions shall have effect: (b) Whenever in any such action a judgment is obtained by the defendant it shall carry costs to be taxed as between solicitor and client.

The plaintiffs objected that the costs should be taxed as between party and party, alleging that the defendant corporation were not acting in pursuance, &c., of any Act of Parliament or public duty within the meaning of the section, and, further, that the action had been in fact defended by the manufacturers of the meters in the name of the corporation under an indemnity given to the corporation against costs and damages by the manufacturers, who had no right to the protection of the Act.

The defendant corporation replied that the meters were used by them in execution of a statutory duty to supply electric light under their electric lighting order; and that, although the manufacturers had indemnified them against costs and damages, that did not affect the plaintiffs' liability to pay.

The master overruled the plaintiffs' objections, stating that the court having decided the defendant corporation were entitled to costs, the Act came in, and he had no discretion but to apply it, and that he could only, in the absence of directions, regard the Bradford Corporation as the defendants. He referred to North Metropolitan Tramway Company v. London County Council (78 L. T. Rep. 711; (1898) 2 Ch. 145) and The Ydon (81 L. T. Rep. 10; (1899) P. 236).

The plaintiffs then took out this summons to allow their objections to the taxation.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. COLE AND SON.

[CHAN. DIV.]

Fletcher Moulton, Q.C. and A. J. Walter for the summons.—The defendant corporation were not acting as a public body, but as private individuals. There was no statutory duty cast upon them to employ these particular meters. What they did was merely a permissive act. They are not therefore within the protection of the section:

Attorney-General v. Company of Proprietors of Margate Pier and Harbour, 82 L. T. Rep. 448; (1900) 1 Ch. 749;

Fielding v. Morley Corporation, 79 L. T. Rep. 231; (1899) 1 Ch. 1;

The Ydun (ubi sup.).

The real defendants are the manufacturers, who cannot be entitled to solicitor and client costs.

Bousfield, Q.C. and J. C. Graham, for the defendant corporation, were not called on.

KEKEWICH, J.—This appears to me to be a simple question, and one in which I ought not to display any hesitation or doubt. The plaintiffs are owners of certain letters patent for electricity meters. The defendant corporation made use of certain electricity meters which were objected to by the plaintiffs as being infringements of their letters patent. The plaintiffs consequently brought an action against the defendant corporation to restrain the alleged infringement. Strictly speaking, the defendant corporation did not themselves use the meters, nor did they manufacture them. They obtained them from third parties, and then let them out on hire. But it is said that that was not done by the defendant corporation "in pursuance or execution or intended execution of any Act of Parliament or of any public duty or authority" within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Public Authorities Protection Act, and that they are not therefore within the protection of that section. I am not sure whether or not they were acting in pursuance or execution of an Act of Parliament. I will therefore put that aside, nor am I sure that they were acting in pursuance or execution of a public "duty," because what they did was done voluntarily. I will not express any opinion on either of these points, but they were clearly acting in pursuance or execution of a public "authority" within the meaning of the section, for clause 53 of their provisional order says they "may let for hire any meter for ascertaining the value of the supply of electricity by them to any customer." Let us test the question in this manner: Suppose the corporation had been minded to hire out these meters without having obtained this provisional order confirmed by Act of Parliament. Could they as a public authority have done so? Clearly they could not. Nor could they as a public authority have attempted to do anything else with regard to supplying electricity without first obtaining statutory power to do so, for it is not within their common law powers. But it appears they were expressly authorised by statute to do what they have done, and they are therefore within the protection of the Public Authorities Protection Act 1893. Then it is said the corporation are only nominal defendants, but they are the defendants sued by the plaintiffs, who no doubt took care to sue the right defendants. It is unfortunate for the plaintiffs that those defendants happened to be a public body, but the plaintiffs must take the consequences of that. The defendant corporation are entitled to their costs as between solicitor and client, and the summons must therefore be dismissed with costs.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. COLE AND SON. (a)

Nuisance—Noxious trade—Reasonable use of premises—Injunction.

Action by the the Attorney-General at the relation of the Wandsworth District Board of Works for an injunction to restrain the defendants from carrying on their business so as to be a nuisance to their neighbours.

The defence was that the defendants had carried on the business for thirty years, were carrying it on in a reasonable manner, and had taken precautions not to cause a nuisance.

Held, that, notwithstanding that the defendants had taken precautions to prevent their trade from being a nuisance to their neighbours, a nuisance had been proved, and the injunction must go.

THIS was an action brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of the Wandsworth District Board of Works for an injunction to restrain the defendants Cole and Son, fat melters and greaves pressers, from carrying on their business so as to be a nuisance to their neighbours.

The nuisance arose from noxious gases and fumes coming from the defendants' premises.

The defence was that the defendants had carried on the business for thirty years, were carrying it on in a reasonable manner, and had taken precautions not to cause a nuisance.

Warrington, Q.C. and Lyttelton Chubb, for the plaintiffs, relied on Reinhardt v. Mentasti (61 L. T. Rep. 328; 42 Ch. Div. 685).

P. Ogden Lawrence, Q.C. and Stewart Smith for the defendants.

KEKEWICH, J. came to the conclusion on the evidence that, although the defendants carried on their business in a reasonable manner from their own point of view, and did everything they could to prevent a nuisance or annoyance being created, yet there undoubtedly was a nuisance, which must be restrained by injunction, and continued:—It fell to me to consider this question, whether a nuisance of a permanent character had been established, in the case of Reinhardt v. Mentasti (61 L. T. Rep. 328; 42 Ch. Div. 685), which I refer to because I venture to think that my judgment has been very much misunderstood. I thought in that case that I was not at liberty to consider whether the defendant was doing what was reasonable from his point of view. He was conducting an eating house near another man's dwelling-house, and in a very reasonable manner as regards an eating house. He was doing that which was for the convenience of his customers, and to enable him in the ordinary course of that business to provide what his customers wanted; but in doing so he created a nuisance, and it seemed to me there, MARSLAND (app.) v. WALLIS AND SONS (resps.).

that when once it was established that he was creating a nuisance, the fact that he was doing what was reasonable from his point of view was no defence. Buckley, J. has commented on that in a recent case of Sanders-Clark v. Grosvenor Mansions Company (82 L. T. Rep. 758; (1900) 2 Ch. 373), where he seems to think that I differed really in effect from Lord Selborne in Ball v. Ray (28 L. T. Rep. 346; 8 Ch. App. 467). Of course nothing could be further from my intention; and although perhaps the blame may have been mine in the use of language, Buckley, J. has a little misunderstood what I intended to say. That case has also been commented on in Garrett on the Law of Nuisances. His criticism is severe, but not too severe if it is just. He seems to think my judgment differs from that of the Court of Exchequer Chamber in Bamford v. Turnley (3 B. & S. 62). It so happens that I studied Bamford v. Turnley with very great care before I gave my judgment in Reinhardt v. Mentasti, and I thought that I was founding my judgment on the judgment of the Exchequer Chamber; it was so intended. I have taken this opportunity of again reading Bamford v. Turnley, and I am bound to say that, notwithstanding these criticisms, what I said in Reinhardt v. Mentasti was altogether agreeable, as it was intended to be, to what was laid down in Bamford v. Turnley. These remarks are not so much meant with regard to my own case as to bring me back to the main question, which I think may be stated in this manner: Can a man reasonably create a nuisance? I think the answer of Bamford v. Turnley, from which there has never been, so far as I am aware, any departure at all, is that he cannot. Then he cannot say that he is acting reasonably. The two things are self-contradictory; he is either acting reasonably or he is committing a nuisance. If he is committing a nuisance he is not acting reasonably. That seems to me to be the short result, and I think that ought to apply here.

MARSLAND (app.) v. WALLIS AND SONS (resps.). (a)

Metropolis—Surveyor's fees—Land of school board—London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxxiii.), ss. 21, 154.

By sect. 21 of the London Building Act 1894 any building to be erected upon any lands belonging at the time of the coming into operation of the Act, to the London School Board, may be erected in accordance with the provision of any Act in force immediately before the passing of the Act. Held, that the fees payable to the district surveyor were also regulated by such earlier Act.

CASE STATED.

The appellant was the district surveyor under the London Building Act 1894 for the district of Camberwell, in the county of London, and the respondents were builders within the meaning of sect. 154 of that Act of certain buildings in that district.

The buildings were a school and other buildings erected by the respondents for the London School Board upon lands belonging to such board.

The appellant's claim was to be paid by the respondents the sum of 32l. 1s. 3d. for fees due to him as district surveyor for work done in respect of the buildings.

It is enacted by sect. 154 of the London Building Act 1894 that there shall be paid by the builder, or in his default by the owner or occupier, as the case may be, of the building or structure in respect whereof the same are chargeable, to every district surveyor in respect of the several matters mentioned in parts 1 and 3 of the 3rd schedule to the Act the fees therein specified or such other fees not exceeding the amounts therein specified as may be directed by the council.

By sect. 157 of the same Act it is provided that the fees due from builders to the district surveyor may be recovered in a summary manner.

By sect. 21 of the Act it is enacted that notwithstanding the Act any building to be erected upon any lands belonging, at the time of the coming into operation of the Act, to the London School Board, may be erected in accordance with the provisions of any Act in force immediately before the passing of the Act.

It was admitted by the appellant that the buildings in respect of which the fees were claimed were erected subsequently to the coming into operation of the London Building Act 1894 upon lands which belonged to the School Board for London at the time of the coming into operation of that Act, and under the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 so far as that Act could now apply.

It was admitted on the other hand by the respondents that the appellant had performed duties in respect of the buildings for which he was entitled to fees, and that such fees, if calculated in accordance with the provisions of the London Building Act 1894, would amount to the sum claimed, but if calculated in accordance with the enactments in force previously to the passing of the Act of 1894 would amount to the sum of 19l. 7s. 6d.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that by virtue of sect. 21 of the London Building Act 1894 the fees payable to the appellant in respect of the buildings were not to be calculated in accordance with the provisions of the Act, but in accordance with the provisions of the Metropolitan Building Act 1855, under which Act the buildings in question were erected.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the enactment in sect. 21 of the London Building Act 1894 that the buildings therein mentioned might be erected in accordance with the provisions of any Act in force immediately before the passing of the Act referred only to structural erection of the buildings and to the rules in accordance with which such buildings were required to be erected and not to the fees payable to the district surveyor in respect of the supervision of the erection of the buildings. And that the appellant was entitled to the fees prescribed by sect. 154 of the London Building Act 1894 for the services performed by him in respect of the buildings.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. DIV.] SCOTT v. MIDLAND RAILWAY CO. & GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY CO. [Q.B. DIV.]

The magistrate was of opinion that the respondents' contention was right, and that the effect of the provision in sect. 21 of the London Building Act 1894 was that the appellant was not entitled for the services performed by him in respect of the buildings to the fees prescribed by the Act, but was only entitled for such services to the fees prescribed by the Metropolitan Building Act 1855. He accordingly refused to make an order for payment by the respondents of the amount claimed and ordered the respondents to pay to the appellant the sum of 19l. 7s. 6d. only, being of opinion that the words "may be erected in accordance with the provisions of any Act in force immediately before the passing of the Act" were wide enough to include all the provisions of the former Act with reference to surveyors' fees.

R. Cunningham Glen.—The magistrate was wrong. The buildings in question are supervised under the Act of 1894 and not under the earlier Act. The fees payable are therefore those under the later statute. If they were being built and not supervised it might be different. Sect. 21 applies only to the structural erection and the rules that apply to such structure, and not to the fees, which are regulated by sect. 154 of the London Building Act 1894.

J. A. Slater (E. E. Humphreys with him).—The district surveyor has no right to any fees except those that are given him by the statute. Sect. 154 gives him fees under the Act of 1894. Where the work is regulated by the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 the fees payable are those given by that Act.

KENNEDY, J.—When the section of a later Act makes provision like sect. 21 of the London Building Act 1894 we have to look back to the earlier Act to see what is required to be done. Now, sect. 21 says that notwithstanding the Act of 1894 any building may be erected upon any land belonging to the school board, in accordance with the provisions of any Act in force immediately before the passing of that Act. The learned magistrate has said that he considers the words "may be erected in accordance with the provisions of any Act in force immediately before the passing" of the Act of 1894 are wide enough to include all the provisions of the former Act—namely, the Act of 1855—with reference to surveyors' fees. I think he is right, and must be upheld.

SCOTT (app.) v. MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY AND GREAT NORTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY resps.). (a)

Mines—Quarries—Gravel pit—Gravel and sand—Whether gravel and sand are "minerals" and a gravel pit a quarry—Necessity of notices as in case of mines—Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), ss. 11, 28—Quarries Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. 42), s. 1.

Gravel and sand are "minerals" within the meaning of the words "other minerals" in sect. 1 of the Quarries Act 1894, and consequently, a quarry or gravel pit of more than 20ft. deep from which gravel or sand is being taken, is a "quarry" to which the Act applies, and the provisions of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Acts 1872 and 1875 apply to such quarry as in the case of mines.

A railway company were the lessees or owners of a ballast siding or gravel pit by the side of their line, and within their limits of deviation, and they used the same for the purpose of getting from time to time gravel and sand, which were used by the company solely for the maintenance and repair of their line, and the place was more than 20ft. deep.

Held, that this place from which the gravel and sand were taken was a "quarry" within the meaning of the Quarries Act 1894; that the provisions of sects. 11 and 28 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 applied, and that the railway company were therefore bound to give to the inspector of mines notice of a fatal accident in the quarry as required by that Act in the case of mines, and that they were bound to give such notice whether or not it was their duty to give notice of the accident to the Board of Trade under sect. 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1871.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the county of Norfolk sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction.

Three informations were preferred by the appellant (Scott), one of Her Majesty's inspectors of mines, against the respondents, the Midland Railway Company and the Great Northern Railway Company, alleging that the defendants (the respondents) had committed breaches of sects. 11 and 28 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872, as applied to quarries by the Quarries Act 1894.

The first two informations charged:

That the Midland Railway Company and the Great Northern Railway Company on the 15th and 30th March 1900 respectively, then being the owners of a certain quarry called or known by the name of the Corpusty Ballast Quarry situate at Corpusty, in the county of Norfolk, unlawfully were guilty of an offence against the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872, as applied to quarries by the Quarries Act 1894, in having failed "to cause an abstract of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 with the name and address of the inspector of the district, and the name of the owner or agent appended thereto, to be posted up in legible characters in some conspicuous place at or near the quarry where it might be conveniently read by the persons employed."

The third information charged that the respondents on the 16th March 1900, being the owners of the same quarry:

Unlawfully were guilty of an offence against the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 as applied to quarries by the Quarries Act 1894—that is to say, did fail to send within twenty-four hours notice in writing to the inspector of the district of an accident and of the loss of life occasioned thereby which occurred at the said quarry.

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

The respondents were the lessees for the purpose of taking ballast of a certain place in the parish of Corpusty, in the county of Norfolk, called the "Corpusty Ballast Siding," by the side of their line of railway, and running back 150 yards from the main line, and by their workmen from time to time got therefrom gravel and sand which were used by the respondents for the maintenance and repair of their line, and were only used for such maintenance and repair.

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The place was more than 20ft. deep with a slope of 40ft. to 50ft. in length in its deepest part, and was within the limits of deviation shown on the deposited plans of the railway.

No abstract of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 was posted up at or near the Corpusty Ballast Siding on either of the dates mentioned in the informations.

On the 15th March 1900 a fatal accident occurred to one of the defendants' workmen, who was engaged in taking gravel or sand from the place. Such accident was caused by the bulging out of a quantity of sand and gravel from the sloping face of the ballast siding. No notice of such fatal accident was given to the informant, the inspector of the district, as required by sect. 11 of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872.

It was stated by the respondents' solicitor, and the statement was not challenged by the appellant's solicitor, that notice of the accident was given to the Board of Trade.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that both gravel and sand were included within the term "other minerals" in sect. 1 of the Quarries Act 1894, and that a place where such substances were got was within the mischief intended to be remedied by the Quarries Act 1894.

For the respondents it was contended that such substances were not minerals within the meaning of that section, and were not included within the term "other minerals" as they were not ejusdem generis with "slate," "stone," or "coprolites," which are therein specifically mentioned.

It was also contended for the respondents that taking gravel and sand from this ballast siding whenever the same might be required for the maintenance or repair of the railway was not working within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Quarries Act 1894, on the grounds that (1) the respondents did not take the gravel and sand for the purpose of making profit out of the same, and (2) that the gravel and sand were not taken systematically, but only whenever the same were wanted for the maintenance and repair of the railway.

It was further contended for the respondents that as the gravel or sand was taken for railway repairs or maintenance, and as the Corpusty Ballast Siding was within the limits of the land authorised to be taken for the use of the railway, it was not subject to the provisions of the Metalliferous Mines Act, but was only subject to the general Railway Acts, which require notice of accidents to be given to the Board of Trade.

The justices determined "that the place was used by persons working habitually whenever ballast was wanted; that the regulations had not been posted nor notice of the accident given; that the things taken out were gravel and sand, and that they were not minerals within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Quarries Act 1894," and on this ground they dismissed the informations giving no determination as to whether the working was otherwise a place within the meaning of the Act.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the justices ought to have convicted the respondents.

The Quarries Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 42), provides:

Sect. 1. This Act shall apply to every place (not being a mine) in which persons work in getting slate, stone, coprolites, or other minerals, and any part of which is more than twenty feet deep, and every such place is in this Act referred to as a quarry under this Act.

Sect. 2 (1). The provisions of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Acts 1872 and 1875, and the Metalliferous Mines (Isle of Man) Act 1891, specified in the schedule to this Act, shall, subject to the modifications therein specified, apply in the case of every quarry under this Act in like manner as they apply in the case of a mine; (2) The inspectors under the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Acts 1872 and 1875, shall be inspectors of the quarries under this Act.

In the schedule to this Act amongst the provisions of the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 applied to quarries, are sect 11 with the substitution of the word "explosive" for the word "powder," and sect. 28.

The Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 77), provides:

Sect. 11. Where in or about any mine to which this Act applies, whether above or below ground, either— (1) loss of life or any personal injury to any person employed in or about the mine occurs by reason of any explosion of gas, powder, or of any steam boiler; or (2) loss of life or any serious personal injury to any person employed in or about the mine occurs by reason of any accident whatever, the owner or agent of the mine shall, within twenty-four hours next after the explosion or accident, send notice in writing of the explosion or accident and of the loss of life or personal injury occasioned thereby, to the inspector of the district on behalf of a Secretary of State, and shall specify in such notice the character of the explosion or accident, and the number of persons killed and injured respectively. . . . Every owner or agent who fails to act in compliance with this section shall be guilty of an offence against this Act.

Sect. 28. For the purpose of making known the special rules (if any) and the provisions of this Act to all persons employed in and about each mine to which this Act applies, an abstract of the Act supplied on the application of the owner or agent of the mine, by the inspector of the district on behalf of a Secretary of State, and an entire copy of the special rules (if any) shall be published as follows:—(1) The owner or agent of such mine shall cause such abstract and rules (if any), with the name and address of the inspector of the district, and the name of the owner or agent appended thereto, to be posted up in legible characters, in some conspicuous place at or near the mine, where they may be conveniently read by the persons employed, &c. If any owner or agent fail to act in compliance with this section he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act. . . .

The Solicitor-General (Sir Edward Carson, Q. C.) (H. Sutton with him) for the appellant.—The three informations raise the same question, whether a gravel and sand pit which was being quarried by the railway companies for the purpose of ballast on their lines, comes within these Acts. The Acts provide that certain notices of the Act and of certain rules of the inspector are to be posted in a convenient place at all quarries coming within the Act, and also that notice must be given, if an accident occurs, to the inspector of mines. The short question is whether a quarry from which gravel and sand are being taken is within the definition in sect. 1 of the Quarries Act 1894. By that definition the Legislature meant to sweep in every kind of quarry, and there is no reason why gravel pits and sand pits—perhaps the most dangerous quarries of all—should be left out. The object and intention of this legislation was to afford protection to persons working underground in these places, so that there would be the same reason for bringing within the protection of the Acts persons working in these deep gravel pits as for bringing in persons working in mines. The Act of 1894 is an Act “for the better regulation of quarries.” It intended to apply to quarries the inspection and the other precautions rendered necessary where by quarrying a danger arises to the workmen by the earth being allowed to abut over and fall in on the men, as happened here. We say that gravel is a “mineral,” and that sand is a “mineral” within this Act, and that everything that is under the surface and can be worked is a mineral. Even if the words “other minerals” had been wanting, gravel would have come within the section under “stone,” as gravel is merely small particles of stone; but the words “or other minerals” are put in, thereby giving a very wide purview to the section, which was meant to include any other mineral, that is, any other matter which may be quarried out. The question is not one of “other minerals” being construed ejusdem generis, as the magistrates thought, as all the things mentioned are of a different character; thus coprolites are not ejusdem generis with either slate or stone. That doctrine cannot apply, and the words “other minerals” must be used in a much wider sense. “Minerals” has come to have a definite meaning of the very widest kind unless from the context you are able to cut down that meaning. In Midland Railway Company v. Checkley (16 L. T. Rep. 260; L. Rep. 4 Eq. 19), under a reservation of mines and minerals, Lord Romilly, M.R. held that stone was included as a mineral, and also gravel, marble, fire-clay, and the like. In Hext v. Gill (27 L. T. Rep. 291, at p. 285; L. Rep. 7 Ch. 699, at p. 712), Mellish, L.J. gives a very wide definition of “minerals,” and says that the result of the authorities is that it “includes every substance which can be got from underneath the surface of the earth for the purpose of profit”; and it was there held to include china-clay. This definition was adopted in Earl of Jersey v. Neath Poor Law Union (22 Q. B. Div. 555), where brick earth and clay were held to be included. In Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie (60 L. T. Rep. 274; 13 App. Cas. 657), clay forming the surface or sub-soil of land, was held not to be included in “minerals.” Lord Watson (13 A. C. at p. 674) and Lord Herschell (at pp. 682-3) deal fully with the meaning of the term “minerals.” The very fact that we have, after the Act of 1872, another Act with very wide words, shows that the word “minerals” in the latter Act ought not to be cut down. The accident did not occur “in the course of working the railway,” and therefore sect. 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1871, does not apply. The justices were clearly wrong.

McCall, Q.C. (J. D. Crawford with him) for the respondents.—The decision of the justices is right. The finding of the justices is one of fact in this case where there was evidence to support the finding. That it was a question of fact clearly appears from the judgment of James, L.J. in Hext v. Gill (ubi sup.). He states that in his view it is a question of fact in each case, and that view of the matter seems to have been adopted in Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie (ubi sup.). This case does not come within either the words or the intention of this Act of 1894, and to understand the matter it is necessary to read the facts as they were proved before the justices. It is not now disputed that before this Act the word “minerals” had been read in a very wide sense as well as in a very narrow sense, and instances of both constructions are given in Macswiney on Mines, pp. 9, 10. It is necessary, therefore, in order to determine the meaning to look at the words used. If the Legislature had meant to give this broad meaning to the word “minerals” they would have said so; but they have not done so. On the contrary, they have limited the expression to “slates, stones, coprolites, or other minerals”; and it cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended that every country sand pit or gravel pit was to be a “quarry,” and so come within this section. In the present case the railway company had made a cutting for a branch line and in doing so they came on a bed of sand and gravel which was within their limits of deviation, and they utilised it to get sand and gravel for their line. If the contention for the appellant is right, then every time a railway company makes a cutting for getting sand or gravel for repairs elsewhere, they would be liable under this section. So far as protection to the workmen is concerned, this case is amply covered by a protection which already exists under sect. 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 78). That section provides: “Where in or about any railway or any of the works or buildings connected with such railway, or any building or place, whether open or inclosed, occupied by the company working such railway, any of the following accidents takes place in the course of working any railway; that is to say, (1) Any accident attended with loss of life or personal injury to any person whatsoever . . . the company working such railway, . . . shall send notice of such accident and of the loss of life or personal injury (if any) occasioned thereby to the Board of Trade.” The gravel pit in question was within the limits of deviation as shown on the deposited plans of the railway, and the accident was therefore an accident taking place “in the course of working the railway.” The case clearly comes within sect. 6, and under that section the company was bound to give notice of the accident to the Board of Trade, which they seem to have done. It could never have been intended that the railway company should send two notices, one to the Board of Trade, and one to the inspector of mines. The Legislature cannot be taken to have contemplated that the respondents, having already sent one notice and one account of the accident to the Board of Trade should be bound to send a second notice to the inspector of mines dealing with the very same matter as to which they were already bound to send, and had sent, a notice to another authority.

The case does not come within the words of sect. 1 of the Act of 1894 at all, and the justices were right in so finding.

KENNEDY, J.—In my opinion our judgment in this case ought to be for the Crown. It seems to me that every requisite to bring the statute into operation has been proved, and also that the judgment which we are asked to give is upon a question of law, and not upon a question of fact. If there had been a decision on a question of fact, then as a matter of course we could not review the decision, however much we might ourselves think that we should differ from that decision as a question of fact. The place here in question was a place from which gravel or sand is taken for the railway companies by workmen as they want it. It is not suggested that it was a place which, in its character as to size or otherwise, was not within the purview of the two Acts of Parliament which are immediately applicable, namely, the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 and the Quarries Act 1894. The object of these Acts is plain. It is to afford protection, and also to insure investigation for the benefit of workmen who are working in certain places where there are special dangers. The provisions of the Act of 1872 are made by sect. 2 of the Quarries Act of 1894, to apply to quarries, and while the Act does not define a quarry it provides in sect. 1 that it "shall apply to every place (not being a mine) in which persons work in getting slate, stone, coprolites, or other minerals, . . . and every such place is in this Act referred to as a quarry under this Act." That "minerals" in an Act of Parliament, or in a legal document, prima facie include such things as sand and gravel is, I think, now clearly settled; and I see nothing either in the nature of the Act, or in the context in this case, which should narrow that which would prima facie be the full and wide meaning of the term "minerals." Here we have the workmen employed in a place some part of which is more than 20ft. deep, in which the things that were being gotten were minerals. Under these circumstances it seems to me that the requisites to bring the case within the Act have been satisfied. The magistrates apparently have decided the case on the ground that the things that were being got, namely, gravel and sand, were not minerals within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Quarries Act 1894. In my opinion in coming to that conclusion they were wrong in point of law. They were wrong in not including in this Act of Parliament under the term "minerals" that which it has been settled is, in such an Act, in the absence of some qualifying reason in the context or in the circumstances, to be taken to be the proper meaning of "minerals," which includes sand and gravel. Then it has been suggested for the respondents that this place and the accidents happening therein are governed by sect. 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 78). It was contended that this gravel pit was a place in which men were at work "in the course of working the railway," and that under sect. 6 of this Act of 1871, if in the course of working the railway an accident happens it ought to lead merely to a notice being given under that section, namely, to the Board of Trade, and that therefore the provisions of the Act of 1872 as to notice do not apply. In my opinion this was not an accident

"in the course of working the railway" within the meaning of sect. 6 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1871. Further, whether or not it be the duty of these two railway companies under sect. 6 of the Act of 1871 to give notice to the Board of Trade of an accident happening in this quarry, I should myself say that they are certainly bound by the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act 1872 and the Quarries Act 1894, to give the notices and to do the things which are required by these Acts, but which admittedly they have not done. Therefore in my opinion this case ought to be decided in favour of the Crown, and this matter ought to go back to the magistrates to be dealt with by them.

DARLING, J.—I am of the same opinion. The question really to be determined is whether gravel and sand can be taken to be included in the word "minerals" as used in this statute. It is perfectly clear from the cases already decided that "minerals" is a word with a meaning which is very indeterminate. Sometimes it has a very restricted meaning in statutes, and sometimes it has a very wide meaning, and in some cases it has been held to include gravel. That has been so held already. Now, in order to find whether it is used in its wide or in its narrow sense, we must do what Lord Herschell said in his judgment in Lord Provost and Magistrates of Glasgow v. Farie (ubi sup.), ought to be done, namely, we must look at the object of the Legislature. In the way the case was put for the respondents it is perfectly plain that if the object of the Legislature was to prevent people being injured by stones and such like things falling upon them, that object would not be obtained if the stones were a number of small stones instead of being one large stone. If they were a number of such small stones as to be properly denominated gravel, then, if the argument for the respondents be right, the Legislature would not have protected these working people. That would occur certainly in a case where somebody, not a railway company, was making an excavation more than twenty feet deep in gravel or in sand. But, it is said for the respondents, there is another reason why this statute should not apply here, and that is that this case is guarded against and provided for by the Regulation of Railways Act 1871, s. 6. I think the distinction pointed out by the Solicitor-General is a good one, namely, that that section applies to something which takes place in the working of the railway. I am inclined to think that that statute would not cover this case, and if so, this case would not be covered at all if the Acts of 1872 and 1894 did not apply to it. It seems to me that the object of the Legislature really was to give the persons working things which were not metalliferous mines, the same protection by means of a report to the Home Office, which they had given to persons working things properly described as metalliferous mines. If it were otherwise we should have to hold that the object of the Legislature was this, to protect people on whom slates might fall, or stones might fall, or coprolites might fall, or any other mineral, whatever that may mean, which was something like a slate, or a stone, or a coprolite, but that it did not—and intentionally did not—profess to protect anybody who might have gravel falling upon him. I cannot think that that was the intention of the Legislature; and my impression is that they intended to protect all those people who, in working in the earth at a depth of more than twenty feet, had not been protected by the Metalliferous Mines Regulation Act of 1872 and with that object they use this word "minerals." It seems to me, therefore, that the widest meaning and intention, and not the narrowest, must be given to the word. If so, there is authority for saying that "minerals" may mean gravel, and in this case I think it does.

BURTON v. VESTRY OF ST. GILES-IN-THE-FIELDS AND ST. GEORGE, BLOOMSBURY. (a)

Rating — Metropolis — Valuation list — Person wrongly inserted in list as occupier — Appeal against list — Name ordered to be struck out — Rates paid pending appeals — Right to recover — Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 (32 & 33 Vict. c. 67), s. 44.

Where a person whose name is inserted in a valuation list as the occupier of premises in the metropolis, appeals to quarter sessions against the valuation list upon the ground that he is not the rateable occupier of the premises and upon such appeal his name is ordered to be struck out of the list on the ground that he is not the rateable occupier, such person can, under sect. 44 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, recover the whole amount of the rates he has paid during the proceedings on appeal, as the entire alteration of the rate, by which the whole amount thereof is ordered to be struck out, is an "alteration" in the valuation list "which alters the amount of the assessment or rate," within the meaning of that section.

ACCTON tried by Mathew, J. without a jury.

The plaintiff carried on business in London as an advertising contractor under the name of Partington and Co.; and the defendants were by virtue of their local Act (11 Geo. 4, c. x.) overseers of the united parishes of St. Giles-in-the-Fields and St. George, Bloomsbury.

The plaintiff claimed the repayment by the defendants of sums paid by him to the defendants, amounting to 92l. 6s. 4d., in respect of rates in the months of Aug. 1897 and Feb., March, June, and Aug. 1898, and he claimed to be entitled to such repayment on the ground of the alteration of the supplemental valuation list for the parish of St. George, Bloomsbury, in consequence of an appeal by him against that list.

The facts were not in dispute, and were as follows:—

The plaintiff, in order to carry on his business of displaying advertisements for persons desiring to advertise, obtained licences from builders and others to affix during building operations advertisements on the exterior of the hoardings erected during the building, and he then affixed to the hoardings the advertisements which he had agreed with intending advertisers to exhibit.

In a provisional valuation list made for the parish of St. George, Bloomsbury, the defendants in June 1897 inserted the plaintiff as being the rateable occupier of what was therein described as an "advertising station" and of a "hoarding" situate at Southampton-row, in that parish.

In June 1898 the plaintiff gave notice of objection to the valuation list on the ground that he was not the occupier legally rateable in respect of the advertising station or of the hoardings, and he asked that the valuation list should be corrected and the entry of the premises struck out.

On the 23rd June 1898 the assessment committee confirmed the assessment.

The plaintiff appealed to the quarter sessions sitting as a Court of General Assessment Sessions under the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 and the Local Government Act 1888, his ground of objection being the same, and the quarter sessions in Feb. 1899 dismissed the appeal subject to a case for the opinion of the High Court.

On the 11th Jan. 1900 the Queen's Bench Division allowed the plaintiff's appeal and ordered that the order of the quarter sessions be reversed and that the entry of the plaintiff as the occupier of the advertising station and hoardings in the list be struck out: (see Burton v. Assessment Committee of St. Giles-in-the-Fields and St. George, Bloomsbury, 82 L. T. Rep 24; (1900) 1 Q. B. 389).

On the 27th Feb. 1900 the quarter sessions ordered the name of the plaintiff as occupier of the premises to be struck out in the supplemental valuation list, but the name of the plaintiff in the valuation list had not in fact been struck out in pursuance of the order.

The plaintiff paid the various rates which he now sought to recover, on the 6th Aug. 1897, on the 21st Feb., 12th March, 24th June, and 26th Aug. 1898; and the defendants admitted that they had received all these sums from the plaintiff. In respect of two of these rates proceedings had been taken before the magistrates, summonses had been taken out and the money paid with costs.

The plaintiff asked for a return of the rates so paid. The defendants refused to refund the amount on the ground that by the provisions of sect. 44 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 as no alteration had been made in the valuation list "which altered the amount of the assessment, contribution, rate, or tax levied thereunder" the plaintiff was not entitled to have the amount refunded.

Sect. 44 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869 32 & 33 Vict. c. 67) provides:

Notwithstanding any appeal under this Act which may be pending at the commencement of the year, the valuation list shall come into force unaltered, and every assessment, contribution, rate and tax, in respect of which the valuation list is conclusive, shall be made, required, levied, and paid in accordance with such valuation list; and where in consequence of the decision on any appeal under this Act to assessment sessions or a Superior Court, an alteration in such valuation is made which alters the amount of the assessment, contribution, rate, or tax levied thereunder, the difference, if too much has been paid, shall be repaid or allowed, and if too little, shall be deemed to be arrears of the assessment, contribution, rate, or tax (except so far as any penalty is incurred on account of arrears), and shall be paid and recovered accordingly.

E. Cunningham Glen (A. A. Bethune with him) for the plaintiff.—By the decision of the Divisional Court it was held that the plaintiff was not the rateable occupier of these hoardings, and was not liable to pay these rates. The plaintiff now brings this action under sect. 44 of the Valuation (Metropolis) Act 1869, to recover back from the defendants the sums which he says he has improperly been called on to pay. That section enables a person to recover sums so paid when in consequence of the decision on an appeal, "an alteration in the valuation list is made which alters the amount of the assessment." In this case in consequence of the decision of the Divisional Court an alteration was, on the plaintiff's application, ordered by the quarter sessions to be made, and it was also ordered that the plaintiff should be struck out of the assessment altogether. But although the quarter sessions ordered judgment to be entered in accordance with the decision of the court, in fact the rating was not altered in the valuation list, and it remained unaltered. It is sufficient in this case that the quarter sessions ordered this alteration to be made in the valuation list, and it makes no difference that the alteration in point of fact was not carried out. If the alteration had in fact been made and the plaintiff's name struck out, there could have been no question. The order takes effect from the moment it was made, and there was an "alteration in the valuation list" within the meaning of the section when the quarter sessions ordered the valuation list to be altered and the name of the plaintiff to be struck out, and that alteration was one which "altered the amount of the assessment."

Macmorran, Q.C. (W. C. Ryde with him) for the defendants.—The plaintiff was altogether mistaken in the procedure adopted by him to raise this question. His proper procedure was when rates were demanded of him, if he were not the occupier, to refuse to pay, and that defence of his not being the occupier, if he could sustain it, would be given effect to by the magistrates before whom proceedings for the recovery of the rates were taken. If a person says he is not the occupier that is the proper way to raise the question; but it is not a matter of appeal to quarter sessions so far as the valuation list is concerned. That list is conclusive only as to the amounts in it, but is not conclusive as to the name of the occupier, as the occupier may, and does, change from time to time, and the name is immaterial in the valuation list, so that an appeal, as in this case, against a valuation list in respect of a matter for which the valuation list is not conclusive, is futile. Then as to sect. 44, the meaning is this: The occupier is placed on a provisional list, against which he has no appeal, but he may defend himself in any proceedings for the recovery of the rates. This provisional list is afterwards incorporated with the supplemental list; then the person rated therein has the right of appeal, and if on such appeal he is found to have been rated at too much then under the section he is entitled to have the excess repaid to him. Here there never was any question or any appeal as to the amount of the valuation, and there was never any appeal against any rate, and no alteration has been made in the amount as the appeal was only against the valuation list. That amount remains as before, and all the quarter sessions have done is to give effect to the judgment which said the plaintiff was not the occupier. A ratepayer may always show that on the face of the rate he is rated for property of which he is not the occupier. Such a rate in respect of land which a person does not occupy is, as Lord Denman, C.J. said in Governors of Bristol Poor v. Wait (1 A. & E. 264, at p. 281): "A rate which the overseers had no power to make, nor the magistrates to enforce," &c. It makes no difference that the ratepayer has already appealed to quarter sessions, and that that court have confirmed the rate:

Milward v. Coffin, 2 W. Bl. 1330;
Overseers of Manchester v. Headlam, 21 Q. B. Div. 96.

The question here was not whether these things were rateable, but whether the plaintiff was the right person to be rated for them, and all that was held was that the plaintiff was not the right person, and was not legally rateable. But there has been no alteration of the valuation list within sect. 44, as the assessment remains as it was before. The section does not apply at all. It only relates to amount, so that if a person, not being assessable and not owing any rates at all, has been compelled to pay, he would have no remedy under the section; but if he were assessable at all, and were assessed at too much, he would have a remedy under the section. The vestries here are simply the rating authority; they get the precepts, and levy the amounts as specified in the valuation list. They are merely conduit pipes for taking the rate and paying it over, and they cannot get the money back. Sect. 27 (10), dealing with the provisional list as distinguished from the supplemental list, has more bearing on the question, and shows that sect. 44 applies only to matters of amount. With regard to the two rates that were enforced by means of summonses, they at all events cannot be recovered, for the reason that when money is paid under compulsion of law it cannot be recovered back, whether it is paid by mistake of law or of fact.

B. C. Glen in reply.—It is said the plaintiff has not adopted the proper procedure, and that he ought to have waited and taken the objection before the magistrates on the ground that he was not the occupier. We do not question the magistrates' jurisdiction in such cases. The magistrates have jurisdiction to inquire into questions of occupation and to refuse to issue a distress warrant; but so also have the quarter sessions on an appeal to them. A person is not bound to go before the justices and raise one point and then have an appeal to quarter sessions to raise questions of value. By appealing to quarter sessions he can raise both questions of value and questions of occupation as well. If that were not so, it would have to be contended that, where a person was objecting to be assessed as an occupier and was also objecting to the amount, two proceedings would be necessary, one an appeal against the rate, and the other an appeal to quarter sessions against the valuation list. Such multiplication of proceedings could not have been intended. Sect. 43 deals with the valuation list and the latter part of sect. 44 applies to this case. The first part of sect. 44 compels a person to pay the rate according to the valuation list "notwithstanding any appeal under the Act"—and the only appeals under this Act are appeals against the valuation list under sect. 32 and appeals as to value under sects. 19 and 20. Then, if an alteration is made and a person pays too much, his remedy is under the latter part of sect. 44 which applies to this case. It is conceded that if there were any alteration of amount then sect. 44 would apply; it equally applies in the present case in which there is an alteration in the whole amount. If an alteration in a part of the amount is an "alteration," then an alteration in the whole amount must also be an "alteration" within sect. 44. Here there has been an alteration in the whole amount, because the effect of the alteration has been that, whereas under the earlier part of sect. 44 the plaintiff would have been bound to pay the whole of the rates in consequence of his being wrongly inserted in the valuation list as occupier, he has now nothing to pay. There could not be a larger "alteration," and the plaintiff is entitled to recover.

MOSES (app.) v. MARS LAND (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

MATHEW, J.—It seems to me that sect. 44 does apply to the claim in this case. Counsel for the defendants has argued that the appeal contemplated by sect. 44 is an appeal as to amount only, but is not an appeal on the ground that the appellant was not the occupier of the premises in respect of which he is rated. It was argued that any such objection as that must be dealt with differently, and as a defence on an application made to the magistrates to enforce the payment of the rates. If the earlier words of the section were alone to be found there, then there would be something in favour of the contention put forward for the defendants, because it says: "Notwithstanding any appeal under this Act"; and the appeal under the Act seems to be an appeal against the valuation list. But the section goes on to say that "where in consequence of the decision on any appeal under this Act to assessment sessions or a superior court, an alteration in such valuation list is made which alters the amount of the assessment, contribution, rate, or tax levied thereunder, the difference, if too much has been paid, shall be repaid or allowed." What occurred in this case was that there was an appeal by the plaintiff to quarter sessions, and it was a legitimate appeal, on the ground that he was not an occupier. The Court of Quarter Sessions thought that he was the occupier, but reserved its judgment subject to a case to be stated, and on the case coming before the Queen's Bench Division, it was held by the judgment of the superior court that the plaintiff was not the occupier, and was not liable to be rated. Then, that being so, the only question now is whether the fact that the plaintiff is held to be liable for no part of the rate is an "alteration" in the valuation list within the meaning of the section (sect. 44). The objection was taken on behalf of the defendants that this money has been received by the vestry, the defendants in this case, and has been paid away, and that therefore it would be extremely hard, or contrary to law, that they should be compelled to repay the money as to which they were the mere agents, to hand it over, or the mere conduit pipes as they were called.

That argument, however, would strike away the whole of the section, because in the cases to which Mr. Macmorran says the section is confined, the cases, namely, where there is an alteration in the amount not going to the whole of the rate, the same argument might be urged, namely, that the vestry are only conduit pipes and have paid the money away, and that therefore they ought not to be called upon to repay it. The Act has provided for that very case, because there is a provision that where an alteration in the valuation list is made which alters the amount of the assessment or rate, the money shall be repaid in case too much has been paid. I presume that effect will be given to the Act without saying anything about the course to be taken by the vestry. The question then is reduced to an extremely narrow one, namely, whether an entire alteration of the rate is an alteration within the meaning of the Act. I am of opinion that it is. Therefore it follows that the plaintiff is entitled to recover the amount he has paid. As to two of the assessments it appears that they were paid after summonses had been taken out, and that they were so paid by compulsion of law, that is to say, that they were paid after proceedings had been taken before the magistrates to compel payment. There was no appeal against these two rates, but the appeal was against the valuation list on which the two rates were made. I think that these two rates must follow the others. They are all cases in which, within the meaning of the section, an alteration has been made in the valuation list which entitles the plaintiff to recover the amount he has paid. My judgment therefore will be for the plaintiff, and for the amount claimed—namely, 92l. 6s. 4d. with costs.

MOSES (app.) v. MARS LAND (resp.). (a)

Metropolis—Building—Houses for infirm children—"Public building"—London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxxiii.), s. 5 (27).

A house used for the reception of some twelve to fourteen children, who by reason of defect of intellect or physical infirmity cannot be trained with other children, for their permanent home, is not a "public building" within sect. 5 (27) of the London Building Act 1894.

CASE STATED.

The appellant was a builder who was engaged in carrying out certain alterations for the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District at a building, No. 16, Elm-grove, Peckham, within the district of Camberwell, for the purposes hereinafter mentioned.

The respondent was the district surveyor under the London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxxiii.) for the district of Camberwell.

The appellant was summoned by the respondent for neglecting to comply with a notice served on him by the respondent, as such district surveyor, requiring him to do certain things under the provisions of the London Building Act 1894 whilst carrying out such alterations.

The following facts were either proved or admitted at the hearing:—

By order of the Local Government Board, dated the 2nd April 1897, the care of children who by reason of defect of intellect or physical infirmity cannot properly be trained in association with children in ordinary schools was placed in the hands of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District.

The managers, for the purpose of carrying out such order, prepared a scheme for purchasing various dwelling-houses in different parts of London adjacent to the schools specially provided and staffed by the London School Board for the education of children of this class. Under such scheme the children were to live, sleep, and board in such houses under the care of a responsible matron in numbers generally not exceeding fourteen in any one house, and to attend such special board schools each day for the purpose of their education. Such houses were intended to be permanent homes for the children.

The building, No. 16, Elm-grove, had been an ordinary detached dwelling-house of two floors with one room and a basement below, and had been purchased by the managers under such scheme, and they had instructed the appellant under the supervision of the board architect to alter or convert such dwelling-house to make it suitable for the accommodation of twelve to fourteen children and a matron, cook, and housemaid, the latter in the exclusive service of the board.

The total cubical capacity of such dwelling-house was under 50,000 cubic feet with sleeping accommodation as above.

Before the appellant began the alterations he served a notice under sect. 145 of the London Building Act 1894 on the respondent, stating he was about to make alterations to a private dwelling-house and convert the same into a public building, and during the course of carrying out the alterations the respondent served notices on the appellant making certain requirements with regard to the premises.

No point of estoppel which might possibly arise as against the builder in consequence of the form of his notice to the district surveyor was pressed. But, treating the real parties to the summons as the district surveyor and the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District and assuming the managers were not to be legally affected by the form in which the builder gave his original notice, the only question that was argued before the magistrate was the question whether this building under the above circumstances was a public building within the London Building Act 1894, ss. 5 (27), 63, 79.

The magistrate was of opinion that, regard being had to the terms of sect. 5, sub-sect. 27, and of sects. 63 and 79, this building was in the hands of the managers of the Metropolitan Asylum District used or constructed or adapted to be used for a public purpose, and he made the order asked for by the district surveyor.

By the London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccciii.), s. 5 (27):

The expression "public building" means a building used, or constructed, or adapted to be used as a church, chapel, or other place of public worship, or as a school, college, or place of instruction (not being merely a dwelling-house so used), or as a hospital, workhouse, public theatre, public hall, public concert-room, public ball-room, public lecture-room, public library, or public exhibition-room, or as a public place of assembly, or used, or constructed, or adapted to be used for any other public purpose, also a building used, or constructed, or adapted to be used as an hotel, lodging-house, home, refuge, or shelter, where such building extends to more than 250,000 cubic feet, or has sleeping accommodation for more than 100 persons.

Macmorran, Q.C. and Herbert Smith for the appellant.—The magistrate was wrong, for this building is not within sect. 5 (27) of the London Building Act 1894. If the children had been put in before the commencement of the alterations nothing could have been done. If the premises had been taken by a private person nothing could have been said, and it can make no difference that the premises have been taken by a public body. The test to be applied in these cases is whether the building is to be used for a public purpose similar to those set out in the section. Clearly it was not. It was decided in the case of Josolyne v. Meeson (53 L. T. Rep. 319) that an ambulance station structurally disconnected with any building, and from which the public is rigorously excluded, is not itself a public building within sect. 3 of the Metropolitan Building Act 1885, so as to require the builder to deposit plans and sections of the building with the notice of its erection to the district surveyor under the by-law 5 made under sect. 16 of the Metropolitan Management and the Building Acts (Amendment) Act 1873. So in the same way this building cannot in any sense be described as a public building, and it cannot become so merely because it is controlled by a public body.

B. Cunningham Glen for the respondent.—This building is clearly a hospital within the meaning of sect. 5 (27). The only children taken in are those who are defective in intellect or suffer from a physical infirmity. The only exception in buildings of this kind is that of a private school. At any rate it is a building of the same kind as a hospital, and therefore is a "building . . . used for any other public purpose."

BRUCE, J.—In this case I am of opinion that the building in question was not a public building within the definition given in the London Building Act 1894, s. 5 (27). It is said by Mr. Glen that it is a hospital. I do not think the building is a hospital. No doubt the word "hospital" originally was a word of very wide meaning. It might mean lodging. I see in Mr. Murray's Dictionary a phrase from Spenser's "Faerie Queene" quoted; a line, "Espied a goodly castle for that night's hospital there did thither march." Any place of lodgment may be a hospital in the old meaning of the word, but the modern meaning of the word is very narrowed. It means a place for the treatment of the sick and infirm, and I do not think this place, which is a home for children, not for medical treatment, but a home for them, can be treated as a hospital. Then, if it is not a hospital, is it a place used for "other public purposes" within the words of sect. 5 (27)? Following the decision in Josolyne v. Meeson (53 L. T. Rep. 319), which is a decision of this court and binding upon us, I think the substance of that decision is this: That "public purposes" means, not a place used in the public interest, but a place to which the public can demand admission or are invited to come; a place to be used by the public. In Joselyne v. Meeson the court so limited the words "public purposes," but, even if we were not bound by that decision, "other public purposes" must mean some other purposes ejusdem generis, and would not in that case include a home such as the present. But even if it does, I agree with Mr. Macmorran when he says that it appears from the following words that a home is not to come within the definition of "other public purposes" unless it extends to more than 250,000 cubic feet, or has sleeping accommodation for more than 100 persons. As that is not this case, the present building would not fall within that definition. Therefore I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrate was wrong and must be reversed.

TRACEY (app.) v. PRETTY (resp.).

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I agree it is conceivable this building might be both home and hospital, but I think it is not a hospital in the old sense which my brother has quoted. The statute certainly does not mean to use the word in that sense, nor does it mean to use it in the old legal sense treated by Lord Coleridge. It uses it in the modern popular sense with which we are all very familiar. Now, there is no reason at all for saying these children are there for treatment of their physical ailments. If they were, it might be possible this was a hospital. The Local Government Board and the Metropolitan Asylums Board in 1897 slightly anticipated that which the Legislature has now made a general provision for the whole of England by 62 & 63 Vict. c. 32. They provided for children receiving poor relief, who were incapable of being taught successfully in association with ordinary children, by reason either of defective intellect or physical infirmity, special schools, and, as an adjunct to those schools, the Metropolitan Asylums Board have provided these homes in which the children are maintained. Some of the children may not be infirm at all; but they are not there for treatment of their infirmity—they are there for the purpose of education. No doubt when they are there they must be looked after just as much as any healthy children who get ill must be attended to. So these infirm children must be attended to; but they are not there for the purpose of their physical infirmity being attended to. Therefore it is not a hospital, but it is a home. That would be enough to decide this case, but I also agree with my learned brother, and with the decision by which we are bound—even if we did not agree with it—that this does not mean a building constructed or adapted to be used for "any other public purpose." One sees directly that the words "any other public purpose" were not wise words to use, but they were in the old Act and had been construed by this court; and very wisely the draftman of the new Act left in the old words and did not try to alter them. Those words do not mean "used in the public interest"; they mean, as my learned brother has said, used for a purpose which involves the admission of the public either by right or by invitation, as when you open a lecture-hall to anybody who chooses to pay for his ticket. That is the good sense of the thing. This building is not used for any public purposes within the meaning of the Act, and the decision of the learned magistrate cannot be supported.

Appeal allowed.

TRACEY (app.) v. PRETTY (resp.). (a)

Factory—Notice by inspector as to sanitary requirements—Power of justices to inquire into necessity for requirements—Appeal—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 38—Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), s. 4—Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 22—Factory and Workshop Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 75), s. 2—Factory and Workshop Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), s. 3.

Where a factory inspector has given a notice under sect. 22 (2) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, and sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891, the justices cannot inquire into the necessity for, or the reasonableness of, the requirements specified in the notice.

The only question that can be raised before the justices is whether there has been a neglect or refusal to comply with the notice, and they cannot decide the question of the suitability or sufficiency of the accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences in the factory.

Phillimore, J. dissents.

Semble, the only appeal against the requirements contained in the notice is to quarter sessions.

CASE stated on an information charging the respondents with unlawfully neglecting and refusing to comply with the requirements of a notice given under sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891, and amending Acts, and sect. 22 (2) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890.

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

The respondents were the occupiers of a building used as a corset factory situate at Tower Ramparts.

The Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 had been adopted in the borough of Ipswich.

The building in question was a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshops Acts 1878-95 and was situate within the sanitary districts of the Ipswich Urban Sanitary Authority.

The appellant was an inspector under the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878-95.

The notices prescribed by sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 were given to the sanitary authority by means of a letter dated the 2nd March 1899 of which, so far as it is material to this case, the following is a copy:

I beg to inform you that on visiting the corset factory occupied by Messrs. Pretty and Sons, and situated at Tower Ramparts, Ipswich, the undermentioned sanitary matters appear to require attention: Insufficient sanitary accommodation for women. 730 women when visited; full number 1000. Fourteen sanitary conveniences provided.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Q.B. Div.]

TRACEY (app.) v. PRETTY (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

It appeared to the appellant that the acts, neglects, and defaults alleged in the letter of the 2nd March 1899 were punishable or remediable under the laws relating to public health, but not under the Factory and Workshop Acts.

Proceedings were not taken by the sanitary authority upon the notice so far as it related to the alleged insufficiency of sanitary accommodation for women against the owners or occupiers of the factory.

It appeared to the appellant that the provisions of sect. 22 (1) of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 were not complied with on the 15th May 1899 in the case of the factory.

The appellant gave a written notice to the respondents, the occupiers of the factory, of which notice the following is a copy :

Factory Department, Home Office, London, S.W.—I, the undersigned, one of H.M. inspectors of factories, acting in pursuance of sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891, and sect. 3 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, hereby give you notice under sect. 22, sub-sect. (2), of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 that the provisions of sect. 22, sub-sect. (1), of that Act are not complied with in the building of which you are occupier, used as a manufactory and situated at Tower Ramparts, Ipswich, the same being a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, and I hereby require you within two calendar months from the date of this notice to provide the said building with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed or in attendance at the said building, and with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex, and for that purpose to provide for the use of the females so employed or in attendance eighteen additional water-closets, with proper fittings and appurtenances. If you neglect or refuse to comply with this notice, you will be liable for such default to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.* and to a daily penalty not exceeding 40*s.*, and proceedings will be taken in pursuance of the said sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 to recover the same.—(Signed) ANNA TRACEY. May 15th, 1899.—To Messrs. Pretty and Co. Limited, Tower Ramparts.

The respondents, the occupiers of the factory, neglected or refused to comply with the last-mentioned notice.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended upon the above stated facts that the court of summary jurisdiction had no jurisdiction to hear evidence upon or decide the question of the suitability or sufficiency of the accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences existing in the factory, or the necessity for the further accommodation required by the notice dated the 15th May 1899, and that those questions were by law left to the discretion of the appellant. In support of this contention the following cases were cited: St. Luke's Vestry v. Lewis (5 L. T. Rep. 608), Hargreaves v. Taylor (8 L. T. Rep. 149), and Bogle v. Sherborne Local Board (46 J. P. 675).

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the matters were questions of fact which the justices had jurisdiction to decide upon evidence to be given before them.

The justices decided in favour of the contentions of the respondents, and accordingly heard evidence on behalf of the appellant and the respondents, and upon that evidence dismissed the summons and ordered the appellant to pay 6*l.* 4*s.* costs.

They found as facts (1) that the existing sanitary accommodation in the factory was suitable and sufficient; (2) that the sanitary authority had made all due inquiry into the suitability and sufficiency of the sanitary accommodation existing in the factory, and had found the accommodation to be suitable and sufficient.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether they had jurisdiction to hear evidence upon or decide the question of the suitability or sufficiency of the accommodation existing in the factory or required by the notice.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, Q.C.), Sutton, and Muir for the appellant.—This case depends upon the construction to be placed upon certain sections in the Factory and Public Health Acts. By sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), "where it appears to any inspector under this Act that any act, neglect, or default in relation to any . . . water-closet . . . in a factory or workshop is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, but not under this act, that inspector shall give notice in writing of such act, neglect, or default to the sanitary authority in whose district the factory . . . is situate, and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice and take such action thereon as to that authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law." So it will be seen that under the Act of 1878 the duty of inquiry and of taking action vested with the sanitary authority only. Sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 contains the provisions as to sanitary conveniences in factories, and it provides a remedy. Before the magistrates the notice and order are final, though there is an appeal to quarter sessions under sect. 7. The next step in the legislation was sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 75), which provides that "where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under the said sect. 4 . . . to a sanitary authority, and proceedings are not taken . . . for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default, the inspector may take the like proceedings for punishing or remedying the same as the sanitary authority might have taken, and can recover any expenses from the sanitary authority not recovered from the other person. So it would seem that if the sanitary authority do not move after the notice mentioned in sect. 4 of the Act of 1878 the inspector can take the like proceedings himself. The question, therefore, is, does this section give the inspector power to serve a notice under sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, from which there is no appeal except to quarter sessions. We contend that the inspector is in the same position as the sanitary authority, either with or without an appeal under sect. 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890. By sect. 3 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895 "where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under sect. 4 of the principal Act," that is the Act of 1878, "to a sanitary authority, it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to inform the inspector of the proceedings taken in consequence of the notice," and further, the time in sect. 2 of the Act of 1891 is altered to one month. The summons clearly brings out what the charge was, and the first letter to the sanitary authority was in accordance with sect. 4 of the Act of 1878. Then a notice is given for the non-compliance with which the present summons is issued. The point in this case is a new one. But, even if the sanitary authority come to the conclusion that there is no act, neglect, or default, the inspector can proceed further, otherwise sect. 2 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 would be a nullity. The intention of the section is to give a sort of appeal. The effect of the two sections is that the inspector may give notice to the sanitary authority, but if they take no action then the inspector himself can take proceedings. In a borough such as Ipswich the only way by which proceedings can be taken is by a notice, and further it should be noticed that the sanitary authority do not act altogether independently, but under sect. 3 of the Act of 1895 they must keep the inspector informed as to any proceedings taken. They also referred to Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 36, 38. Sect. 38 deals with factories, and shows what the law was at that time before the Factories and Workshops Acts. Sect. 68 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 shows the powers inspectors have for carrying the Act into force and for satisfying themselves; and sect. 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 gives the right of appeal to quarter sessions, except where there is an appeal to the Local Government Board under sect. 268. Where sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 is in force, and the provisions of sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875 superseded, the only remedy is that provided by sect. 22; and so if the local authority will not take proceedings, sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 is of no use, for the inspector cannot give the notice. [PHILLIMORE, J.—Where in the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 do you get the powers given to the inspector?] The sanitary authority get their powers under sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, and so all those powers are open to the inspector. Under sect. 3 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895 the word "proceedings" includes the step by the local authorities in giving the notice. Where the sanitary conveniences are not proper, the factory becomes one kept not in accordance with the Acts; and sect. 81 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, and sect. 35 of the Act of 1895 show how such a factory is dealt with. Sect. 35 of the Act of 1895 applies where sect. 22 of the Public Health Act 1890 does not. But the inspector has the same powers as the sanitary authority, and there would be the same appeal under sect. 7 of the Act of 1890. There are, therefore, two classes of proceedings. First, those within the Act of 1890 for non-compliance with sect. 35 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, and in such cases the magistrates can go into the facts. The others are those within the Act for non-compliance with the notice, and in such a case the magistrates cannot go into the facts. In such cases the notice is final.

Macmorran, Q.C. (E. E. Wild with him) for the respondent.—Throughout the whole of the sanitary legislation, the person required to do work is heard at one stage of the proceedings or another. Sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 gives no appeal to the Local Government Board, but instead of that an appeal is allowed by sect. 7 to quarter sessions—that is, where the requisition is by the statutory authority. But where the notice is given by the inspector no appeal is provided for. If the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 is not adopted by the urban authority, and in all rural districts, the section that governs is sect. 35 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, and in such a case there are two judicial hearings. If the Crown is right in their contention, where an inspector gives a notice under sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891, the owner of a factory has no right of appeal and no means of having an inquiry. Sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 was intended to enable a factory inspector to call the sanitary authority's attention to nuisances which they ought to get abated. The duty of the sanitary authority under the section is to make inquiry and see if the notice is well founded. In this case they have done all that they are required by law under that section, or sect. 22 of the Act of 1890. The meaning of the word "proceeding" in sect. 2 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 is where proceedings ought to be taken. The inspector cannot himself find as a fact that there has been an act, neglect, or default. There must be some judicial determination. He referred to

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 18.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. read the following judgment:—This case raises, in my opinion, questions of very considerable difficulty, and I express my judgment with great hesitation. After the best consideration I can give I have, however, come to the conclusion that the appellant is entitled to judgment. The substantial question which arises is whether upon a summons for penalties under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, for neglect to comply with a notice given by a factory inspector, it is competent for the magistrates to receive evidence upon the merits as to the necessity for the sanitary accommodation required by such notice. The difficulty arises from the fact that the powers of the factory inspector in the matter are given by reference to the powers of the sanitary authority under the Public Health Act; and we have to determine to what extent the powers of the sanitary authority are transferred under the general words used. Certain other incidental points arise which I will consider in the course of my judgment. In dealing with cases of legislation by reference, I think that, as a rule, the primary consideration to be kept in view is the general scope and object of the amending legislation, as this affords more guide as to whether a wide or narrow interpretation is to be put upon general words or expressions capable of a wider or narrower meaning. By the 4th section of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 it is provided that where it appears to an inspector under the Act that any neglect or default under the Act in relation to any water-closet, earth closet, or other matter in the factory or workshop is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, and not under the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, the inspector shall give notice in writing of such act, neglect, or default to the sanitary authority of the district, and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice and take such action thereon as to the authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law. By the same section it was provided that an inspector under the Act may for the purposes of the section take with him to the factory a medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances, or other officer of the sanitary authority. The material provisions of the law relating to public health which were in force at that time—namely, at the passing of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878—are to be found in sects. 35, 36, and 38 of the Public Health Act 1875. The most material section is the 38th, which provided that, where it appeared to any local authority by the report of their surveyor that any house is used or intended to be used as a factory in which persons of both sexes were employed, the local authority might, if they thought fit, by written notice require the owners within a time specified in the notice to construct a sufficient number of water-closets, earth closets, or privies for the separate use of each sex. The section provided a penalty for neglect to comply with such notice. No appeal was provided against the requirements of the local authority under this Act. By sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, which is the section under which this case arises, further powers were given to the sanitary authority. Sub-sect. 1 of that section provides that every building used as a workshop shall be provided with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary convenience, having regard to the number of persons employed, and also where persons of both sexes are employed with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex. It further provides by sub-sect. 2 that where it appears to an urban authority on the report of their surveyor that the provisions of the section are not complied with they may by written notice require the owner or occupier to make such alterations and additions therein as may be required to give such sufficient, suitable, and proper accommodation. Sub-sect. 3 prescribes a penalty for neglect or refusal to comply with such notice. Pausing for a moment, it was contended on behalf of the respondents that under this section the urban authority could only give a general notice requiring the owner or occupier to provide sufficient and proper accommodation; on behalf of the appellant it was contended that the urban authority must by the notice specify the alterations and additions which they require to be made. I think the latter view is correct. The section provides a penalty for neglect or refusal to comply with the notice. It would, I think, be inconsistent with such an enactment that the notice should be in general terms only, as the person to whom it was given would in that case have no means of knowing how he could avoid the liability to a penalty. But, in addition, by sect. 7 of the same Act, an appeal to quarter sessions is given against any requirement of a local authority, and I think it was intended that on such an appeal not only the question of the necessity for some additional accommodation, but also the reasonableness or propriety of the amount of the accommodation required by the notice might be raised. It was further contended before us on behalf of the respondents that sect. 4 of the Act of 1878 did not apply to this section, that sect. 4 enabled notice to be given only in the case of some neglect or default in relation to an existing water-closet, earth closet, privy, or ash-pit, and not in relation to alleged insufficiency of accommodation. In my opinion this contention is unsound. I think the factory inspector may give notice to the sanitary authority in respect of a neglect by the owner or occupier of a factory to comply with the provisions of sub-sect. 1 of sect. 22 of the Act of 1890. I may further point out that this seems to be placed beyond all doubt by the provisions of sect. 35 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, which provides that in every place where sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 is not in force every factory or workshop where persons of both sexes are employed shall have separate accommodation, and that a factory or workshop in which there is contravention of this section shall be deemed not to be occupied in conformity with the Factory and Workshop Act 1878. If sect. 22 of the Act of 1890 is in force the rights and duties of the parties must be governed by that section. Thus far I have only considered the powers which were given to the factory inspector to put the sanitary authority in motion; but by sub-sect. 2 of sect. 2 of the Act of 1891, under which the particular question in this case arises, it is provided that where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by the sanitary inspector under sect. 4 of the Act of 1878 to a sanitary authority and proceedings are not taken within a reasonable time (fixed by sub-sect. 2 of sect. 3 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895 at one month) for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default the inspector may take the like proceedings for punishing or remedying as the sanitary authority might have taken. The question which arises in this case is whether the words "like proceedings for punishing or remedying" are confined to legal proceedings in respect of the neglect of an owner or occupier to comply with the notice given by an urban authority under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 22 of the Public Health Act of 1890, or do they give the factory inspector the right himself to give a notice under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 22 of the Act of 1890 requiring alterations and additions to be made. The question is, as I have said, one of very great difficulty. The word "proceedings" is not the word one would have expected to find as applicable to a notice or requirement. Moreover, unless a requirement given by a factory inspector is subject to the appeal to quarter sessions, under sect. 7 of the Act of 1890, as in the case of a requirement by the local authority, I should without hesitation have come to the conclusion that a factory inspector was not entitled to give such notice. It seems to me clear that the Legislature could not, without express words, make the opinion of a factory inspector as to the amount of accommodation required final and conclusive upon the factory owner or occupier. But the words in sub-sect. 2 of sect. 2 of the Act of 1891 are "the like proceedings for punishing or remedying the same," and unless we hold that the factory inspector may give the notice provided by sub-sect. 2 of sect. 22 of the Act of 1890, it seems to me that we should be giving no effect to the words "proceedings for remedying" as distinguished from punishing. It is here, I think, that we get assistance in considering what is the general tendency and scope of the legislation. By the Act of 1878 the factory inspector could only give notice to the sanitary authority. The sanitary authority could only give a general notice to the factory owner. By the Act of 1890 further powers are given to the sanitary authority and an appeal is provided against the requirement. Sect. 2 of the Act of 1891 appears to deal with the case where the sanitary authority for some reason or other does not take sufficient steps to exercise their powers, and I think we can gather from this course of legislation that it was intended to supplement the powers of the sanitary authority by giving the factory inspector an independent power of taking proceedings for remedying and punishing in cases in which the sanitary authority neglected to act. It was contended before us by the respondents that no appeal was given in the case of a notice of requirement served by the factory inspector. I have already said that if I had come to this conclusion I should not have decided in favour of the appellant; but if the view which I have taken is correct—viz., that the factory inspector stands in the place of the local authority for the purpose of giving a notice of requirement under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 22 of the Act of 1890—then in my opinion the words "like proceedings" would render any such notice the subject of appeal under sect. 7 of the same act. If this view be correct, effect would be given to that which I gather to have been the intention of the Legislature without any injustice to the factory or workshop owner. The notice given by the factory inspector will be subject to appeal, and, if not appealed against, would have the same effect as a notice given by the sanitary authority. There remains one other contention of the respondents which must be noticed. It was urged that upon the hearing of a summons under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 22 of the Act of 1890, founded upon the notice given by the urban sanitary authority or the factory inspector, the question of the necessity for, or reasonableness of, the requirements specified in such notice could be examined. That such question cannot be raised in the case of a notice of requirement given by a sanitary authority is in my opinion decided not only by the terms of the section itself, but by a long series of decisions referred to the Attorney-General in reply. Upon such a summons, in my opinion, the only question which could be raised is whether there has been a neglect or refusal to comply with such notice. Any question as to the validity of the requirements must be raised, if at all, by appeal to quarter sessions. I do not think, moreover, that the argument that there is a distinction in the case of a notice given by the factory inspector in this respect can be maintained. It was urged that because such a question would be open, in the case of proceedings taken under sect. 81 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 in respect of a breach of sect. 35 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, it also ought to be open in the case of proceedings taken by a factory inspector under sub-sect. 3 of sect. 22 of the Act of 1890. For the reasons I have given in the earlier part of my judgment I do not think this contention can prevail. I think that if a notice can be given by a factory inspector under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 22, it has the same effect, if not appealed against, for all purposes, as a notice given by the sanitary authority. For the above reasons I am of opinion that judgment should be given for the appellant and the case remitted to the magistrates. My brother Darling desires me to add that he agrees with my judgment I have just delivered.

M

TRACEY (app.) v. PRETTY (resp.).

GRANTHAM, J. read the following written judgment:—The difficulty that has arisen in this case in determining the power of factory inspectors, has been caused entirely by the system, unfortunately so often adopted in the present day, of legislating by reference to other Acts and by the incorporation of sections of earlier Acts of Parliament. The references backwards and forwards throughout the Act and sections of Acts in dispute are most bewildering and perplexing, and I am not surprised that the magistrates misunderstood, as I think they did, their powers in the proceedings when the matter came before them. If the history of the factory legislation of the nineteenth century is considered, and particularly that of the past twenty or thirty years, it will, I think, be found that the Legislature has advisedly done what it intended to do—viz., gone on step by step in its endeavour to compel the owners of factories to put them in a healthy and sanitary condition. Finding its earliest efforts often frustrated and failed by the supineness or self interest of the sanitary authorities—whose aid was first sought to carry out its views—the Legislature has at last adopted more drastic measures, and as the inspectors have been, in later years at any rate, always selected for this work on account of their special qualifications for it, the Legislature as a last resort has placed the inspectors in the same position that the sanitary authorities previously occupied, and given them power to order the necessary work to be done, and if not done of enforcing the fines leviable for the breaches of the law in failing to obey the inspectors' orders. It should not be forgotten that the experience of factory inspectors is gained by their supervision of factories over the whole of England, whereas the surveyor of the local authority in many cases has no experience of this kind whatever, and as the Legislature has given to the sanitary authority (as many legal decisions show) the absolute discretion of determining whether work is to be done or not subject to the overriding decision of the court of quarter sessions, it would be strange indeed if this same power should not be confided to the more experienced inspector. Not only is the sanitary inspector often inexperienced in the special requirements of factories to make them properly healthy and sanitary, but he is sometimes liable to be influenced by the factory owner, who is not infrequently one of the leading magistrates of the borough in which the factory is situate. Let us see therefore whether the sequence of legislation does or does not bear out the views that I have thus far expressed. The first Factory Act was passed as long ago as 1802 (42 Geo. 3, c. 73). That Act dealt not only with the morals and the religious teaching of those working in factories, but also with the hours of labour, and the ventilation and light of the factory. It was in fact the foundation of all subsequent factory legislation. It was amended by various subsequent Acts until we come to the Act of 19 & 20 Vict., which incorporated most of the preceding Acts, and was called the Factory Act 1856. But no sooner was that Act passed than amendments and extensions followed each other in rapid succession until after the passing of the Public Health Act 1875 we came to the Act of 1878, which practically repealed all former Acts, and codifying as it did the existing legislation, also enlarged the powers of the sanitary authorities, and brought more factories within the purview of the Act. Unfortunately even in this comprehensive Act of 1878, the Legislature referred back to the Public Health Act of 1875, and incorporated some of its sections instead of making it a complete Act. The Acts now applying to this particular matter commence therefore with the Act of 1875, sect. 38 of which is in these words: "Where it appears to any local authority by the report of their surveyor that any house is used or intended to be used as a factory or building in which persons of both sexes are employed or intended to be employed at one time in any manufacture, trade, or business, the local authority may, if they think fit, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of such house, within the time therein specified, to construct a sufficient number of water-closets, earth closets, or privies and ashpits for the separate use of each sex. Any person who neglects or refuses to comply with such notice shall be liable for each default to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, and to a further penalty not exceeding 40*s.* for every day during which the default is continued." That Act was extended by the Public Health Acts Amendment Act of 1890, sect. 22 of which is as follows: "(1) Every building used as a workshop or manufactory, or where persons are employed or intended to be employed in any trade or business, whether erected before or after the adoption of this part of the Act, in any district, shall be provided with sufficient and suitable accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences, having regard to the number of persons employed in, or in attendance at, such building, and also where persons of both sexes are employed, or intended to be employed or in attendance, with proper separate accommodation for persons of each sex. (2) Where it appears to an urban authority on the report of their surveyor that the provisions of this section are not complied with in the case of any building the urban authority may, if they think fit, by written notice, require the owner or occupier of any such building to make such alterations and additions therein as may be required to give such sufficient, suitable, and proper accommodation as aforesaid. (3) Any person who neglects or refuses to comply with any such notice shall be liable for such default to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, and to a daily penalty not exceeding 40*s.* (4) Where this section is in force sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875 shall be repealed." By this sect. 22, therefore, suitable accommodation was to be provided by way of sanitary conveniences having regard to the number of persons employed in any factory; and the initiation of proceedings is to be "on the report of the surveyor of the urban autho-riety," which authority by written notice could require such additions to be made as would provide sufficient accommodation in the factory, the enforcement of their notice being by application for penalties in the usual way. By these Acts, therefore, the local authority—that is to say, the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses in a borough like Ipswich—had power in such a factory as this, by written notice, to compel the owner or occupier for the time being to provide a sufficient number for each sex, under the penalty of a heavy fine for failure to comply with the order. There was no appeal to the magistrates against this order, but, under sect. 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, "any person aggrieved by any order, determination, or requirement of a local authority under this Act may appeal in manner provided by the Summary Jurisdiction Acts to a court of quarter sessions." To enforce the penalty, however, the local authority had to apply to the Court of Summary Jurisdiction, which court, however, had, as I have just said, no power to inquire into the merits of the order. By these Acts it will be noted that it was left to the surveyor to the sanitary authority to report to the local authority, and it can well be imagined that the surveyor—an official knowing much, perhaps, of bricks and mortar and of drainage—would know but little of factory requirements; and by the time that the Act of 1878 was passed, it was evident that the Legislature had found that the surveyor of the local authority was not sufficiently alive to the sanitary deficiencies and requirements of factories, for by sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act of 1878 it is expressly provided that it shall be the duty of the (factory) inspector to give notice to the sanitary authority of the neglect or default in the factory. The section reads as follows: "Where it appears to an inspector under this Act that any act, neglect, or default in relation to any drain, water-closet, earth closet, privy, ashpit, water supply, nuisance, or other matter in a factory or workshop is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, but not under this Act, that inspector shall give notice in writing of such act, neglect, or default to the sanitary authority; and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice, and take such action thereon as to that authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law. An inspector under this Act may, for the purpose of this section, take with him into a factory or a workshop a medical officer of health, inspector of nuisances or other officer of the sanitary authority." It was evidently found, therefore, that the local surveyor was remiss in giving notice or in initiating these inquiries, so he was supplanted or at any rate the factory inspector was given equal powers of initiating proceedings. But it being still hoped that the local sanitary authority would see that proper sanitary requirements were provided when their attention was officially drawn by the inspector to the omission, the power to compel the owner to remedy the default was still left with the sanitary authority. It is common knowledge, however, that in many cases the local sanitary authority for various reasons declined to or at any rate did not act. Sometimes no doubt because the influence of the factory owner was paramount in the borough in which his factory was situated, and sometimes from ignorance. Hence the Legislature had again to make the law more stringent, and the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 was passed. Sect. 2 is in these words; "(1) Sect. 4 of the principal Act shall apply to workshops conducted on the system of not employing any child, young person, or woman therein, and to laundries. (2) Where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under the said sect. 4 as amended by this Act to a sanitary authority, and proceedings are not taken within a reasonable time for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default, the inspector may take the like proceedings for punishing or remedying the same as the sanitary authority might have taken, and shall be entitled to recover from the sanitary authority all such expenses in and about the proceedings as the inspector incurs and are not recoverable from any other person, and have not been incurred in any unsuccessful proceedings." In other words, it having been found that the local authority would not do its duty, the factory inspector was given an overriding authority to get the work done. Power is given, it will be noticed, to the factory inspector to take the like proceedings as the sanitary authority might have taken where the sanitary authority had not taken proceedings within a reasonable time to remedy the default previously notified to him. To find out the powers, therefore, that the factory inspector now possesses you have only to refer back to the previous Acts to see what powers the sanitary authority previously possessed. Now, by the Public Health Act 1875 and the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 the local authority had power to order certain work to be done, and the order being made, the magistrates had no power of inquiring into the reasonableness or not of the order, though the Court of Quarter Sessions had. Yet it is said when the factory inspector gives the order the magistrates have power to inquire into its reasonableness. In other words, it is said that the superior authority is to have less power than the inferior. The increased powers of the inspector do not end here, however, for the sanitary authorities having evidently excused themselves from carrying out the requirements of the inspector on the ground that a reasonable time had not elapsed to enable them to do so, an Act was passed by which they were to take their proceedings within a month instead of within a reasonable time, and in order that they should not keep the inspectors in the dark as to their intentions they were also bound to give notice to the inspector of the proceedings they were taking. The section—sect. 3 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895—reads thus: "(1) Where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under sect. 4 of the principal Act to a sanitary authority it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to inform the inspector of the proceedings taken in consequence of the notice. (2) In sect. 2 of the Act of 1891 for the words 'within a reasonable time' shall be substituted the words 'within one month.'" What proceedings? How can it be said that proceedings meant or would include deliberations—deliberations perhaps resulting in determination not to proceed. The proceedings referred to seem to me clearly to be proceedings to remedy the neglect or default, in fact the notice to provide the required accommodation. What better language could the legislation have adopted if it intended to give the factory inspectors the power it purports to give them, and I think it did give them? Whether rightly gave them or not is no question for us, as we have only to determine whether the power was given or not, but as the learned counsel ventured to suggest that the Legislature could not have intended to give equal powers to the female factory inspectors as it had given to local surveyors and sanitary authorities, I may add that as their experience is gained, like that of male inspectors, from a much wider area—viz., all the factories of England—than that of the local authority whose experience is very likely to be limited to the one factory in his town, their knowledge is in my judgment likely to be much more valuable and reliable than that of any local authority or of the local surveyor of any borough in England. When the case was first argued before my brother Channell and me I stated that I was of opinion that the order of the factory inspector was subject to the appeal to quarter sessions given to any person aggrieved by an order of a local authority, because the factory inspector has to take like proceedings as the local authority. I am of the same opinion now, but that is not the question we have to determine, which is, whether or not the court of summary jurisdiction has power to inquire into the reasonableness of the order of the factory inspector, but as the question whether "like proceedings" included like "liability to appeal to quarter sessions" was not argued out as if it had been the question in dispute, I do not wish to be bound as if I had given judgment on that question. If it was necessary to show the reasonableness of the requirements of the inspector and the ignorance of the magistrates of the usual accommodation provided in factories I might add that by a report I have before me I find that whereas one water-closet for every seventy persons was considered by the magistrates sufficient in this case, yet in London and all the principal towns in England one in twenty to one in thirty is the minimum number provided. With regard to the last part of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 as to the right of recovering expenses incurred by factory inspectors in taking proceedings being limited to expenses not incurred in any unsuccessful proceedings, I do not feel the same difficulty that some of my brothers have felt. The word proceedings is not limited to legal or magisterial proceedings, but includes proceedings taken to remedy defaults (the same that the sanitary authority might have taken) i.e., they include the carrying out of structural alterations or methods adopted to remedy defects under other sections of the Acts. These alterations or methods may be unsuccessful to remedy the particular defect complained of, and therefore it would be unfair to make the owner of the factory pay for them, and to avoid that unfairness these words have been, as it seems to me, inserted, but as I said as to the appeal to quarter sessions, that is not the question we have to determine. For these reasons, in my judgment the case must go back to the magistrates, and their decision quashed on the ground that they had no power to decide as to the suitability or sufficiency of the accommodation.

BRUCE, J. read the following written judgment:—I am of opinion that the judgment of the court should be for the appellant. I think that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear evidence upon or to decide the question of the suitability or sufficiency of the accommodation existing in the factory. The offence charged is an offence against the provisions of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 22. One difficulty in the case arises from the circumstance that the alleged offence is an offence against the provisions contained in one of the Public Health Acts, while, in order to ascertain the method of procedure to be adopted, reference must be made to the provisions of the Factory Acts. It is a little difficult to fit together the two series of enactments. But the best way of arriving at a right conclusion is to consider the various provisions one by one. The section I have already mentioned—sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890—is the first to be considered, and I think that the ultimate decision in the case must depend to a large extent upon the construction of that section. The section requires by its first sub-section that every building used as a workshop shall be provided with sufficient accommodation in the way of sanitary conveniences. The second sub-section enacts that where it appears to an urban authority on the report of their surveyor that the provisions of the section are not complied with in the case of any building, the urban authority may if they think fit by written notice require the owner or occupier of any such building to make such alterations and additions therein as may be required to give such suitable accommodation as aforesaid. The third sub-section enacts that any person who neglects or refuses to comply with any such notice shall be liable for each default to a penalty not exceeding 20*l.*, and to a daily penalty not exceeding 40*s.* This section is similar in terms with sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875, and accordingly it is enacted by sub-sect. 4 of the section we have been considering that where that section is in force (and it is in force in the urban district in which the factory in question is situated) sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875 shall be repealed. The construction of sect. 22 demands consideration. I think that the written notice mentioned in the section means a notice to make such alterations and additions as may be required by the notice. The section does not, I think, point to a notice in general terms stating that the provisions of the section are not complied with, but it points to a specific notice stating the particular alterations and additions which the urban authority on the report of their surveyor require. If the notice were not a specific notice, it would be unreasonable to make a person neglecting to comply with it subject to a daily penalty, because if the notice were only a general notice the person to whom it was given might not know what were the requirements of the urban authority. I think that this view of sect. 22 is supported by the decision of this court in Bogle v. Sherborne Local Board (46 J. P. 675). That was a decision upon sect. 36 of the Public Health Act 1875. The words of that section are not the same as the words in the section now under consideration, but the general scheme of the two sections is the same. The court held that the requirements of another notice given under sect. 36 of the Public Health Act 1875 were conclusive upon the justices, and could only be inquired into on appeal to the Local Government Board under sect. 268 of the Public Health Act 1875. The remedy of a person who is aggrieved by any "requirement" of a local authority under the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 is given by sect. 7 of that Act, by way of appeal to a court of quarter sessions, in cases where there is no appeal to the Local Government Board under sect. 268 of the Public Health Act 1875. As a breach of a "requirement" under sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 involves penalties only and does not involve recovery of expenses incurred by the local authority, such as are mentioned in sect. 268 above referred to, the appeal is, I think, to quarter sessions and not to the Local Government Board. I may observe that the very circumstance that an appeal is given to a person aggrieved by a "requirement" of a local authority seems to me to imply that such requirement is treated by the legislation as an Act in the nature of a judgment order or determination which can only be called in question before the Appellate Tribunal. I have not overlooked the circumstance that sect. 22, which I have been considering, contemplates proceedings initiated by the urban authority on the report of their own surveyor, and not on the report of a factory inspector; and sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875, which was in force prior to its qualified repeal above mentioned by sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, was to the same effect. In the year 1878 the Legislature, I suppose because it found the surveyors of local authorities slow to act under the powers conferred upon them by sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875, thought fit to confer upon the inspector of factories a power similar to that which had been conferred upon the surveyor of a local authority; and by sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16) it is provided that where it appears to an inspector under that Act that any act, neglect, or default in relation to any drain, water-closet . . . nuisance, or other matter in a factory is punishable or remediable under the law relating to public health, but not under that Act, the inspector shall give notice in writing of such act, neglect, or default to the sanitary authority in whose district the factory or workshop is situated, and it shall be the duty of the sanitary authority to make such inquiry into the subject of the notice and take such action thereon as to that authority may seem proper for the purpose of enforcing the law. Under this section the sanitary authority is authorised to take proceedings under the Public Health Act on the report of a factory inspector. What proceedings are they to take? I think sect. 4 of the Act of 1878 points to a proceeding in the nature of a written notice requiring the owner to construct such number of water-closets, earth closets, or privies for the separate use of each sex as might be required in the notice to be given under sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875. That section, as I have already pointed out, is now repealed by sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, and it is only necessary to refer to it in order to ascertain the character of the proceedings contemplated by sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878. I have not critically examined sect. 38, because, so far as relates to the present case, it is repealed, and is superseded by the provisions of sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890. But I may observe in passing that so far as the construction of sect. 38 of the Act of 1875 is concerned the observations that I made upon the construction of sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 seem to me to apply. I think it is clear that the requirement contained in the written notice mentioned in sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875 could not be inquired into by the justices at petty sessions. The person upon whom the requirement was made had, if ordered by the justices to pay a penalty, a right of appeal against the order of the justices under sect. 269 of the Public Health Act 1875. But whether on such appeal the reasonableness of the requirement could be inquired into is, I think, exceedingly doubtful. Probably it could not, but it is not necessary to determine this question, because it is quite clear that the 7th section of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act of 1890 gives a direct appeal from the requirement of a local authority. So far as I have proceeded in examining the Acts of the Legislature, they amount to this. By the Public Health Act 1875, s. 38, a local authority, including an urban authority, was enabled, upon the report of their surveyor by written notice, to require a specified number of water-closets to be constructed in a factory within their jurisdiction. That requirement, if made, was conclusive upon the justices at petty sessions, who in the case of a breach of the requirement has jurisdiction only to adjudicate upon the penalties to be imposed. By the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, s. 4, the local authority might be set in motion by a factory inspector, in which case they were empowered to take the same proceedings as if they had been set in motion by their own surveyor. And by the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 the provisions of sect. 38 of the Public Health Act 1875 are repealed in districts in which the Public Health Acts Amendment Act is in force, and its provisions are re-enacted in slightly different words. Having regard to the difficulty that might arise as to whether an appeal would lie from the order of justices enforcing a penalty for breach of a requirement made by the urban authority to quarter sessions under sect. 269 of the Public Health Act 1875, an express provision was inserted in sect. 7 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 that an appeal should lie direct from a requirement of a local authority to a court of quarter sessions. But it is to be observed that in all these cases the local authority or urban authority had a discretion as to whether they would take proceedings or not. They were bound to make inquiry, but they might if they please have refused to act upon the report of their own surveyor or upon the report of the factory inspector. Apparently in the opinion of the Legislature the local authorities had been reluctant to act upon the report of factory inspectors in cases where proceedings ought to have been taken for punishing or remedying acts, neglects, or defaults under the Public Health Acts. Accordingly, by sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 it is enacted that where notice of an act, neglect, or default is given by an inspector under sect. 4 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 to a sanitary authority and proceedings are not taken within a reasonable time (i.e., within one month, Factory and Workshop Act 1895, s. 3) for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default, the inspector may take the like proceeding for punishing or remedying the same, as the sanitary authority might have taken. What steps could the sanitary authority have taken for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default, mentioned in the notice given by the sanitary inspector? They could have proceeded only under sect. 22 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890, by serving a written requirement upon the owner or occupier, and in the event of the requirement not being complied with, proceeding before the justices to enforce penalties. If I am right in the conclusion which I have expressed, that the written requirement of the urban authority was, subject to an appeal to quarter sessions, conclusive as to the requirements contained in it, it seems to me to follow that when the Legislature conferred upon the inspector power to take like proceedings for punishing or remedying the act, neglect, or default that the written requirement of the inspector was intended to have and has the same force and effect as if the written requirement had been made by the urban authority. I can give no other meaning to the words "like proceedings." If the urban authority do not act within one month after notice of an act, neglect or default is given by the inspector, then the inspector shall be armed with their powers; he is put in their place and may take proceedings for punishing and remedying the act, neglect, or default, the same in character as the sanitary authority might have taken. Of course the act, neglect, or default must be a real act, neglect, or default, but the question is who is to determine whether an act, neglect, or default exists, and if it exists how it is to be remedied. I think this power is conferred upon the factory inspector, subject to the right of appeal to quarter sessions against his requirement. I think the appeal must exist from the requirement of the inspector, just as an appeal might be brought from the requirement of the urban authority if they had by written notice made a requirement. When sect. 2 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1891 enables the inspector to take the like proceedings as the sanitary authority might have taken, I think that means proceedings subject to the same conditions and the same right of appeal as proceedings taken by the sanitary authority. To hold otherwise would be to make the proceedings taken by the inspector different in character from proceedings taken by the urban authority, and to confer upon the inspector more absolute powers than those conferred upon the urban authority. The decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of The Ganges (43 L. T. Rep. 12; 5 P. Div. 247) is in point. By the County Courts Admiralty Jurisdiction Act 1868, s. 25, it was enacted that the Court of Passage of Liverpool should, upon an Order in Council being made, have in admiralty matters the like jurisdiction, power, and authorities as were conferred upon the County Court. No express provisions were made as to an appeal from the Passage Court. Yet it was held that the words "like jurisdiction" gave the same right of appeal from the Passage Court as existed from a County Court in an Admiralty matter, that is an appeal not to the Court of Queen's Bench but to the Court of Admiralty. I see nothing unreasonable in the construction which I think ought to be put upon the statutes. A factory inspector ought to be competent to determine such a question as to the number of water-closets required for the women employed in a particular factory; and having regard to the fact that in many urban districts owners of factories are largely represented on the borough bench, the Legislature may have had good reason for allowing the appeal to be made from the "requirement" of an inspector to the quarter sessions and not to petty sessions.

PHILLIMORE, J. read the following written judgment:—This case has stood for argument three times. On the first occasion it was heard by my brothers Grantham and Channell, and I believe they differed in opinion. The second hearing was before the late Lord Chief Justice and my brothers Grantham, Bruce, Darling, and myself. At the close of this argument I was in favour of the respondents. As to my colleagues I will only say this, that, if I had then stood alone, there would have been no necessity for a third argument. Now, however, after a third hearing, I understand that my Lord and my brothers, who with me formed the third court, are in favour of the appellant; and it is only necessary to state as briefly as I can why I still remain of opinion in favour of the respondents. I agree with some of the contentions put forward on behalf of the appellant. I think that an urban sanitary authority can, "when it appears" to such authority on the report of its surveyor that the sanitary accommodation is insufficient, make a requirement—which is in substance a judgment, and which, subject to appeal to quarter sessions, is conclusive—compelling the factory owner to provide further specified accommodation under penalties; and, which is the same thing, that upon a summons for disobedience to a requirement, the justices have no power to inquire into the reasonableness of the requirement, but only whether it was in fact made, and whether it has or has not been complied with (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59, s. 22). I think, further, that a factory inspector "when it appears" to him or her—the same phrase "when it appears" being again used—may give a notice to the urban sanitary authority complaining of "any act, neglect, or default in relation to any . . . water-closet (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16, s. 4), and that a deficiency of water-closets is a "neglect or default in relation to a water-closet," though the respondents contended otherwise; and that if the urban sanitary authority does not take within a month proceedings "for punishing or remedying the neglect or default," if neglect or default in fact there be, the factory inspector has power to make that formal requirement under a penalty, which the urban sanitary authority ought to have made, and in due time to issue a summons to enforce it. In conceding this last point to the argument of the appellant, I believe I am going further than a weighty authority would go. But I think, upon the whole it is right. There, however, I stop. Primarily it is the function of the judicial tribunal upon a summons for an offence to determine upon all the elements which go to make up the alleged offence. Express words are needed to withdraw any part of the alleged offence from the determination of the tribunal. In cases under the sanitary Acts it is often the fact that some part of the case is withdrawn from the justices and given to be decided by the sanitary authority. The Legislature has so provided and used apt words for the purpose, saying, not "where so and so is the case," which would leave the point to the tribunal, but "where it appears to the authority that so and so is the case," which leaves the point to the authority. There is, however, no rule of law that, in all sanitary Acts the sanitary requirement must be left to the sanitary authority to determine upon. If the Legislature ceases to use apt words for the purpose, the sanitary authority does not get the power. In this very matter it is conceded that a rural sanitary authority would have no such power (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37, s. 35). Now "when it appears" to the urban sanitary authority, it may make a requirement, and "when it appears" to the inspector he may give a notice; but when he desires to issue a requirement, the condition precedent is that he shall have given notice, not of what appeared to him to be an act, neglect, or default but of what really was an act, neglect, or default (54 & 55 Vict. c. 75, s. 2). Again, what powers to him? The power of punishing or remedying what? An imaginary or constructive act, neglect or default? No, a real act, neglect, or default. If there is no such real act, neglect, or default, there is nothing to punish or remedy. There is no trace of any provision anywhere making the opinion of the inspector conclusive, and direct legislation is required to make it so. In other words the factory inspector can, in certain circumstances, make a requirement which the factory owner will neglect at his peril, but just as an inspector cannot require until he has given notice to the urban sanitary authority and waited a month, so he cannot require unless, in fact, there is a real act, neglect, or default; and just as he must prove his notice and the expiration of a month before the justices, so must he prove the act, neglect, or default. If he does the factory owner will be in peril, for the penalty will begin from the date fixed in the requirement, and not from the date of the conviction by the justices. This is my view upon consideration of the language of the several Acts. I may add that I venture to think this conclusion gives considerable power to the inspector, and if open to some practical objections is not so objectionable as the other. In the first place, it would be monstrous to let a single factory inspector determine such a point without appeal, more especially as he is not apparently bound to hear the factory owners before making the requirements. I understand that the majority of my colleagues agree that that would be monstrous, but think that by implication there must be an appeal from the inspector to quarter sessions. I am glad that they so think, and I do not dissent. But, secondly, what is the use of bringing in the urban sanitary authority if it is merely to be given a chance to comply with the inspector's mandate, with the knowledge that if it does not it will be overruled and brought into contempt? And why interpose a month's delay in what may be an urgent matter? If the inspector is really to determine let him do so at once. Thirdly, I can understand that if the urban sanitary authoity should be supine it may be desirable to allow some other authority to do that which a member of the public could do—viz., prosecute—and thus submit the decision to a third body, the justices. But why let the single inspector overrule the whole sanitary committee and its surveyor? Again, there may be reasons for giving less power to a rural than to an urban sanitary authority; but the inspector is the same inspector in rural as in urban districts. In rural districts he, even if he acts with the rural sanitary authority, cannot decide; he can only prosecute. In urban sanitary districts he is to be allowed to decide, and to do this by overruling the apparently more important body. Upon the whole I should conclude in favour of the respondents, and say that the justices were right in admitting evidence to show that there was, in fact, no neglect or default on the part of the factory owners. Appeal allowed.

BULLOCK (app.) v. REEVE (resp.). (a)

Metropolis—Nuisances—Drain or sewer—Draining of groups of houses by combined operation—Deviation from grouping as sanctioned—Liability of owner for defective drain—Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 250—Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 112.

In 1855 the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers approved of a uniform system of drainage for the houses forming one side of a street, by which the houses were to be drained in groups of four each, the one drain serving for two blocks of two houses each, and they ordered the combined system to be carried out in accordance therewith.

Before the 1st Jan. 1856 the combined system was carried out, but in one of the groups there was an alteration from the grouping as approved, and the group as altered contained five houses instead of four, two having been added from the preceding group, and one originally belonging to the group was drained with the next group.

There was no evidence to show that the alteration or deviation was approved by the commissioners:

Held, that the deviation from the grouping as sanctioned was material, and that as such deviation had not been sanctioned, the pipe draining the group of five houses was a "sewer," and not a "drain" within the meaning of sect. 250 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, as amended by sect. 112 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862, and that consequently the owner of the houses was not liable to abate a nuisance on the premises arising from the defective condition of the pipe.

CASE stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at the Thames Police-court.

The respondent was summoned for an offence alleged to have been committed in contravention of the Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), and the summons was heard on the 10th and 17th May 1900.

The appellant, a sanitary inspector, was the complainant acting on behalf of the Board of Works for the Poplar district, and the respondent was the owner of premises known as No. 67, Arcadia-street, within the district.

The charge was that on the 3rd May 1900 at the above premises a nuisance existed—namely, that the drain was defective—and that the nuisance was caused by the act, default, or sufferance of the respondent.

It was proved to the satisfaction of the magistrate: (a) That owing to the defective condition of the pipe which passed under No. 67, Arcadia-street, a nuisance did exist at the premises as alleged; (b) that the pipe was used for the drainage of more than one building and premises not within the same curtilage; (c) that the respondent had been duly served with the necessary statutory notices to abate the nuisance, and had failed to comply with the requirements of the notices; and (d) that if the pipe was in law a drain the nuisance arose from the default and sufferance of the respondent.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the pipe was a drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation and laid or constructed before the 1st Jan. 1856 pursuant to the order or direction, or with the sanction or approval of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers within the meaning of sect. 250 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), as amended by sect. 112 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102).

The respondent contended that the existing drainage had not been laid or constructed pursuant to the order of the commissioners, or with their sanction or approval, and that the pipe was a sewer.

Upon this point the following facts were to be taken as proved or admitted: (a) On the 18th July 1855 a letter was sent to the Metropolitan Commissioners of sewers forwarding for their inspection and approval an accompanying plan showing the proposed mode of draining an estate at Poplar, which plan was similar to a plan adopted on the adjoining estate and approved by the commissioners. (b) According to this plan, a copy of which was annexed to the case, there was a uniform system of drainage proposed and the houses were drained in groups of four houses, the one drain serving for two blocks of two houses in each block. The red lines on the plan showed the proposed system of drainage, and the line in black showed the existing system. (c) A formal application for the sanctioning of the plan of combined drainage, dated the 23rd Aug. 1855, was also sent to the commissioners. (d) On the 16th Oct. 1855 the commissioners ordered and directed the combined drainage of the houses shown upon the plan, and referred to in the letter and application to be carried out accordingly, and the combined system of drainage existing upon the premises on the 3rd May 1900—the date when the charge was made—was laid out and constructed before the 1st Jan. 1856. (e) The existing system of drainage differs from that ordered and directed by the commissioners, inasmuch as it drains Nos. 59, 61, 63, 65, and 67 (five houses), instead of Nos.

[Q.B. Div.]

63, 65, 67, and 69 (four houses). That is to say, two houses (Nos. 59 and 61) were added, and one house (No. 69) which is now drained with No. 71, was not included. The houses were all continuous houses, the odd numbers being at one side of the street; and as approved of by the commissioners the groups ran thus: Nos. 55, 57, 59, and 61, in one group; Nos. 63, 65, 67, and 69, in the second group; and Nos. 71, 73, 75, and 79, in the third group, and so on. According to the existing system this grouping was changed and the second of these groups then consisted of the Nos. 59, 61 (taken from the first group), 63, 65, and 67, and No. 69 was excluded from this group and was added to the group beginning with No. 71.

There was no evidence to show that the deviations from the plan were sanctioned or approved by the commissioners.

Upon the above facts, and after referring to the cases of Kershaw v. Taylor (73 L. T. Rep. 274; (1895) 2 Q. B. 471), Holland v. Lasarus (66 L. J. 285, Q. B.), and Geen v. Newington Vestry (1898) 2 Q. B. 1, the magistrate was of opinion that the original combination not having been adhered to but altered, the pipe or drain as laid not having been so laid with the sanction or approval of the commissioners, or pursuant to their order or direction was a "sewer" within sect. 250 of the Metropolis Management Act of 1855, as amended by sect. 112 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act of 1862; and he dismissed the summons subject to this case.

The question for the court was whether upon the facts stated the decision of the magistrate was right in point of law. If the court should find in the affirmative then the decision was to stand, but if in the negative the case was to be remitted to the magistrate.

By sect. 250 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), it is provided:

The word "drain" shall mean and include any drain of and used for the building of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating with a cesspool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed, and shall also include any drain for draining any group or block of houses by a combined operation under the order of any vestry or district board; and the word "sewer" shall mean and include sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word "drain," interpreted as aforesaid, applies.

By sect. 112 of the Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), it is provided:

In the construction of the recited Acts and this Act . . . the word "drain" shall be deemed to apply to and include the subject matters specified in the 250th section of the firstly-recited Act, and also any drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation, laid or constructed before the 1st day of January 1856, pursuant to the order or direction or with the sanction or approval of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers.

E. D. Muir for the appellant.—The question which arises under the Metropolis Management Acts is whether the pipe in this case for carrying this sewage is a drain or a sewer. There was a plan sanctioned in 1855 for the draining of 217 houses, in groups of four houses each, but the group now in question does not comply with the original plan. There was a deviation from the plan as sanctioned, as there is a block of five houses in this group, and the question is whether this deviation from the plan which was sanctioned is such as to make this pipe a sewer. My submission is that the pipe is a "drain" within the meaning of the Acts, and that, under the circumstances, it was not necessary that there should be any evidence as to the approval of the deviation. It ought to be presumed that the deviation was approved in the usual way. There is no case precisely like the present, but there are cases which show that where plans are approved for a combined system and other houses are built to which the combined system does not apply, then the pipe is a sewer from its junction with the drain. There is no case which says that a pipe draining only houses to which an order for drainage by a combined operation applies is a sewer:

Geen v. Newington Vestry (1895) 2 Q. B. 1.

There was no material deviation in this case. The mere variation of the grouping of the houses—all being covered by the combined system approved of—is not such a deviation as to turn the drain into a sewer. In Greater London Property Company v. Foot (1899) 1 Q. B. 972; s.c., Owner of 238, Old Ford-road v. Foot (80 L. T. Rep. 390) there was a deviation in the course of a drain from the plan signed by the vestry's surveyor, but there was no evidence that any houses other than those on the plan were drained by the combined operation, and it was held that a mere deviation in the course of the drain was not sufficient to convert it into a sewer. Here there was a mere deviation from the grouping of the houses as approved, and all of the houses were covered by the combined system. The deviation was not material, and the pipe remained a "drain" and did not become a sewer.

Alexander Glen for the respondent.—The magistrate was right in finding that this pipe was a sewer and not a drain within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts, and that consequently the respondent was not liable for the defective condition of the sewer. The definition of "drain" is, by sect. 112 of the Act of 1862, to include not only drains as defined in sect. 250 of the Act of 1855, but also "any drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation, laid or constructed before the 1st Jan. 1856, pursuant to the order or direction or with the sanction or approval of the Metropolitan Commissioners of Sewers." The group now in question was constructed before the 1st Jan. 1856, but it had not received the sanction or approval of the commissioners. Therefore it does not come within the definition of a drain in this section. The case of Greater London Property Company v. Foot (ubi sup.) decides that a mere immaterial deviation does not prevent a case from coming within the definition, or convert a drain into a sewer; but the judgment of Darling, J. in that case clearly shows that if the deviation or alteration be material, then it must be sanctioned, otherwise the drain is converted into a sewer. Here the deviation from the approved plan is most material, and the question is whether this group or block of houses drained by this pipe is the group or block which the commissioners intended to be drained by this combined drainage. It clearly is not. The question whether a deviation is material or immaterial is a question of degree for the authority to decide, and the magistrate has found that it was material.

LAWRENCE, J.—I think the learned magistrate was quite right in the conclusion to which he came, on the authority of the cases which he himself mentions and to which our attention has been called. According to the facts as stated in the case, and to the plan which is annexed to the case, the red lines upon the plan show the drains which were approved of by the commissioners, and the plan that is before us is the plan which was before the commissioners. If those drains had been carried out according to the plan, this whole block of houses would all have been drained; but at some time or another before 1856, Nos. 59, 61, 63, 65, and 67 were drained according to a black line shown on the plan, which altered altogether the system of drainage proposed to be carried out by the commissioners, which was to have been laid in blocks of four. That seems to have been the only system of drainage which has existed from that time up to the present. The question now arises whether that drain of the block of five houses shown on the plan is a drain or a sewer. It seems to me, in the absence of evidence, that it was not approved of by the commissioners, and that being so, the whole of the cases that have been cited to us go to show that it became a sewer and was no longer a drain. In order to make it a drain it must have been constructed under a plan originally approved of by the commissioners. No such approval has been proved here, and I find as a fact that there was no such approval, which in this case comes to the same thing as saying that none has been proved. There being no proof of approval forthcoming, the magistrate came to what I think is a right conclusion in holding that this was a sewer.

KENNEDY, J.—I think the learned magistrate was perfectly right. The Metropolitan Management Act of 1862, s. 112, varies the expression "drain" used in the Act of 1855. It speaks of the word "drain" as including "any drain for draining a group or block of houses by a combined operation laid or constructed before the 1st Jan. 1856" under the order and approval of the Commissioners of Sewers. Apart from and except for that provision the thing—the conduit—which drains a number or block of houses would be a sewer. In this case there is a conduit or pipe draining a number of houses. There is a combined operation for the purpose of draining a group of houses. When we look at what was authorised we find that this combination was not authorised. There was authorised a combination of four houses, and not the same houses as are in the present combination; and that combination only was authorised. It may be that the evidence would show that the wrong act, whatever it was, and whether it was on the part of the builder or the building owner, or both, took place very soon after the order of the commissioners and in the original construction. Still, what we have to look at is, whenever the combined operation was carried out, can it be shown to have been done under the order of any vestry or district board or the other authorities who are brought in by sect. 112 of the amending Act of 1862. There is no such evidence in this case. It is a different combination, and the difference cannot, in my opinion, be treated as immaterial. It is a difference which lays a greater burden upon the pipe, because the pipe drains more of the houses in one pipe than were originally authorised to be drained in one pipe, and if it be a question of fact the magistrate must be taken to have found it was material. I do not think any tribunal could properly hold on such evidence as was before the magistrate that this was a mere immaterial deviation, as my brothers Darling and Channell held in the case before them of Greater London Property Company v. Foot (ubi sup.), and as, if my memory be right, I held myself in a very similar case at Nisi Prius. I think the judgment of the learned magistrate was right, and that this pipe must be treated as a sewer.

Appeal dismissed.

FULHAM VESTRY v. MINTER. (a)

New street—Paving—Apportionment of expenses—Land dedicated to the use of the public—Open Spaces Acts 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 35), 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 34), and 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 32)—London Open Spaces Act 1893 (56 & 57 Vict. c. lxxi.)—Metropolis Management Acts 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), ss. 105, 205, and 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77.

By an indenture, dated the 15th March 1894, certain land in the parish of F. was conveyed to the vestry of F. in fee simple to the end and intent that the same should be at all times thereafter kept and maintained as an open space for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation. This land was acquired by the vestry under powers conferred upon them by the Open Spaces Act 1877, by sect. 1 of which land so acquired is held "in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation." By the London Open Spaces Act 1893 the vestry are empowered to erect on land so required (inter alia) convenient and ornamental buildings and such appliances as they may think requisite for purposes of exercise and recreation and for other like purposes.

The vestry had erected on the land a cloak-room, a band stand, and a refreshment-room. The latter had been let to a caterer at 25l. per annum. Charges were made for the use of chairs about the band stand.

The land but not the buildings abutted on a new street which by a resolution of the vestry passed the 17th Jan. 1900 the vestry directed to be paved, and the estimated expenses apportioned among the frontagers.

Held, that the vestry were owners of the land and buildings within the Metropolitan Management Acts 1855 and 1862 and should be assessed towards the estimated expenses.

(a) Reported by J. ANDREW STRAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

FULHAM VESTRY v. MINTER.

[Q.B. Div.]

Per Phillimore, J.: The vestry took the land under the Open Spaces Acts 1877 and 1887, and the Act of 1881, in so far as it cut down their user of the land to "no other purpose" than the perpetual use thereof by the public, was not applicable.

CASE stated by John Rose, Esq., a metropolitan magistrate.

The respondent was summoned on a complaint by the clerk to the appellants for that he, the respondent, had refused or neglected to pay to the vestry or to their clerk the sum of 223*l.*, although the same had been duly demanded, such sum being charged upon him as owner of certain houses or lands fronting or bounding or abutting upon a certain new street or way known as Bishop's Park-road, section 1, and which houses or lands were set out and marked Nos. 1, 3, and 6 on the plan of the new street in respect of paving works to be carried out in the new street under and by virtue of the provisions of the Metropolis Local Management Act 1855, and the other Acts of Parliament amending the same.

Upon the hearing of the summons the following facts were proved or admitted:—

Bishop's Park-road, section 1, was a new street within the parish of Fulham. On the north-west side thereof it was bounded by a row of houses and on the south-east by an open space called Bishop's Park.

By an indenture dated the 15th March 1894 and made between the Bishop of London of the first part, the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England of the second part, and the vestry of the parish of Fulham of the third part, the land therein described was conveyed to the appellants in fee simple to the end and intent that the premises should be at all times thereafter kept and maintained as an open space for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation. Part of the land thereby conveyed abutted on the south-eastern side of the new street. This land was acquired by the appellants under the powers conferred upon them by the Open Spaces Acts.

By 40 & 41 Vict. c. 35, s. 1, such open space was held "in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation," and by 44 & 45 Vict. c. 34, ss. 3, 4, 5, "for no other purpose." By 56 & 57 Vict. c. 71, the vestry might erect thereon (inter alia) convenient and ornamental buildings and such appliances as they might think requisite for purposes of exercise and recreation and for other like purposes.

Upon the open space of land had been erected a band stand at the point marked A on the plan annexed to the indenture, a cloak-room at the point marked B, and a refreshment stall at the point marked C. The appellants let the refreshment stall at a rent of 25*l.* per annum to a caterer. The band stand was not let, but seats for the public were let by the vestry to a contractor at a rental.

On the 17th Jan. 1900 the appellants resolved as follows:

That whereas Bishop's Park-road, section 1, in the parish of Fulham, being a new street, is not paved to the satisfaction of this vestry, and it is deemed by them to be necessary and expedient that the same should be so paved. It is hereby resolved and ordered that the said street be taken and paved under the provisions of 18 & 19 Vict. c. 120, and 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102; that the surveyor's plan and estimate be approved and adopted, that the estimated cost of the said paving works be apportioned upon the owners of the houses or land abutting upon or bounding the said street at the proportions and in the amount as set forth in the apportionment hereby made, approved, and sealed with the official seal of the vestry, and the officers instructed to take the necessary steps for collecting the apportioned amounts within fourteen days.

The plan and apportionment in duplicate were sealed accordingly.

The respondent was the owner of certain houses in the new street—viz., Nos. 1, 3, and 6, Bishop's Park-road, section 1—and by the said apportionment the sum of 223*l.* was charged upon him as such. The sum had been demanded of him and was not paid.

The apportionment proceeded upon the basis that the cost of paving the new street should be defrayed by the owners of the houses and lands on the north-west side thereof, and not in any part by the owners of the land on the south-east side thereof.

It was contended upon the part of the respondent that the apportionment was invalid for that a part of the cost of paving ought to have been apportioned upon the appellants as owners of the open space abutting upon the south-east side of the new street.

It was contended upon the part of the appellants that the apportionment was valid, for the open space was extra commercium or subject in perpetuity to the burden of a public right which deprived the appellants of the beneficial use of it.

The learned magistrate dismissed the summons.

The judgment of the learned magistrate was annexed to the case, and it set out fully the arguments used before him and before the court above and the grounds of his honour's decision which were approved of by both the judges of the Divisional Court: "The question is whether the apportionment of the estimated expenses of paving a new street under the Metropolis Management Acts is valid inasmuch as it does not include the vestry as the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such new street and held under the Open Spaces Acts. The Metropolis Local Management Act (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 105, enacts that the expenses of paving a new street must be paid by the owners of the houses forming such street, and under the Amendment Act (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), s. 77, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute. By the interpretation clause, sect. 250, of the principal Act, 'owner' shall mean the 'person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rack rent.' Why was this definition which limits the ordinary meaning of the word 'owner' given in the Act? The reason may be this—A new street has to be paved. The first cost of the paving is laid on the frontagers who derive the immediate benefit from the paving. The Legislature did not think fit to impose the first cost, which is considerable, on mere occupiers whose tenancies might be short and means small, or even on mere owners who might have a reversionary interest in the land and get little or

FULHAM VESTRY v. MINTER.

[Q.B. Div.]

no present return from it or advantage from the paving, but the Legislature might well have thought that where the owner did or, if he chose, might get substantial profit, rack rent, from the land—perhaps indirectly from the improvement of the street—he ought to bear his part of the expense of paving it, and therefore have given this definition of 'owner.' The vestry are in law owners of land bounding or abutting on the street. They also would receive the rack rent of the land if such land were let at a rack rent, and they are therefore within the literal terms of the interpretation clause. But it is said that they are, nevertheless, not owners within the meaning of the Act, because the land cannot be let at a rack rent. Perhaps if the attention of the Legislature had been called to the fact that this was land from which no profit could possibly be got, out of which the cost of paving could be paid, the owners of such land would have been expressly exempted from contribution. It may not be unreasonable to imply such exemption. That some limitation of the literal terms of sect. 77 and the definition clause, sect. 250, may be implied is evident from Angell v. Vestry of Paddington (L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 714), in which a church and its land were held to be neither house nor land within the Act and perhaps also from Plumstead Board of Works v. British Land Company (32 L. T. Rep. 94; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 203), in which the Exchequer Chamber held that the owners of the soil of highways at the end of a street were not owners of land in the street so as to be liable to the cost of paving it. The learned counsel for the vestry in a fair and skilful commentary on the cases mainly relied on the principle stated in Great Eastern Railway v. Hackney Board of Works (49 L. T. Rep. 509; 8 App. Cas. 687, 693) by Lord Watson, who said: 'The authorities cited in the course of the argument appear to me to have established this proposition—that the person vested with the property of heritable subjects which have been placed extra commercium, or are subject in perpetuity to the burden of a public right which deprives him of their beneficial use, is not an owner of land within the meaning of the 77th section of the Act of 1862.' The principle is there expressed in the terms of the Roman and Scotch rather than in those of English law. But Mr. Macaskie also referred me to the language used by Bowen, L.J., who said in Wright v. Ingle (56 L. T. Rep. 511; 16 Q. B. Div. 379): 'Whether in the case of premises which were prevented by an Act of Parliament from being let at a rack rent there ever would be an owner within the meaning of sect. 250 I very much doubt, but I am inclined to think that if this incapacity to let were stamped on the premises they would never have an owner within the meaning of sect. 250.' Let me try to apply to this case before me those authoritative dicta which afford the chief support to the argument for the vestry. This land was acquired and is held in fee simple by the vestry under statutory powers in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation under 40 & 41 Vict. c. 35, s. 1, and for no other purpose by 44 & 45 Vict. c. 34, s. 5. But the vestry may erect and maintain thereon (inter alia) convenient and ornamental buildings and such appliances as they may think requisite for purposes of exercise and recreation, and for refreshment-rooms, band stands, conveniences, or for other like purposes (56 & 57

Vict. c. lxxi.). Is the effect of these statutory restrictions to place the land extra commercium within the meaning of Lord Watson, or is the incapacity to let stamped on the premises within the meaning of Bowen, L.J.? The open space is by the statutes placed extra commercium in the sense that it cannot be alienated or disposed of in any way inconsistent with the perpetual use of it by the public for exercise and recreation. There is, however, no express statutory prohibition against letting the land or buildings lawfully erected thereon on terms which will preserve the rights of the public, and I do not think that such prohibition must necessarily be implied from the Open Spaces Acts; but perhaps it is unnecessary to establish the proposition that the land may be actually let at a rack rent in order to bring the owner within the definition in sect. 77, and I think that the decisions by which I am bound leave me free to adopt the view taken by Collins, J. in Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. London Cemetery Company (70 L. T. Rep. 734; (1894) 1 Q. B. 699, at p. 706), who says: 'In order to be exempt, the land must be extra commercium, but where the owners are entitled by statute to use it beneficially, receiving as profit a lump sum which is equivalent to a rack rent, the land is not extra commercium.' In this case the owners are expressly empowered by the London Open Spaces Act 1893, s. 25, to erect and maintain buildings and appliances for exercise and recreation and for refreshment-rooms, band stands, and conveniences, and for other like purposes. It would be easy to suggest buildings and appliances which might be erected for exercise and recreation from which profit might be derived. It could not be reasonably implied that the refreshments, for example, involved in the use of refreshment-rooms are to be supplied gratis or at cost price to the public, and if charges may lawfully be made for these accessories, they become sources of profit which may be equivalent to a rack rent. If rack rent or its equivalent may lawfully be got, an inquiry whether it is actually got may be superfluous, but some profit is in fact got from the open space. A refreshment stall is let for 25l. a year. Chairs are supplied for the use of which money is paid. Fees are taken with the sanction of the vestry for the use of a cloak-room. The receipts may not, perhaps, at present amount to a rack rent, but it is conceivable that a larger sum might be obtained from these sources, especially for the privilege of selling refreshments at a place of popular resort for exercise and recreation. Mr. Macaskie said that the refreshment stall is not on the land abutting on the section of the 'new street,' which is the subject of the apportionment. I think that the rent for it may be regarded as derived not merely from the refreshment stall, but from the whole area of the open space, including the part abutting on the street which makes the stall valuable. If, however, I am wrong in so thinking, the fact remains that other refreshment-rooms or means of deriving profit may be lawfully set up on the piece of land actually bounding or abutting on the new street. In my opinion the vestry are, within 25 & 26 Vict. c. 102, s. 77, and 18 & 19 Vict. c. 126, s. 250, owners of land bounding or abutting on such street, they are trustees for the public and would receive the rack rent of the land if such land were let at a rack rent as I think it lawfully might be, without interfering with the purposes to which the land is devoted by statute. No decided case is on all fours with the present one, and Mr. Macaskie pointed out to me the distinctions between it and those cases which seemed to be against him. But several decisions were cited that were nearly in point, and tend to support the conclusion to which I have come—viz., that the apportionment is invalid because the owners of the open space are not included as contributories to the expense of paving the new street."

BRUCE, J.—In this case I think that the decision of the learned magistrate was right, and that we ought to affirm his decision. I have to say that I feel myself very much indebted to the magistrate for the very careful judgment he has delivered. It has been an assistance to me in considering this. I think he has correctly stated the law and correctly applied it to the facts. I do not propose to go through the very numerous cases which have been cited during the argument, but I think the principle of the cases may be said to be this—that where there exist land or houses abutting upon a new street, then the person who receives the rent or who, if rent were payable, would receive the rent, and who is the owner within the definition of owner given in the Act of Parliament, is liable to contribute to the expenses of the new street. This exception has been established—that where the premises held are of such a character that they are struck with a legal incapacity of ever being used, if a house as a house, or if land as land is struck with the legal incapacity of being let at a rack rent, that incapacity being of a permanent character and of such a kind as to affect the nature of the property, then the property is not property of which there can be an owner within the meaning of the statute. That is the substance of the rule as stated by the judges in Wright v. Ingle (sup.). The definition of an owner as stated in the words of Lord Watson in Great Eastern Railway Company v. Hackney Board of Works (sup.), where he held that the company were not owners of the land abutting on houses, is that "the person vested with the property of heritable subjects which have been placed extra commercium or are subject in perpetuity to the burden of a public right which deprives him of their beneficial use is not an owner of land within the meaning of the 77th section of the Act of 1862." So that unless the land or the houses are brought within one of these definitions, unless they are struck with an incapacity to be let, or I should say an incapacity to be used beneficially, they are liable to contribute to the expenses of the new street. Now, in the present case the question we have to consider is this: Whether the land in question is struck with such incapacity. I think not. It is conveyed to be kept and maintained as an open space for the perpetual use thereof to the public for exercise and recreation and for no other purpose. But, although it is subject to that burden, it seems to me that that is not a burden which deprives the vestry altogether of the beneficial use of the property. They possess power to erect and maintain on the open space buildings for the accommodation of keepers, constables, and other persons employed by them in connection with the maintenance of the open space, also such convenient and ornamental buildings and such appliances as they may think requisite for the purpose of exercise and recreation, and for refreshment-room, band stand, conveniences, and other like purposes provided that the consent of the county council be first obtained. So that they have the power here to do many things which are not inconsistent with the enjoyment of the place as an open space for the public. They may build a gardener's cottage, and the gardener who is attending to the open space may live there. It may be said that they are not entitled to charge a rent for his living there. I do not know whether that is so or not. The occupation of the cottage would be a beneficial occupation because it would be taken into account in payment of his wages, and therefore it would be a beneficial occupation for the purpose of their servant. Again, the band stand no doubt is erected for the benefit of the public. But it may be possible, although no charge could be made to the public for listening to the band or for entering the ground, that the bandmaster might solicit contributions from the public and obtain contributions from the public to a considerable amount, and for the privilege of playing there and soliciting contributions from the public he might pay a sum of money to the vestry, and there might then arise beneficial ownership. So with regard to the refreshment-room. That is let, and they do derive a sum of money—I think a sum of 25*l.*—a year for the use of the refreshment-room. There, again, there is a beneficial occupation, and so I think in many ways the vestry might derive, consistently with the terms on which they hold the land, a beneficial occupation, and it cannot be said that this land is extra commercium, or that, although it is dedicated to the use of the public, the vestry are prohibited from obtaining any profit from it. Then it was said in the argument that they could not let it at a rack rent. Letting it at a rack rent, I think, means merely that the land is let for the best return that can be obtained for it. But I shall adopt the dictum of Collins, J. in Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. London Cemetery Company (sup.), where, in considering this question, he says: "But where the owners are entitled by statute to use it beneficially, receiving as profit a lump sum which is equivalent to a rack rent, the land is not extra commercium. It would be too narrow a conclusion that because the rent is not received in the shape of a rack rent the land is extra commercium, and the owners are not owners within the meaning of the statute." Therefore, I think, here there is a beneficial occupation, and, there being a beneficial occupation, I think that the vestry are the owners of the land within the meaning of the definition given of owners, and that they are liable to contribute to the expense of the new street.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I wish to express my obligation to the learned magistrate for the way in which he has stated the case and assisted us with his reasons. By the joint effect of the two Metropolis Management Acts the owners of houses and land bounding or abutting upon a new street are bound to pay to the vestry expenses of paving and the other expenses of making up the new street, and the owner means the person for the time being receiving the rack rent of the lands or premises in connection with which the said word is used, whether on his own account or as agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if the lands or premises were let at a rack rent. The very large and general words of this enactment have been limited by decisions (and that, I think, is the way in which we should look at it) to this extent, and to this extent only, that if the lands or premises are for all time incapable of being beneficially used, they are not to be treated as lands which are or could be let at a rack rent. At one time I thought perhaps the right thing was to say "if the lands could never be legally let at a rack rent," but the decision in Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. London Cemetery Company (sup.) and, I think, the language of Lord Watson in Great Eastern Railway Company v. Hackney Board of Works (sup.) point to the fact that that is somewhat too narrow a view. The lands must be, as Bowen, L.J. points out with regard to the buildings—the same thing would be true of the land—physically capable of beneficial enjoyment, of profitable enjoyment. They must be also legally capable of "profitable enjoyment"—apparently on one decision not necessarily capable at the moment, but legally capable at some time or other. If those two conditions are satisfied, then the lands fall into the ordinary category and are lands abutting on the street which have an owner, and, if there is an owner in this case, there is no question it must be the vestry. Now, what one has to consider is, whether this land is capable of any profitable or beneficial enjoyment. I agree it is not capable of much. I agree that some of the suggestions made in the argument—possibly some I made myself—are rather strained and fanciful, but the fact remains, first of all, that actually at this moment a portion of the land is beneficially enjoyed; and, secondly, that beneficial and profitable enjoyment can to some extent be got possibly out of every particle of the land. I quite agree primarily the use for which this land is destined is for the recreation and enjoyment of the public. Nothing must interfere with that, and consistently with that, sometimes really assisting that, there may be uses out of which profit can be derived. Mr. Macaskie in his argument, for which we are very much indebted to him, has tried to point out to us to-day that the vestry must be restricted by the express provisions of sect. 5 of the Open Spaces Act 1881 (44 & 45 Vict. c. 34). It is not necessary to consider whether, if the section did apply, it would have all the restrictive force for which he contends, because this land is, in my opinion and in the opinion of my learned brother as I understand, not to be deemed to be acquired under that Act, but under the more beneficial Acts of 1877 and 1887, and I repeat again what I said in the course of the argument, that there is in my opinion excellent good sense—as there always was in every expression of the late Sir George Jessel—in the observation made by him, in delivering the opinion of the Court of Appeal in the case which I refer to, that if a public body was enabled to exercise public powers under either of two statutes, they were to be deemed, if there was any difference in respect of the two, to take them under the statute under which they took most beneficially. Therefore I am of opinion that this vestry must be taken to have acquired this land under the Acts of 1877 and 1887. It is very possible that the Act of 1881 and the powers acquired under it remain for the purpose of acquiring churchyards, cemeteries, and burial grounds, and it is very possible that under no other Act can the vestry take such open spaces. It may very well be that when they take such open spaces, sentiment, apart from other reasons, may make it desirable that they should make no money out of those particular open spaces, and therefore with regard to those particular open spaces they may be specially restricted. We have not to consider that here, because they take under the general powers, and, taking under the general powers, they have the powers which all owners have except so far as they are restricted. They are restricted by the trust, and that really is the only restriction we ought to look at. No doubt they are also restricted by the fact that the vestry being a public body can only spend their money upon certain definite public objects, and would be proceeding ultra vires if they embarked in trade or similar enterprises. But I do not think we ought to look at that when we look at the land. The question we have to look at is whether the land can be beneficially used, and not whether the particular owner at the moment can beneficially use it. It may be that the vestry could beneficially use it in many ways besides those which my learned brother has indicated. It is certain they could use it in many other ways. Certainly they do use it in some ways at present. Any hardship which might follow from the land being deemed to be contributable to the assessment of the street can be got over; as has already been pointed out, the vestry themselves, acting fairly and reasonably, and not acting unfairly, can make a separate minor assessment upon the land to that which they make upon the houses. It is clear this land of the park is by no means so profitable as the opposite land of the houses, but it does bring in, within the purview of the Act, some profit to its owners, which are the vestry, and therefore to some extent it ought to contribute, in my judgment, to the paving of this street. Therefore the assessment which was made upon the respondent in this case, which did not take into consideration any contribution by the vestry as the owners of the park, was a bad assessment, and the learned magistrate was right in dismissing

LEIGH DISTRICT COUNCIL (apps.) v. KING (resp.) (a)

Highway—Substitution—Formalities under Highway Act 1835—Presumption—Evidence as to highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

In 1842 R.-grove was, pursuant to a resolution passed at a vestry meeting, substituted for an older highway called C.-lane.

R.-grove ever since 1842 had been open to and used by the general public, and upon one occasion many years back it had been repaired by the surveyor of L., but whether in his capacity as surveyor or not did not appear.

No surveyor's accounts were produced, nor was any evidence given as to any certificate of justices having been enrolled or steps taken under sects. 23 or 84 of the Highway Act 1835.

Held, that the justices were justified in finding that R.-grove was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

CASE stated on an information laid on behalf of the appellants setting forth that the respondent, in pursuance of sect. 7 of the Private Street Works Act 1892, served on the appellants a written notice stating that he objected to the proposals of the appellants in regard to the levelling, paving, metalling, flagging and channelling, and making good of a certain street known as Rectory-grove, on the ground that the street was in whole or in part a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and, in consequence of such notice, the appellants were precluded from making up the street until the objection had been heard and determined in pursuance of sect. 6 of the Act.

On the 15th Feb. 1900 the justices, having heard the information, dismissed it, holding, as a matter of fact, that the street was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, and they directed the apportionment to be quashed or amended accordingly.

The apportionment having been made and approved and deposited under the authority of sect. 6 of the Private Street Works Act 1892, and the respondent having by his notice of objection as set out in the information taken objection thereto within the time limited by sect. 7 of the statute, the only question at issue and to be determined by the justices under sect. 8 of the statute was whether or no the street called Rectory-grove was in whole or a part a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

The evidence adduced showed that after the 20th March 1836—to wit, about the year 1842—the road on the north side of the rectory, now known as Rectory-grove, had been substituted for an older public highway, which was in front or to the south of the rectory of Leigh, and was known as Chess-lane, and that such substitution was pursuant to a resolution at a vestry meeting held pursuant to notice dated the 8th Jan. 1842 for the parish of Leigh in 1842, whereby the meeting resolved to stop up a road in front of the rectory (being the road called Chess-lane), and open a new road at the back through Sweeting's and Parsonage Fields agreeable to the plan produced in vestry. The road called Rectory-grove leads towards the same spot as that which Chess-lane formerly led. Soon after 1842 trees were planted on the northern hedge of Rectory-grove by the Rev. Eden, then rector of Leigh and the predecessor of the respondent, but there was no evidence of any repairs having been done to Rectory-grove by the Rev. Eden or any of his successors or the respondent.

There was evidence of repairs on one occasion to Rectory-grove many years back by Mr. Webb, the surveyor for Leigh, but whether as surveyor or otherwise did not appear. There was no evidence of repair by the surveyor beyond this, but there was also evidence that the Leigh Parish Council, the immediate predecessors of the appellants, had repaired the footpaths in Rectory-grove. Rectory-grove has ever since 1842 been open to the general public. No surveyor's accounts were produced, nor was any evidence given as to any certificate having been enrolled or steps taken under sect. 23 or sect. 84 of the Highway Act 1835.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that no highway after the 20th March 1836 (the date of coming into operation of the Highway Act 1835) could be or become a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large until the steps mentioned in sect. 23 or sect. 84 of that Act had been taken. That Rectory-grove had been shown to have been made since the 20th March 1836, and that as there was no evidence of the steps necessary under sects. 23 or 84 of the Highway Act 1835 having been taken, it could not now be a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that Rectory-grove is a highway within the definition of sect. 4 of the Highway Act 1835. That all highways prima facie and at common law are repairable by the inhabitants at large. That such liability was displaced by sect. 23 of the Highway Act 1835 with respect to certain roads only—namely, a road or occupation way made, or hereafter to be made by and at the expense of a private individual or private person, body politic or corporate. That the onus of proving that Rectory-grove was a road so made as to displace the common law liability of the parish to repair it, was on the appellants; that they had given no evidence of Rectory-grove having been so made. That in the absence of such evidence sect. 23 did not apply to Rectory-grove, and the common law liability of the inhabitants to repair same remained unaffected by the Highway Act 1835. That the terms of the resolution of the vestry in 1842 constituted evidence on the other hand that the opening of the new road and its making up was the act of the parish, and not of a private person, body politic or corporate. That there was evidence of repair by the parish surveyor, and clear evidence of repair to the footpath by the parish council.

Q.B. Div.]

LEIGH DISTRICT COUNCIL (apps.) v. KING (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

The court found as a matter of fact that Rectory-grove was a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether there was evidence to justify such finding.

Macmorran, Q.C. and E. Cunningham Glen for the appellants.—After the coming into operation of the Highway Act 1835—namely, the 20th March 1836, no highway could be or become a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large, unless all the steps and formalities prescribed by either sect. 23 or sect. 84 of that statute had been complied with. The evidence set out in the case does not show that this has ever been done. It is clear that all the formalities must be complied with, for in Reg. v. Dukinfield (4 B. & S. 158) where a landowner had obtained and enrolled the certificate of two justices under sect. 23, but it had not been made to the satisfaction of the surveyor, it was held that the road had not become repairable by the inhabitants at large. In Eyre v. New Forest Highway Board (56 J. P. 517) it was laid down by Willa, J. and approved by the Court of Appeal that where there was no public right of way prior to the Highway Act 1835, there was no duty to repair or right to repair attached to the highway authority unless the procedure prescribed by the statute had been complied with. The same principle appears as to the strict compliance with the requirements of the statute in Reg. v. East Hagbourne (1 Bell C. C. R. 135; 5 Jur. N. S. 346) which was the case of a road marked out by inclosure commissions, which straightened and widened an old highway repairable by the parish, in the year 1849. They also referred to Cubitt v. Masse, 29 L. T. Rep. 244; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 704.

These decisions all show that where a highway has not been in use as such before 1836, then, unless all these steps are taken, the inhabitants are not liable. In Rishton v. Haslingden Corporation (77 L. T. Rep. 620; (1898) 1 Q. B. 294) the place in question was formed before 1816, and had always been open both ends into highways, and it had existed in the same condition for seventy years, and since its formation it had been used by foot passengers without interruption. Neither public nor private repairs had been proved. It was there held that it was a footway repairable by the inhabitants at large. Channell, J. said: "The second question is the one which must decide this part of the case. . . . If it was a highway before 1835, it would be repairable by the inhabitants at large without any formalities having been gone through to take it over." The road in this case has only been a highway since 1842. The parish as such cannot make a highway at all, and the surveyor of highways must be either an individual or body politic within the section. The only powers of the parish council are those contained in sect. 13 (2) of the Local Government Act 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73). The parish council have no right to repair the road. They are not a highway authority in any case.

Mattinson, Q.C. and Earle for the respondent.—The facts are obscure owing to the lapse of time, but the question which is raised here is, On whom does the burden of proof lie? Prima facie all highways were repairable by the inhabitants at large, and this road undoubtedly was a highway. The onus of proof is on the appellants to show that the road was intended to be made a highway under sect. 23. This road has been a highway since 1842, and there is a presumption that it is repairable by the inhabitants at large. There is no evidence that the formalities required by sect. 23 have not been complied with, and as the road has been used since 1842 by the public, it is only proper to assume that those formalities were complied with. In Glen on Highways, 2nd edit., at p. 87, in dealing with the liability of the inhabitants at large he says: "The liability extends to modern as well as ancient highways, subject, however, to sect. 23 of the Highway Act 1835." In Rees v. Lordsmere (15 Q. B. 696; 15 Jur. 82) Lord Campbell, C.J. says: "I am of opinion that the rule of law is that the parish is liable to repair all highways, whether new or old. I concur with what is said on that subject by Abbott, C.J. (Rees v. Netherthong, 2 B. & Ald. 179)—'By the general rule of law the inhabitants of any district who were liable to the repair of all the roads there, previously to the introduction of a new highway, are also liable to the repair of that highway.'" It is true that there is an exception created by sect. 23 of the Highway Act 1835, but that we are within that must be proved by the appellants. We say that sect. 23 has no application here, but even if it has, there is no evidence in the case to show that the steps necessary were not complied with. In Williams v. Eylon (4 H. & N. 357; 5 Jur. N. S. 770) no proof was given that the requisite order of justices had ever been made where a highway was being stopped up, but it was held that from the road not being used for a long period it might be presumed that there was such an order. They also referred to Phillips v. Halliday, 23 Q. B. Div. 48; (1891) A. C. 228.

We contend that we are not within sect. 23 at all. That section only applies to a road made by a person or body politic or corporate and dedicated to the public, and not to a road of this description at all. It is quite clear that this section does not apply to all roads from the judgment of Coleridge, J. in Reg. v. Thomas (7 E. & B. 399; 3 Jur. N. S. 713) when dealing with a road that had been vested in commissioners for twenty-one years, but had ceased to be so vested upon the expiry of a Turnpike Act in 1848. He said: "The owner of the land which had been taken for the turnpike road might decline further to repair it or the public to use it. But the owner might allow the public to continue to use the road; and if the public did use it as a highway, the burden of repair would fall upon the parish, whether they would or not. . . . But it is said that, however that might be at common law, sect. 23 of the Highway Act 1835 interposes a difficulty, for this was a road which it was sought to turn into a highway. But this depends upon whether sect. 23 applies to such a case as the present. It appears that the Legislature contemplated the case of a private person making a road for the purpose of dedicating it, or setting out a private driftway under an Inclosure Act, and not such a case as this. Neither do the words of the section embrace such a case. . . . I never heard it laid down that all roads were included in the enactment in sect. 23." They also referred to Healey v. Corporation of Batley, L. Rep. 19 Eq. 375.

Q.B. Div.]

Macmorran, Q.C. in reply.—The road came into existence after 1836, and therefore the presumption is rebutted that it is repairable by the inhabitants at large, and the burden of proof shifts to the respondent. The acts of the vestry showed that they meant to proceed under sect. 84 of the Highway Act 1835, but the respondent cannot show that all the formalities of that section have been complied with. Cur. adv. vult.

BRUCE, J.—I agree with my learned brother in the result at which he has arrived. There was, as it seems to me, sufficient evidence to justify the justices in finding that the road in question was repairable by the inhabitants at large. I think it is clear that the old highway, known as Chess-lane, was repairable by the inhabitants at large. I think the reasonable conclusion upon the evidence is, that the new highway, known as Rectory-grove, was in the year 1842, by a resolution of the vestry, substituted for Chess-lane under the provisions of sect. 84 of the General Highway Act. The difficulty arises because there is no direct evidence of a view by two justices of the peace, and of the other formal steps necessary to be taken in order to comply with the provisions of sect. 85, and the following sections of the General Highway Act. But if these provisions were complied with, then it is clear that under sect. 92 of the General Highway Act the new highway became repairable by the inhabitants at large just as the old highway was repairable. The question is whether in the circumstances the justices were justified in finding that the formal steps had been duly taken. It is clear that since 1842 the old highway has been stopped up and has ceased to be used, and the new highway has in fact been substituted for it. It is, I think, a very violent presumption that the public should acquiesce in the stopping up of the old road unless it were done in a regular way, and I think the justices may well have presumed that the certificate of the justices was duly granted, and the formal proceedings duly taken to comply with the provisions of sect. 85. After so long a period a certificate of the justices may have been lost, and although it is difficult to presume that the certificate was enrolled among the records of quarter sessions, yet the provisions as to enrolment are apparently directory only, and the neglect to enrol would not affect the validity of the proceedings: (see Deponthieu v. Pennyfeather, 15 E. R. 603; 5 Taunt. at p. 634). It is further difficult to assume that the order of quarter sessions was duly made, but I think that the dictum of Wightman, J. in the case of Williams v. Eytton (4 H. & N. 358) that the inclosure of a road for a period of about twenty-eight years is sufficient to warrant the court standing in the place of a jury in presuming that everything was rightly done, and that an order of two justices was obtained, afford a guide to assist us to a conclusion in the present case. Here the period of time was much longer than twenty-eight years—a little short of fifty years—and although the facts are not the same as the facts in Williams v.

Eytton, yet the principle laid down in the dictum I have quoted appears to me to apply. There was further the evidence that the new road had been repaired by the surveyor of the district. It did not appear in what capacity the surveyor repaired the road, but in the absence of evidence I think it would be unreasonable to presume that the surveyor had paid for the expenses of repair out of his own pocket. For these reasons I am of opinion that the court cannot disturb the finding of the justices.

PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case the appellant district council seeks to make the respondent liable for a proportion of the expenses of converting Rectory-grove into a paved and made-up street, and the respondent contests his liability upon the ground that Rectory-grove was, before it was so made up, already a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large. There seems little doubt that the road called Rectory-grove was laid out about the year 1842, and has ever since been used as a highway, and that when it was so laid out an older highway on the other side of the rectory ground was closed. This older highway must be taken upon the facts stated in the case to have been one repairable by the inhabitants of the parish. The appellants say, however, that the new highway never became repairable by the inhabitants of the parish, because it was laid out after the passing of the Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), and that since that Act a new highway only becomes so repairable if the conditions either of sect. 23 of that Act (applicable to additional highways) or sects. 84-92 (applicable to substituted highways) have been fulfilled, and that there is no proof that these have been fulfilled, or alternatively, that there is proof that they have not been fulfilled. I do not think that it follows that in every case where an additional highway is laid out the conditions of sect. 23 must be fulfilled. I think this is generally the case, but there are exceptions, of which Reg. v. Thomas (7 E. & B. 399) gives an instance where the section does not apply. I think it only applies when the road is "made by and at the expense of any individual or private person, body politic or corporate," and it is clear that if the parish itself through its surveyor made a road, it would not come under this section as the later provisions of the section itself show. It may be that a surveyor so employing the parish funds would be acting ultra vires, but I can quite conceive that in days when there was less centralisation and no outside audit, the making up of a short piece of road, say to cut off a loop, might be deemed to come within the power of repair which a surveyor acting under the orders of the vestry would possess. I agree, however, with counsel for the appellants that it is more probable that this highway was intended to be a substituted one, to which sects. 84-92 would apply. If sect. 23 applied, a certificate by two justices, which ought to be enrolled at quarter sessions, is a necessary condition before the highway can become repairable by the inhabitants. But I do not think that the actual enrolment is a necessary condition. If it be a substituted highway, the consent of the vestry, a certificate by two justices, an order of quarter sessions, and a further certificate by two justices of the good condition of the new road, which certificate ought also to be enrolled, are necessary conditions before the substitution can be accomplished and the old highway stopped. I am, however, not sure that an incomplete substitution made with the assent of the vestry, might not, though no order of quarter sessions was obtained, operate as the making of a new road under sect. 23 though as the substitution were incomplete the old highway would remain unclosed. This being the law, the facts as found by the case are a resolution of the vestry expressed in language which looks as if the parishioners were rather active instead of mere consenting parties to the de facto opening and using of the new highway, and the de facto closing of the old one, acquiesced in apparently by everybody since 1842, and one act of repair of the new highway by a person who was surveyor and probably acted in his capacity of surveyor. Against this evidence in favour of the new highway being one repairable by the inhabitants is to be set the fact that no certificate of justices or order of quarter sessions is forthcoming. Upon this evidence the justices, who have stated the case have found that Rectory-grove is a highway repairable by the inhabitants at large; and if there is any evidence to support their decision it must stand. I think there is. Indeed, I think I should have found the same way. Assuming that this case must come under either sect. 23 or under sects. 84-92, and I have stated that it may not come under either group of sections, all that is required by sect. 23 is a certificate by two justices, which ought to be enrolled, but which, as I have said, need not be. It is quite possible that such a certificate may be lost; I can conceive it having been handed to the then rector as a sort of title-deed and perhaps not handed on to his successor. If the case necessarily comes under sects. 84-92 no doubt there is much more difficulty in supposing the loss of an order of quarter sessions. But the duty of the judges on matters of ancient possession or of the exercise of public rights, is to presume in favour of long, open, and continuous usage. Many cases referred to in the course of the argument show this; and others could be quoted. The contention of the appellants is far reaching. Not only is the new highway not repairable by the inhabitants, though they have used it since 1842, but the old closed highway ought to be opened and could now be opened. The owner of the soil who has enjoyed undisturbed possession of the soil of the old highway for the same period would have his property seriously injured, and the parishioners or the subsequent highway board (if there was one) and the present appellant district council itself would have been and be now indictable for suffering the old highway to go out of repair. I am of opinion that my judgment should be for the respondent.

Appeal dismissed.

SOUTHALL NORWOOD URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (apps.) v. MIDDLESEX COUNTY COUNCIL (resps.). (a)

River—Pollution—Agreement—Breach of agreement—Liability of local authority—"Causing or suffering to flow"—Middlesex County Council Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. cci.), s. 13.

By an agreement made between the predecessors of the appellants, the local board, and the owner of a margarine factory, it was agreed that the owner of the factory, subject to certain conditions, should be entitled to discharge the liquids and effluent from the factory into the sewers of such board.

A sewage farm, owned by the board, became vested in the appellants, and, owing to a breach of the agreement by the factory owner, the soil of the farm became clogged and rendered less capable of filtering the sewage in the appellants' district.

By reason thereof sewage and other offensive matter flowed into the river B. from the appellants' sewage works.

Held, that the appellants "caused or suffered to flow or pass" sewage and other injurious matter into the river B. within sect. 13 (1) of the Middlesex County Council Act 1898.

CASE stated on a summons charging the appellants with having, contrary to the Middlesex County Council Act 1898, caused and suffered sewage and other offensive matter to flow and pass from land and premises known as the Southall Norwood Sewage Farm, and owned and occupied by them, into the Grand Junction Canal, a canalised portion of the river Brent.

1. Prior to 1891 the rural sanitary authority of Hillingdon had acquired for the purposes of a sewage farm seventeen acres of land adjoining and abutting on a canalised portion of the river Brent at the junction of the parishes of Norwood, Isleworth, and Hanwell, and had constructed thereon sewage works upon which the sewage of the precinct of Norwood was treated, the effluent therefrom being discharged into the river.

2. In the year 1891 the precinct was formed into an urban sanitary district and a local board was constituted for such district, and the farm and works were vested in that board, which by virtue of the Local Government Act 1894 became and is now known as the appellants in this case.

3. In 1894 the local board, the predecessors in title of the appellants, was required by the owners of land within its district upon which it was intended to erect a margarine factory to afford facilities for carrying the liquids and effluent proceeding from the factory into the sewers of the board, and an agreement, dated the 23rd Jan. 1894, was entered into between the board and the owner whereby it was agreed that, subject to the conditions therein mentioned, the owner for the time being of the factory should be entitled to discharge the liquids and effluent from the factory into the sewers of the board.

4. One of the conditions mentioned in the agreement was that the owner of the factory should erect or cause to be erected and maintained in good and proper working condition at his own expense to the reasonable satisfaction of the board on part of the land upon which the factory was to be erected a settling tank or settling tanks for the purpose of extracting so far as might be practicable all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the liquids and effluent.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

5. The factory having been erected and disputes having arisen between the board and the owner of the factory as to his compliance with the above condition of the agreement, on the 14th May 1896 an action was commenced by the board against him in the Chancery Division of the High Court of Justice, wherein the board claimed an injunction restraining the owner of the factory and his servants, agents, and workmen from discharging the effluent from the works at Southall into the sewers of the board until such effluent had been properly purified, and from causing or permitting the liquids and effluents from the works to flow into or remain in the sewers or drains of the board so as to become or cause a nuisance, damage, or annoyance to the board, and from committing a breach of the contract of the 23rd Jan. 1894, and for damages.

6. The action came on for trial on the 1st June 1897, and upon the third day of the trial an order, by consent, was made by Byrne, J., the defendant in the action expressing his intention to execute on or before the 7th Nov. 1897 further works, and in case the board should not be satisfied with what should have been done by such date, it was ordered that it be referred to the arbitrator mentioned in the order to say whether there was a settling tank or settling tanks sufficient when efficiently worked for the purpose of extracting so far as might be practicable all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the liquid and effluent discharged from the factory into the sewers of the board, and that if the arbitrator was of opinion that they were not sufficient, then the arbitrator was to say what settling tank or tanks would be sufficient for the purpose aforesaid and that his award should be binding on the parties to the action.

7. The board not being satisfied with the further works executed pursuant to the order of Byrne, J., the question whether or not there was on the factory a settling tank or settling tanks sufficient when efficiently worked for the purpose of extracting so far as was practicable all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the liquid and effluent discharged from the factory into the sewers of the board was submitted to the arbitrator specified in the order for his decision, and the arbitrator, after hearing the parties to the reference, on the 25th July 1898 made and published his award whereby he awarded that the settling tank or settling tanks and other alterations in the defendants' plant in his award specified would be sufficient for the purpose of extracting so far as might be practicable all solid fat or fatty matters in suspension from the liquid and effluent referred to in the order of court.

8. Notwithstanding the award the liquid and effluent discharged from the factory into the sewers of the board and of the appellants still contained solid fat or fatty matter in suspension which is in itself objectionable and difficult to treat, and which when mixed with sewage in the appellants' sewers renders it more difficult for the appellants to effectually purify the sewage, and the effect has been to clog the land in the appellants' farm, which is used for filtering the sewage, and it has become saturated with sewage and is rendered less capable of effectually filtering the sewage of the appellants' district.

9. On the 15th Aug. 1899 the respondents gave the appellants notice under the Middlesex County Council Act 1898 requiring them to discontinue, within three months, the flow or passage into the river Brent of sewage or any other offensive or injurious matter from their sewage works.

10. In Sept. 1899 the appellants discovered that the drain of certain chemical works in their district had without their knowledge or consent been connected with a sewer belonging to them by means of which large quantities of effluent were discharged from the chemical works into the appellants' sewer.

11. The effect of the discharge of the effluent from the chemical works into the appellants' sewers being while it lasted to render it still more difficult to purify the sewage discharge from such sewers upon the appellants' farm, notice was (after negotiations had taken place between the appellants and the owners of the chemical works) served by the appellants upon the owners of these chemical works on the 10th Dec. 1899 requiring them to disconnect from the appellants' sewers the drains by means of which the effluent was discharged from the chemical works into the sewers, and the drains were disconnected in accordance with such notice.

12. It was proved that sewage and other offensive and injurious matters had flowed or passed into the river Brent from the appellants' sewage works subsequently to the expiration of three months from the date of the notice of the 15th Aug. 1899, but the justices were satisfied that such flow or passage would contain sewage and other offensive and injurious matters so long as the reception of effluent from the margarine-factory and from the chemical works and the infusion of such effluent into their system of sewage continued.

13. On behalf of the appellants it was contended that they had not under the circumstances hereinbefore stated caused or suffered sewage or other offensive or injurious matter to flow or pass into the river Brent within the meaning of sect. 13 of the Middlesex County Council Act 1898, and that the justices had therefore no power to require them under sect. 34 of that Act to abstain from carrying or suffering to flow or pass into the river Brent any sewage or any other offensive or injurious matter.

14. On behalf of the respondents it was contended that an offence had been committed by the appellants within the meaning of sect. 13 of the Act, and, further, that the evidence mentioned in pars. 3 to 8 inclusive and pars. 10 and 11 was inadmissible and afforded no defence to the summons.

15. The justices held that such evidence was admissible, but they were of opinion that the appellants were persons causing or suffering sewage or other offensive and injurious matter to flow or pass into the river Brent from the farm and works, and they accordingly ordered them to discontinue such flow or passage, but suspended the operation of their order for a period of six months.

16. The questions for the opinion of the court are: (1) Whether or not the evidence mentioned in pars. 3 to 8 inclusive and in pars. 10 and 11 was admissible; (2) whether or not the appellants were, under the circumstances hereinbefore stated, persons causing or suffering sewage or other offensive or injurious matter to flow or pass from their farm and works into the river Brent?

By the Middlesex County Council Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. cci.), s. 13:

(1) Whenever any sewage or any other offensive or injurious matter is caused or suffered to flow or pass into any stream, then and in every such case, even though such sewage or matter aforesaid had been lawfully so caused or suffered to flow or pass before the passing of this Act, the council may, under the hand of the clerk of the council, give notice in writing to the person causing or suffering the same to so flow or pass requiring him within a time to be specified to discontinue such flow. (2) The council may in like manner if they think fit at any time extend the time specified in such notice by another notice in writing. (3) If any person to whom any such notice is given thinks himself aggrieved by reason of the time allowed either by the original or any subsequent notice not being sufficient he may, not later than one month before the expiration of the time or extended time so allowed, by writing delivered to the clerk of the council demand an extension of such time, and in case the council refuse to comply with such demand, the question of such extension shall be referred to an arbitrator appointed by agreement, or, failing agreement, by the Board of Trade on the application of either party. (4) Any person to whom any notice is under this section given by the council shall notwithstanding anything in any other Act within the time allowed by such notice, subject to any extension of such time as in this section provided, discontinue the flow or passage of the sewage or matter to which the notice refers, and in default of so doing shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding one hundred pounds, and to a daily penalty not exceeding fifty pounds.

And by sect. 34:

(1) A court of summary jurisdiction before which any person is summoned under this Act for any act or default causing or contributing to or alleged to cause or contribute to the pollution or obstruction of any stream may (in lieu of inflicting a penalty, or in addition to any penalty it may have inflicted for such offence) by order require such person to abstain from the commission of such offence, and, where such offence consists in default to perform a duty under this Act, may require him to perform such duty in manner in the said order specified. The court may insert in any order such conditions as to time or mode of action as it may think just, and may suspend or rescind any order on such undertaking being given or condition being performed as it may think just, and generally may give such directions for carrying into effect any order as to the court seems meet. (2) Any person making default in complying with any requirement of an order of the court under this section shall be liable to such a penalty not exceeding fifty pounds a day for every day during which he is in default as the court may order.

R. Cunningham Glen for the appellants.—Upon the facts set out in the case it is clear that the appellants are not causing or suffering sewage or injurious matter to flow into the river. No offence has been committed under sect. 13 (1) of the Middlesex County Council Act 1898. Sanitary authorities are bound to afford facilities to factories for draining into sewers under sect. 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75). He referred to Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 27. Where there are no sufficient sewers, the remedy is given by sect. 299 of that Act. The proper remedy is a prerogative writ of mandamus, not a penal proceeding as here. In Reg. v. Staines Local Board (60 L. T. Rep. 381) it was held that where a local board have not themselves constructed sewers which are a nuisance, but only have permitted them to be used by persons who have a right to use them, they did not "cause or suffer" sewage to flow. Where all that is possible has been done by a local authority to abate a nuisance, it was held that they were not responsible, but that the remedy is against the person causing the nuisance:

He referred to

Brown v. Dunstable Corporation, 80 L. T. Rep. 650; (1899) 2 Ch. 378.

The local authority here could not have cut off the connection with their sewer. That was decided in Eastwood Brothers Limited v. Honley Urban Council (1900) 1 Ch. 781. In that case the discharge of trade effluent prejudicially affected the disposal of sewage matter conveyed through the sewer. He referred to

Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, 76 L. T. Rep. 315; (1897) 1 Q. B. 384; sub nom.

Pasmore v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, 78 L. T. Rep. 569; (1898) A. C. 387.

The margarine and chemical factories could be stopped by the respondents from discharging into the sewers, but we, the appellants, cannot do so.

Lord Robert Cecil, Q.C. and Herbert Smith for the respondents.—On reading the preamble to the Middlesex County Council Act 1898 we see the reason for that statute. It there states that the river Brent becomes so polluted by sewage as to be a nuisance, and that further powers should be given the county council to enable them to improve the condition of the river. The flow of this sewage into the river Brent is admitted, but the appellants contend that they cannot prevent it. The appellants are not bound to receive margarine refuse into their sewers, but even if they do receive it, it can be effectually treated. The powers of the local authorities are dealt with by the Public Health Act 1875 and other statutes. They referred to Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 15, 17, 19, 21, 91, 94, 95, 96;

Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), s. 7;

Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 17;

Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council, 76 L. T. Rep. 315; (1897) 1 Q. B. 384.

The appellants have power to proceed against these works and factory under sect. 94 of the Public Health Act 1875 by serving a notice requiring an abatement of the nuisance. Although to some extent they may have contributed to the existence of this nuisance, they would not be precluded from proceeding against the works or factory:

St. Helens Chemical Company v. Corporation of St. Helens, 34 L. T. Rep. 397; 1 Ex. Div. 196.

They contend they cannot take proceedings because of the agreement of Jan. 1894, but if that is so, then the agreement must be bad, as it would be against public policy. They referred to Ayr Harbour Trustees v. Oswald, 8 App. Cas. 623.

The case of Attorney-General v. Dorking Guar-

dians (46 L. T. Rep. 573; 20 Ch. Div. 595) is an entirely different case to the present one. The same must be said of Brown v. Dunstable Corporation (80 L. T. Rep. 650; (1899) 2 Ch. 378). Here the appellants are not bound to receive trade refuse, but if they do they can treat it. Ogilvie v. Blything Union Rural Sanitary Authority (67 L. T. Rep. 18) proceeded entirely upon Attorney-General v. Dorking Guardians (ubi sup.). They referred to Wycombe Rural Sanitary Authority v. Parsons, 71 L. T. Rep. 428; (1894) 2 Q. B. 780.

Reg. v. Staines Local Board (ubi sup.) is the strongest case against us. Here it is the grease coating that prevents the sewage going into the land. In that case there were no means of stopping the sewage from coming into their sewers, but here the appellants can prevent the margarine and grease from coming. It is said that we should have proceeded against the factory, but if the appellants felt aggrieved they could have proceeded under sect. 13 (3) of the Middlesex County Council Act 1898.

B. C. Glen in reply.

PHILLIMORE, J.—My learned brother has asked me to deliver the first judgment. We both think this conviction should stand. Section 13 of the special Act of Parliament under which the proceedings are taken says: "Whenever any sewage or any other offensive or injurious matter is caused or suffered to flow or pass into any stream, then and in every such case"—I omit the next words—"the council may under the hand of the clerk of the council give notice in writing to the person causing or suffering the same so to flow or pass requiring him within a time to be specified in such notice, but not being less than three months, to discontinue such flow or passage." The person so notified has the power of demanding an extension of time, and, if an extension of time is not assented to, can go to arbitration before an arbitrator appointed by the Board of Trade in order to obtain such extension of time as the arbitrator should think proper. I have omitted the words "Even though such sewage or matter aforesaid had been lawfully so caused or suffered to flow or pass before the passing of this Act" because upon the whole I do not think that those words apply to the particular case, at any rate as regards the district council now convicted. Here there was a sewage farm, constructed by the predecessors in title of the present appellant board, to which the sewage of the district was led, and on which it was treated, and from which it passed out by an effluent. We know what an effluent is. It is a modern word meaning the pure residuum, or as near as possible the pure residuum, after some impure substance has been deposited; and we may take it the effluent from the sewage farm—indeed no suggestion has been made to the contrary—was a pure effluent until the circumstances which I am now going to mention happened. It turns out that latterly the effluent is no longer pure. It carries sewage and other offensive matter into the river Brent, and if there is anybody who causes or suffers sewage or other offensive matter to flow or pass into the stream, then such person or body comes within the purview of sect. 13 of the Act. Now, it is said by the Middlesex County Council that the Southall

Norwood Urban District Council, who are the owners, occupiers, and managers of this sewage farm, are persons who "cause or suffer" this noxious matter to flow into the stream, and they have given them the proper notice provided under the section. The notice does not seem to have been appealed against, and after the lapse of time prescribed by the notice, the offensive matter continuing to pass into the stream, a summons was issued against the body, and the county council obtained a conviction. Now, Mr. Glen has said (and his argument was well worthy of attention, and has given my learned brother and myself a great deal of trouble)—and it is a satisfactory way of putting it on behalf of his clients—that you do not cause or suffer if you are merely acting ministerially; and he cited to us a number of cases of public bodies who had been held not to cause or suffer sewage to reach a river when all they have done has been not to interfere with the user of the pipes which they took over from some prior body, and into which pipes individuals have a right of passing their sewage. They do not use the pipes, but they simply leave them there; they do not make the pipe, and therefore it was suggested they do not "cause or suffer," because they could only stop the sewage passing through the pipes in one of two ways—either by a physical obstruction, which probably in the first instance would be a breach of their statutory duty, and, secondly, would create an intolerable nuisance, or by bringing actions against every individual who drained into their sewers, which would be an intolerable burden upon the local board, and apparently that is a burden which is not cast upon any one of Her Majesty's subjects without express words by the law of England. Those cases I quite understand. The result is, if there are existing sewers, and existing rights of draining into sewers, which communicate with the river, apparently there is no way of stopping that draining except by the provisions of sect. 299 of the Public Health Act 1875 and an order of the Local Government Board making a mandamus issue. There may be others, but there is no other way which, for the moment, is suggested to us. That is in cases where there is a passage of impure liquid into the river. But the existing defendant body has nothing to do with it; what is suggested is that the existing defendant body, having a right to pass, or duty to pass, certain filthy liquid into the river, are to be compelled to stop the passage of all filthy liquid into the river, either, as I say, by physical obstruction or by action. The courts have held they are not bound so to do; neither can an action lie, nor can they be indicted for using it. But that does not apply to this case at all. In this case there is a channel sending clean water into the river, and what the board have done, or their predecessors, and they have kept it so, is that they collect all the sewage of the district upon a sewage farm, and have then, when the sewage failed to be properly treated on the farm, issued the filthy effluent from the farm into the river. It seems to me that is a case in which they may well be said to have "caused or suffered" it to pass. I think one might say "caused," but certainly "suffered" if any meaning is to be attached to the word "suffered." I agree that "suffered" reasonably imports some act of omission on the part of the person "suffering." It does not mean that a person is entirely passive. Therefore, if Mr. Glen can satisfy us that his clients, the district council, have no option in the matter, and could not prevent the present filthy effluent going into the stream, they might be said not to have "suffered." How does he make that out? There is here a margarine manufacturer who is entitled under the Rivers Pollution Act to require the local board of health, or the district council, or whatever it might be, to take into their sewers the liquid products of his factory. I myself, as at present advised, do not think that that entitles him to send large masses of solid in solution. I think it only entitles him to send liquid products into the sewers. Instead of leaving the man to his ordinary rights, the local board, which I think is the present district council—the actual present people only under a different title—entered into an arrangement, which may or may not have been improvident, with the margarine maker, under which he was given, in addition to his legal rights, certain contractual rights, and they were given certain contractual rights as against him. They say he has not fulfilled his duty, and that he has not behaved according to his contract. They brought an action against him before one of Her Majesty's judges, and by consent judgment was given referring the matter to an arbitrator, and the arbitrator made an award that if he did certain things he then would be discharging his duty, and, what is more important, that he then would be retaining all the solids and sending down nothing except the liquid on to the premises of the district council. The case does not find that that award has been enforced or that there has been any attempt made to enforce it; and with regard to what Mr. Glen said about its not being the duty of somebody to bring an action I agree in general, but I am not quite sure in a case like this there would not be a duty on the district council to attempt to enforce the award. Be that as it may, as things are, the fatty matter from the margarine factory comes upon the soil of the sewage farm. If it was the fatty matter only that passed from the soil of the sewage farm into the effluent, and which would be only the pollution of the effluent, there might be more to be said in favour of the district council; but the effect of the reception of the fatty matter on the farm is that as the council conducts its farm, the farm gets coated with grease, and the sewage does not sink into the soil, but passes down the effluent into the river. Some fatty matter also passes into the river. I do not care about the fatty matter. The point is that the sewage, which possibly would never have come to the effluent or to the farm if it had not been brought there, is now brought there and allowed to pass on down the current into the river. It seems to me the defendant council are suffering the fatty matter to come into the river. I think upon the true construction of the case, although I agree the findings on that point are not as clear as one would wish, it would also appear that even as things are—even if the manufacturer did continue to send without further filtration the whole of his refuse, including the solids, as he does at present into the sewers of the district council—there is nothing to show that the district council could not, by some form of treatment at the sewage farm, nevertheless prevent the effluent being otherwise than pure. I think that is the true view of the case, and I think the word "system" in par. 12 refers—at any rate, in part—to the scheme or mode in which the council is treating the fatty matter and the other sewage too. Now, that being the case, again for another reason, there is no compulsion on the district council. It may be very expensive, or disagreeable, or very hard on them that they should be put to further expense, but still there is nothing which compels them, first, to receive these solids, and, secondly, so to treat the sewage that the result is that there is an impure instead of a pure effluent. There is another difficulty which possibly may have led, so far as I was concerned, to a restatement of the case, which is that as the case actually stands the condition is caused not only by the existence of the margarine manufacturer and his refuse, but also by the existence of some chemical works which apparently have been stopped. Mr. Glen suggested that if there was weight to be laid on that clause it would be better to restate the case. I do not rest my judgment upon that at all. What I rest my judgment upon is this: having taken over this place from its predecessors in title, the district council collect the sewage on this place, treat it, and discharge it through an effluent, and prima facie they have to excuse themselves from discharging a filthy effluent into the river. The excuse they offer is not sufficient. Either they ought not to have made an improvident contract, if it is improvident, or, having got a contract, they should see the contract is properly carried out, and either not receive the stuff they are not bound to receive, or take the trouble of enforcing their right under the award, and have the stuff purified, or, finally, if they must receive the stuff in its present state, they ought to take other steps on the sewage farm to purify the effluent. I therefore think there must be judgment for the respondents.

PIGGOTT (app.) v. GOLDSTRAW (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

BRUCE, J.—I agree with my learned brother in the conclusion at which he arrives. I also agree with the reasons he has given, and I have nothing to add.

Appeal dismissed.

structed these windows so as to cause them to project 3in. beyond the main wall, and so as to fill up the embayments. During the period from 1869 till the reconstruction in 1899, the paving of the embayments was not distinguishable or marked off from the paving of the footway, and had been cleaned and repaired by the corporation, as the highway authority, at the same time as the paving of the footway, and the public were in the habit, without any objection by any lessee of entering upon and passing in and out of the embayments, the windows of which were used for the exhibition of shop goods.

Upon an information against the tenant for causing an obstruction in the street by building so as to fill up the embayments :

Held, that neither the user by the public nor the fact that the paving of the embayments was not marked off from the paving of the footway and was cleaned and repaired by the corporation as highway authority was any evidence of the dedication of the embayments to the public use as part of the highway, and that therefore no obstruction had been committed.

CASE stated by the deputy stipendiary magistrate for the city of Liverpool.

At a petty sessions held on the 18th May 1900 before the learned magistrate the appellant was charged by the respondent, a surveyor of buildings for the corporation of Liverpool, on an information for that she, being the occupier of a building—to wit, a shop—situate at the junction of Church-street and Church-lane (being 16, Church-street), within the city of Liverpool, and having been served with a notice requiring her to remove the projecting windows or shop fronts erected in front of the building No. 16, Church-street, which windows or shop fronts had been erected in such a manner as to be obstructions to the safe and convenient passage along the streets, did not within fourteen days remove the obstructions.

The summons was taken out under sect. 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847.

The magistrate convicted, and ordered the appellant to pay a fine of 1s. and 4s. 6d. costs.

The following facts were at the hearing proved or admitted before the magistrate: (a) The building in question, of which the windows were alleged to be obstructions to the safe and convenient passage of Church-street and Church-lane, was originally built in the year 1869 upon land leased for a term of seventy-five years from the corporation of Liverpool, who were and are the owners of the freehold. (b) The building was in the year 1869 built by the lessee with recessed windows or embayments on the ground floor in accordance with a plan submitted to and approved by the committee having charge of the leasehold property of the corporation. (c) The lease mentioned in par. (a) was on the 28th July 1888 surrendered to the corporation, and a lease of the land and buildings for seventy-five years from the 7th April 1888 granted to one Gardner. (d) The lease mentioned in the last paragraph was in 1888 assigned to N. Russell and W. Russell. On the 25th March 1900 this lease was surrendered to the corporation, and a lease of the land and buildings for seventy-five years from the 5th April 1899 was granted to the above N. Russell and W. Russell. (e) On the 16th Oct.

1899 N. Russell and W. Russell agreed to underlet the land and buildings to the defendant. (f) In Nov. 1899 the shop windows of the building on the ground floor were reconstructed so as to cause the same to project 3in. beyond the line of the main wall of the building (which is the building line of the streets in which the building is situate) and so as to fill up the embayments. It was admitted by the informant that the projection of 3in. beyond the building line did not contravene the provisions of the Liverpool Improvement Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 1v.), and was not material to the informant's case. Sect. 36 of that Act provides (inter alia): "(1) It shall not be lawful without the written consent of the corporation to build or to bring forward the main outer face of any external wall beyond the building line in any street, or to construct, build, make, place, or fix any projection beyond the building line in any street or over or upon the surface thereof, except in accordance with the following regulations, that is to say." The section then enumerates the various regulations which it was admitted the windows and projections in this case did not contravene. (g) From the time when the buildings were first erected and up to the date of the reconstruction there were at each end of the embayments pilasters with bases; such bases extended slightly beyond the line of the pilasters, and were in one vertical plane with the main wall of the building which projected over the embayments immediately above the windows. During the same period the paving of the footway extended over the embayments so that the paving of the embayments was not distinguishable from that of the footway. (h) The notice and service thereof as required by sect. 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 were given, and the projecting windows were not removed within fourteen days after such service, but remained as they were.

No evidence was adduced by the defendant of any measures having been taken by any lessee of the premises to prevent the public from entering upon the embayments, and it was proved by the informant that Church-street is a crowded thoroughfare, and that the public were during the whole period from the erection of the buildings until Nov. 1899 in the habit of entering upon the embayments, and that such user of the embayments contributed materially to the safety and convenience of foot passengers. It was also proved that the paving of the embayments had together with and at the same time as the paving of the footway been cleaned and repaired by the corporation of Liverpool in the capacity of highway authority. The building is and was from 1869 used for the exhibition of shop goods.

Evidence was also tendered by the informant, objected to by the defendant, but admitted by the magistrate, that in certain cases in Liverpool where similar embayments had been constructed, which was treated as private property, the owners thereof had placed thereon some distinguishing mark to indicate that the spaces within such embayments were not dedicated to the public as part of the highway.

Upon the facts it was contended for the informant, that there was evidence upon which the magistrate might and ought to find that the space within the embayments had been dedicated to public use as part of the highway, and that the windows erected by the defendant inclosing the embayments were obstructions to the safe and convenient passage along the street within the meaning of sect. 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, and that there had been a dedication to the public of the embayments as part of the highway.

The defendant contended that evidence of particular acts of other individuals indicating an intention not to dedicate embayments to the public as part of the highway was legally inadmissible as evidence, by reason of their not having acted in the same manner as such other individuals, of a contrary intention on the part of lessees of the premises in question; that under the circumstances of the case the evidence of public user was not evidence of dedication; that the acts of the corporation as highway authority were not evidence of an intention on its part as owner of the freehold; that there was no evidence of a dedication by the corporation as owner of the freehold with the consent of any lessee; that, even if the embayments had been dedicated so as to form in Nov. 1899 a part of the highway, there was no evidence of an offence within sect. 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847; and that the act of the defendant was authorised by sect. 36 of the Liverpool Improvement Act 1882.

On the above facts the magistrate found that the embayments had been dedicated to public use as part of the highway, and that the windows or shop fronts, having been erected in front of the building No. 36, Church-street so as to inclose the embayments, were obstructions to the safe and convenient passage along the street, and he therefore convicted the defendant as above stated.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether there was any evidence before the learned magistrate to justify him in so finding.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. (Leslie Scott and Denis O'Connor with him) for the appellant.—The question arises under sect. 69 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, but it does not turn on the construction of the section. The offence alleged was that the appellant had brought forward a number of windows in front of a house or building so as to create an "obstruction to the safe and convenient passage along the street"; and "street" is defined in sect. 3 as meaning and including "any road, square, court, alley, and thoroughfare within the limits of the special Act." The learned magistrate was wrong in holding that there was a dedication of the embayments to public use as part of the highway. The acts relied upon constituted no evidence of dedication. Under the circumstances of the case the passage of the public over these embayments was no evidence of an intention to dedicate them to public use. The house was a shop and these windows were used for the display of shop goods, and it was merely to enable persons passing along the street to see the goods that these embayments were open to the public. Similarly the other acts relied on to show dedication, such as the cleaning and repairing of the paving of the embayments at the same time as the paving of the footway, do not prove any dedication. In the first place, there was no evidence of any dedication at all; in the second place, there was no evidence of any dedication by the reversioners, the owners of the fee, and no evidence of any assent of the reversioners to any dedication by any tenant or lessee, but such consent is necessary (Wood v. Veal, 5 B. & A. 454; Baxter v. Taylor, 4 B. & Ad. 72); in the third place, the projections did not contravene any provisions of the Liverpool Improvement Act 1882; and, finally, evidence was wrongfully admitted by the learned magistrate.

Macmorran, Q.C. and Horridge for the respondent.—The magistrate was right in finding that there had been a dedication of the embayments to the public use. The question is one of fact and of degree in each case for the magistrate to deal with on the facts. He has so dealt with this case, and the only question now is whether there was any evidence at all to justify his finding that there was a dedication of these embayments to public use. We submit there was evidence of such dedication. In the first place, the paving of the embayments was not marked off from the paving of the footway. That shows an intention to dedicate. Where there is an intention to keep such places as private property, the paving is in some way distinguishable from that of the footway, or is marked off by some line or other. Here there was no such distinguishing line or mark. The user by the public without objection either by the lessees or the reversioners is also evidence of dedication. We rely also on the cleaning and especially on the repairing of the paving of the embayments at the same time as the paving of the footway and as part of the footway. That being done by the corporation would be evidence of an intention on their part to dedicate these embayments to public use. These acts show that there was abundant evidence on which the magistrate could find that there was a dedication to the public use:

Reg. v. Inhabitants of East Mark, 11 L. T. Rep. O. S. 63; 11 Q. B. 877.

Joseph Walton, Q.C. in reply.—At the very utmost the facts here are as consistent with an intention not to dedicate as with an intention to dedicate, and, that being so, it must be taken that there was no dedication (per Byles, J. in Daves v. Hawkins, 4 L. T. Rep. 288, at p. 290; 8 C. B. N. S. 848, at p. 860):

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 21.—BRUCE, J. read the following judgment:—In this case I have felt considerable difficulty, not because I had any doubt about the conclusion which I think ought reasonably to be drawn from the evidence, but because of the nature of the questions stated for the court. We cannot review the decision of the learned magistrate if there was any evidence to justify his finding that the embayments had been dedicated to public use as part of the highway. I was during the argument inclined to think that, slight as the evidence was, it was yet difficult to say that there was no evidence to support the finding. But now, having given the case very careful consideration, I have come to the conclusion that the evidence relied upon as evidence of dedication amounts to nothing—that is, it is as consistent with an absence of an intention to dedicate as it is with an intention to dedicate. So far as the user by the public is concerned there is no preponderance of evidence either way, and therefore, according to the judgment of Byles, J. in Dawes v. Hawkins (4 L. T. Rep. 288, at p. 290; 8 C. B. N. S. 848, at p. 860), there is no balance of probability in favour of either hypothesis. As regards the acts of the corporation, who are the owners of the freehold, I think that, taken together as a whole, they tend to show that the corporation had no intention to dedicate, and did not dedicate, the embayments to public use as part of the highway, and that they did not acquiesce in any dedication by the tenants. The embayments in question existed over the ground floor of a building which was built in the year 1869. The upper part of the building overhung the embayments, and the main wall of the building on either side of the embayments projected beyond the embayments to what I may call the building line. Within the two embayments to which importance is attached in the case were windows which were used for the exhibition of shop goods. But I gather from the plan annexed to the case that in the same building there was a third embayment in which was the doorway to the premises. These embayments, I gather from the plan, were 10in. or 11in. deep. The public passing along the street were allowed to pass in and out of these embayments. Looking at the plan and taking into consideration that the building was used as a shop, it seems to be obvious that the very object of the embayments occupied by the windows was to invite passers-by to look at the goods exhibited in the windows, and the object of the embayment occupied by the door was to make a convenient entrance into the shop. To prevent the public passing along the street from passing into the embayments would be to defeat the very object for which they were formed. No one has suggested, and no one would suggest, that the passing of the public into and out of the embayment forming the door can be treated as forming any evidence of a dedication. In order to make an easy access to a shop, it is quite common to set back the door a foot or more from the front line of the building, and it would, as it seems to me, be a very startling thing to say that, because passers-by who do not use the shop are free to pass over this space, such passage by the public is to be regarded as forming evidence of dedication. If the user of the embayment forming the door gives rise to no presumption of dedication, why should the embayments forming the windows? If the one embayment was formed and used for the convenience of customers, or of those whom it was hoped to attract as customers, were not the other embayments formed and used for the same purpose? If the owner of a piece of land leaves a portion of it unbuilt upon for the purpose of his own convenience and for the use of his customers, the user of the land by his customers is no evidence of a dedication to the public, and if he is not able to exclude the public without at the same time excluding his customers or those whom he hopes to attract as customers, the user by the public does not necessarily raise a presumption of dedication. It is said by counsel for the respondent that if the window embayments had been paved with pavement of a kind different from the rest of the footway, or had been marked off by a line or division in the pavement, then that would have indicated that there was no intention to dedicate. It may be so. But why? Because it would, it is said, have made it apparent that the embayments were formed for the advantage of the occupier of the building. But the difference in the kind of pavement would not have restrained in any way the user by the public. The user by the public would have been just the same. The line or division in the pavement would only have made emphatic what I think is sufficiently apparent from the form in which the building was constructed and the manner in which it was used. It is not to be left out of consideration that the embayments were but very small spaces. The two window embayments, I gather from the scale on the plan, are each about 5ft. in length and 10in. or 11in. deep. In deciding whether there is evidence of dedication the circumstances of each case must be considered, and it is not reasonable, as it seems to me, to draw a conclusion that the owner of the house because he did not take active measures to protect his rights over these small spaces therefore intended to abandon his rights and to dedicate the land as part of the public way. In nearly every case of a large building fronting on a street, the door of the building is fixed on the inner side of the stone jamb, the stone jamb is generally some inches in thickness so that when the door is shut there is a space of a few inches between the outside of the door and the building or street line; yet no one would infer any intention on the part of the owner of the building to dedicate this space of a few inches to the public. Now, with reference to the acts of the corporation. It is said that the embayments were cleansed and repaired by the corporation of Liverpool in its capacity of highway authority. It is difficult to understand how it would be possible for the besom of the highway authority to sweep the footway without at the same time sweeping the embayments; and it would, I think, be obviously out of the question to assume that because the corporation as highway authority swept the embayments and the corporation as owner of the property made no objection, therefore there was an intention on the part of the corporation as owner to declare a right of passing over the embayments. Indeed, this point about the cleansing of the embayments was hardly insisted upon by counsel for the respondent. But I think that the paving of the embayments stands upon the same footing. The paving of an inappreciable breadth of 11in. affords no presumption of dedication by the owner. But the important fact which seems to throw light upon the acts of the corporation is that, after the new building was erected and the alleged obstruction created, the corporation granted on the 25th March 1900 a new lease of the premises. The new building was erected in Nov. 1899, and I think it is impossible, if the corporation had intended to dedicate a right of passage over the embayments to the public, that they would have granted a lease of the new premises which were so built as to obstruct the passage of the public over the embayments.

Factory and Workshop Acts—Impurity in air—
"Inhaled . . . to an injurious extent"— Factory and Workshop Acts 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16),
s. 36, and 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. 37), s. 33.

To show that dust, gas, vapour, or other impurity is generated and inhaled by the workers in a factory "to an injurious extent," within the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878, s. 36, and 1895, s. 33, it is sufficient to prove that the impurity is generated and inhaled by the workers to an extent that must be in the long run injurious to the workers, without proving that any of them has suffered actual injury from inhaling the impurity.

CASE stated by the police magistrate for the county borough of West Ham.

An information was laid by the appellant, who was one of Her Majesty's Inspectors of Factories, under sect. 36 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, as extended by sect. 33 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895, and alleged that the respondents being the occupiers of a certain jute mill, the same being a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878 to 1895, wherein on or about the 18th May 1900 an impurity—to wit, dust—was generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent, did fail to provide, use, and maintain a fan or other mechanical means of a proper construction for preventing such inhalation within a reasonable time after due notice had been given by the appellant.

At the hearing before the learned magistrate the following facts were proved:—

The respondents were the occupiers of a jute mill at Carpenters-road, Stratford, in the county borough of West Ham, the same being a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts. In the "preparing" and "batching" rooms of the factory during April 1900 dust in large quantities was generated by the process there carried on. The dust consisted of jute fibre mixed with a small quantity of common dust. There was nothing of a poisonous character in the dust. The use of fans as recommended by the appellant would reduce the dust in the atmosphere inhaled by the workers. On the 17th April notice to provide such fans within one month was duly served on the respondents by the appellant. The respondents failed to comply with the notice.

Some 120 persons were employed in the rooms in question. Of these, several selected by the appellant were medically examined on his behalf. Several more, also selected by the appellant, were called as witnesses. The evidence, however, failed to prove that any of the workers had suffered any injury to their health from inhaling the dust generated by the process there carried on.

The appellant contended that dust in large quantities in the atmosphere must be injurious to the workers, and that it was not necessary to prove that any of the workers had actually suffered injury to health.

The magistrate dismissed the summons on the ground that it had not been proved that the dust generated by the process had been inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent.

By sect. 36 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), as extended by sect. 33 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 37), it is enacted that if in a factory or workshop where any process is carried on by which dust, gas, vapour, or other impurity is generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent it appears to an inspector that such inhalation could be to a great extent prevented by the use of a fan or other mechanical means, the inspector may direct a fan or other mechanical means of a proper construction for preventing such inhalation to be provided within a reasonable time; and if the same is not provided, maintained, and used, the factory or workshop shall be deemed not to be kept in conformity with the Act.

Daddy (H. Sutton with him).—The case is not satisfactorily stated. The learned magistrate seems to have disagreed with the appellant's contention, and to have held that it was necessary to prove that some of the workers had actually suffered injury to health. If I am right on this point, I can only ask that the case may be sent back to the magistrate to be further dealt with. There is no question here as to whether the dust is dust of a poisonous nature or of any particular nature. The section simply says "by which dust is generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent." It is true that here, though we called a number of workers, we could not get satisfactory proof that any one of them had suffered actual injury in health from the dust; but we had the evidence of a medical man—which was not contradicted—that dust in the quantities in which it existed in the atmosphere of this factory must in the long run bring about phthisis and other lung troubles. That, I submit, is sufficient to prove that the workers inhaled dust to an injurious extent. [BRUCE, J.—We are agreed that the mere fact that it could not be proved that any particular person had suffered injury to health is not conclusive that the air was not injurious.] That is my only point, and the moment one has passed that, both upon the case as it is stated and upon what the learned magistrate said, I submit he ought to have considered this positive evidence of the medical man that the inhalation was to an injurious extent.

The respondents did not appear.

BRUCE, J.—I do not think the learned magistrate has found the right point. The question he had to determine was whether dust was generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent—that is, whether the tendency was to injure the workers. It may be that it is only after some long exposure to the injurious air that the workers are injured; but if the air is so impure as necessarily to be injurious to health then I think the Act has been infringed, and it is for the magistrate to find the fact which he seems in this case not to have found. It is not necessary that it should be actually proved that the inhalation of the dust has proved injurious to any of the workers. It is enough that the dust in the air is of such a quantity or character that it would in the long run be injurious. The learned magistrate should find, quite apart from the question whether any person has been injured, whether the dust was generated and inhaled by the workers to an injurious extent—that is, to such an extent that its tendency is necessarily to injure their health in the long run. That, I think, is the point.

PHILLIMORE, J.—The case must go back for the magistrate to find whether or not the dust is generated and inhaled to an injurious extent, with an intimation that it is not necessary to prove actual injury to the health of any particular person.

COBB v. COBB. (a)

Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39)—Appeal to High Court—Allowance to be made to wife—Mode of assessment—Earnings of husband—Practice.

There is no fixed rule as to the allowance to be made to a wife under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895, s. 5, but courts of summary jurisdiction ought to be guided by the practice of the High Court in making allotments of alimony in suits of judicial separation.

THIS was an appeal from an order of the justices of the Petersfield Division of the county of Hants, made under sect. 5 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895.

In the first instance when this case came before the justices an order had been made by which the husband was to pay an allowance of 11. a week to the wife.

This order was appealed from, and the court sent the case back to the justices for further consideration.

The same order was made again, but after the husband had undergone a second term of imprisonment for nonpayment of arrears, the justices reduced the amount of the allowance from 11. to 12s. a week.

The husband appealed against this reduced order on the ground that it too was excessive.

It appeared that the appellant, who was over sixty years of age, gained a precarious livelihood as an outside porter at Addison-road Station. His income varied from 23s. to 25s. per week. He had twice suffered imprisonment for non-compliance with the order of the justices.

J. Ferguson Walker for the appellant.—Sect. 5, sub-sect. (c) of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 does not lay down any rule to guide courts of summary jurisdiction as to the proportion of his income which a husband should be ordered to pay to his wife. Regard is to be had to the means both of the husband and wife, and the amount fixed should be reasonable. The present order is unreasonable, and 12s. a week too large a sum to pay. In allotting alimony the High Court never exceeds one-half the joint income, whilst one-third is the usual allowance. He cited

Cooke v. Cooke, 2 Phill. 46;

Haigh v. Haigh, 20 L. T. Rep. 281; L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 709.

The PRESIDENT.—Although there is no hard and fast rule as to the proportion of income payable in suits for judicial separation, the court generally acts upon the principle of allowing a third of the joint income to the wife when there are no children of the marriage. I think that courts of summary jurisdiction will also be well advised to act upon the same principle. In the present case the husband has, I think, shown good cause why the amount of the allowance ordered by the justices should be reduced. The reduction made by the justices themselves from 11. to 12s. per week is not sufficient, and I am strongly of opinion that not more than one-third of his income should have been ordered to be paid. The appeal will be allowed, and the order of the justices will be varied by substituting 8s. per week for 12s. The arrears will run at the rate of 8s. per week from the date of the order of the justices.

Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39)—Appeal to High Court—Summonses—Withdrawal—Out of time—Objection not taken before justices—Revival—Costs—Practice.

When a summons under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 has been withdrawn, the complaint, in respect of which it has been issued, is put an end to, and no fresh summons can be granted upon the same cause of complaint.

The omission to take an objection, though of a technical character, on the hearing of a summons under the Act, does not operate as a waiver of the ground of objection; but if the objection is raised by the appellant for the first time on the hearing of the appeal, and is then allowed, the respondent will be entitled to the costs of the appeal.

Re TAYLOR; GUARDIANS OF EDMONTON UNION v. DEELEY.

[Ct. OF APP.]

On that date the justices, having found that the appellant had been guilty of persistent cruelty to his wife, Ellen Pickavance, whereby she had been compelled to leave and live separate and apart from him, had made an order by which it was adjudged that the respondent should no longer be bound to live with her husband, and that she should be paid an allowance of 15s. a week by the appellant.

It was now sought to set aside this order of the justices.

In the notice of appeal the grounds alleged were as follows: (1) The complaint was out of time, since it had not been made within six months of the time when the subject-matter of the complaint arose, as required by the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11, and referred to in sect. 8 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895; (2) the allowance of 15s. a week was excessive; (3) there was not sufficient information or evidence to justify the order.

Before the order appealed from had been made the wife had sworn two informations against her husband, on the 26th June 1899 and on the 25th Sept. 1899, in which she had alleged that he had been guilty of persistent cruelty towards her, by reason of which she had been compelled to leave him, and to live separate and apart from him.

On the hearing of the first summons the justices had suggested that an effort should be made to effect a reconciliation, and it was accordingly dismissed.

The second summons was withdrawn without having been heard.

Pritchard for the appellant.—The order was wrong. The summons of the respondent was out of time. It should have been taken out within six months of the ground of complaint. The fact of cruelty was not denied; but the parties had been living separate for fourteen months previous to the order of separation made by the justices. There was no evidence of means to support the order for maintenance.

Batson for the respondent.—The objection as to the summons being out of time came too late. It ought to have been taken in the court below. The husband had been guilty of cruelty towards his wife between the first and second summonses. The second summons had been withdrawn, but the justices could have issued a fresh summons in respect of the complaint. The withdrawal did not dispose of the matter. The Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, s. 11, only requires that the complaint should be made within six months. There is no provision in that Act or in the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895, s. 8, that the summons should be heard within six months of the time when the ground of complaint arose. The wife had complied with sect. 11 of the former Act by making her complaint. That was sufficient. As the objection had not been taken before the justices the appellant had waived it, and should not be heard on the appeal. He cited

Reg. v. Fletcher, 24 L. T. Rep. 742; L. Rep. 1 C. C. 320.

Pritchard in reply.—It was against all principle that a summons which had been withdrawn should be revived on the same ground of complaint. As to jurisdiction, he cited

Ellis v. Ellis, 75 L. T. Rep. 390; (1896) P. 251;
Medway v. Medway, 82 L. T. Rep. 627; (1900) P. 141.

Cur. adv. vult.

Dec. 10.—The PRESIDENT.—We have taken time to consider our judgment because it seemed to involve the principle whether the withdrawal of a summons amounted to a withdrawal of the complaint upon which it was based, so that it could no longer be proceeded upon. There is no direct authority upon the point, but we are clearly of opinion that the withdrawal of the summons did put an end to the complaint, and that no fresh summons could be founded upon it. Therefore the summons was out of time. It must be remembered that a summons cannot be withdrawn without the consent of the justices or the magistrate; a complainant cannot put an end to criminal proceedings without the leave of the court. The effect of this is that the complaint upon which the summons was granted necessarily falls to the ground. The court, having once permitted the withdrawal, cannot revive the cause of complaint by issuing a fresh summons on the same ground. As to costs. The husband has succeeded here upon the point of the summons being out of time, which he did not take in the court below. Under the circumstances the wife is entitled to her costs on the appeal.

Re TAYLOR; GUARDIANS OF EDMONTON UNION v. DEELEY. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Lunacy—Pauper lunatic—Maintenance—Arrears—Debt—Administration.

Where an order made in lunacy was merely a direction for payment to the guardians of a union in respect of the maintenance of a pauper lunatic for a particular period, the claim of the guardians in respect of arrears for the remainder of the statutory six years, being a valid legal debt, continued and was held to be enforceable after the lunatic's death.

Decision of Kekewich, J. reversed.

ANN TAYLOR, a pauper of unsound mind, was maintained by the guardians of the Edmonton Union from the 1st Nov. 1889 until the date of her death, which occurred on the 22nd June 1899.

On the death of her uncle on the 14th Oct. 1895 she became entitled, as one of his next of kin, to the sum of 261*l.*

On the 24th Feb. 1898 the guardians applied to a master in lunacy for the appointment of a receiver of that fund, and for payment thereof of the cost of the lunatic's maintenance for the then preceding six years, there being 169*l.* 3*s.* 10*d.* owing in respect of that period.

On the 31st Jan. 1899 an order was made in lunacy appointing a receiver of the fund and directing him (after payment of costs) to pay "95*l.* 14*s.* due to the guardians for the maintenance" of the lunatic from the 14th Oct. 1895 to the 14th Feb. 1899, and to apply the balance of the money to be received by him in the future maintenance of the lunatic at the rate of 11*s.* per week.

The lunatic was thenceforth maintained by the guardians, and they were paid for such maintenance out of the fund until her death, at which time a balance of over 100*l.* remained out of the fund.

She died intestate on the 22nd June 1899, and the defendant was her administrator.

The guardians issued an originating summons to have an account taken of the amount owing to them for past maintenance from the 24th Feb. 1892 (six years before the application in lunacy) to the 14th Oct. 1895 and payment by the defendant or administration. They claimed the sum of 73*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* as due to them for past maintenance.

The summons came on to be heard before Kekewich, J. on the 7th May 1900, who dismissed it with costs.

The guardians appealed.

Harry Greenwood for the appellants.—At the date when the order in lunacy was made there was a sum due to the guardians for past maintenance of the lunatic. The only question is whether, in the face of that order, the balance owing remains a debt which can be enforced. I submit that it can. The Statutes of Limitation permitted the guardians to claim arrears for six years. Those arrears constituted a debt, and they did not cease to be a debt because a part was paid to the guardians under the order in lunacy. It is true that the lunacy jurisdiction will not, during a lunatic's life, order creditors to be paid in full if the effect is to leave the lunatic penniless; the lunatic's comfort comes first, and the claims of creditors second. But when the lunatic is dead, the reason for retaining money in hand for his comfort no longer exists, and creditors ought to be paid before the next of kin take anything. In the present case the guardians are creditors, and the debt owing to them is sufficient to sustain a claim for administration:

Re Webster; Guardians of Derby Union v. Sharratt, 51 L. T. Rep. 319; 27 Ch. Div. 710.

Ashton Cross for the respondent.—The question now raised is res judicata. The order in lunacy was not made without prejudice to any claim for the balance of the arrears owing to the guardians:

Re Watson; Guardians of Stamford Union v. Bartlett, 79 L. T. Rep. 462; (1899) 1 Ch. 72.

No reply was called for.

RIGBY, L.J.—There is no jurisdiction in lunacy to bind a creditor in any proceedings in the High Court. The lunacy jurisdiction prefers the present and future comfort of the lunatic to the claim of any creditor. The order in the present case clearly directed payment only in respect of maintenance for a particular period, and the claim of the guardians in respect of the rest of the six years remains and can be enforced after the lunatic's death. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

STIRLING, L.J.—I concur. The claim of the guardians is a valid legal debt, and the lunacy proceedings were not in the nature of an action of debt. The order in lunacy was merely a direction by the lunacy authorities to make certain payments, one of which was for part only of the amount owing for past maintenance.

YSTRADYFODWG AND PONTYPRIDD MAIN SEWERAGE BOARD (apps.) v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF NEWPORT UNION (resps.). (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Poor rate—Sewer—Rateability—Exemption—Underground Sewer—Sewer covered by embankment—Payments made to owners by persons using sewer—Alteration of surface of land.

The rule as to the exemption from liability to poor rate, which in Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (19 L. T. Rep. 348; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 15) and similar cases has been held to exist in the case of certain underground sewers, is anomalous, and should not be extended in any way; so that it ought not in future to be held applicable to any new sewer unless the owners of such sewer can show (1) that the sewer is quite underground, so that the surface under which it runs is not occupied or in any way affected by it; and (2) that they receive no payment for the use of such sewer by other persons whom they permit to use it.

Therefore a sewage carrier, which in its course through a parish was partly built on arches, partly covered by an artificial embankment, and partly below the natural surface of the ground, and for the use of which payments were made by several public authorities to the public authority which owned it, was held liable to be assessed to poor rate.

Judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (19 Mag. Cas. 453; 82 L. T. Rep. 58; (1900) 1 Q. B. 365) affirmed.

THIS was an appeal by the appellants from a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.) upon a case stated by the court of Quarter Sessions for the county of Monmouth, upon an appeal by the Ystradyfodwg and Pontypridd Main Sewerage Board against a certain rate or assessment made for the relief of the poor of the parish of Rumney, in the county of Monmouth.

The appellants are the governing body of a united drainage district consisting of part of the urban district of Ystradyfodwg and the urban district of Pontypridd, constituted by virtue of a provisional order of the Local Government Board, dated the 4th June 1885, and duly confirmed by the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 7) Act 1885, for the purpose of carrying into effect a system of sewerage for the use of the said urban districts.

(a) Reported by E. MARLEY SMITH, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[APP.] YSTEADYFODWG, &C., MAIN SEWERAGE BOARD v. ASSESS. COM. OF NEWPORT UNION. [APP.]

Pursuant to the powers vested in them by the order, the appellants designed and constructed, and have since always maintained, a certain sewage carrier for the use of the districts, and have erected, maintained, and worked such works, machinery, and plant as were required for conveying the sewage of the district to the sea. The total length of the sewage carrier is about seventeen and a quarter miles, whereof nearly two and a half miles passes through or over land situate in the parish of Rumney, which land (except such part as forms part of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel) was, previously to the construction of the sewage carrier, and still is, rated and assessed for the relief of the poor.

The construction of the sewage carrier within the parish is as follows: 182 yards of iron pipes carried on concrete arches above the surface of the ground, 1021 yards of pipes laid below the surface and ordinary level of the ground, 1890 yards carried below the surface of the ground, but covered by an artificial embankment of varying height which rises above the level of the adjacent land, and 1246 yards of pipes (hereinafter called the outfall) passing partly over and partly beneath the surface of the foreshore of the Bristol Channel.

In connection with the outfall certain works have been erected by the appellants.

For the purpose of obtaining money for making and maintaining the sewage carrier and the necessary works appurtenant thereto, the appellants, in accordance with the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, borrowed the sum of 156,000l from the Public Works Loan Commissioners, to be repaid with interest at the rate of 3½ per cent. per annum by equal annual payments extending over thirty years. The proportion of the annual repayment payable in respect of the portion of the sewage carrier situate in the parish of Rumney amounted to the sum of 1210l. This sum is raised by means of rates. Under the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 8) Act 1896, the appellants obtained powers enabling them with the consent of the Local Government Board to allow the sewers of the council of any county, borough, or district to communicate with the sewage carrier vested in the appellants. In pursuance of these powers, and with the consent of the Local Government Board, agreements had, previously to the date of the making the assessments, now appealed against, been made with the Dinas Powis Urban District Council, the Caerphilly Urban District Council, and the Cardiff Corporation, whereby the sewage of the districts under the control of these local bodies was to be received in and carried away by the sewage carrier of the respondents upon payment to the appellants by the local bodies of sums levied upon the respective rateable values of the districts at the rate of 3½d., 4d. and 3½d. in the pound per annum respectively.

In consequence of receiving these sums from the three local bodies, the appellants are enabled to raise sufficient money for the purpose of repaying the annual instalments of the money borrowed to make and maintain the sewage carrier and the works, machinery, and plant connected therewith in the parish of Rumney by two precepts at the rate of 2½d. in the pound in each year upon the Ystradyfodwg and Pontypridd areas.

The rate in the pound in the last-mentioned area would have to be much increased in order to prevent the appellants incurring loss owing to their yearly expenditure in connection with the sewage carrier if the money received by the rates levied outside the area, being money paid for the use of the sewage carrier, was not available for use by the appellants.

The appellants were assessed by the respondents in respect of that portion of the sewage carrier with the outfall and appurtenances thereof which is situate in the parish of Rumney in the sum of 800l. gross estimated value, and 700l. rateable value.

The appeal was heard and determined by the quarter sessions. It was proved before them that, as far as the parish of Rumney is concerned, the sewage carrier conveys the sewage from distant towns, places, or houses, through the parish, and there is no connection to or with the sewage carrier from any lands, houses or buildings in the parish.

It was also proved that the embankment varied in height from 18in. to 6ft. above the ground through which it passed; that it was covered throughout by a mound of earth which was grazed over except where a footpath ran over the top of the mound and where manholes were placed; that it was not separated by any fence from the adjoining land; and that cattle had full access upon and across it throughout its entire length.

It was also proved that the land upon which the embankment lies was, previously to its formation, assessed and rated to the relief of the poor, and that the land remained so rated and assessed, no change having been made by reason of the making of the embankment in the rating and assessment.

Upon these facts the quarter sessions found that the portions of the sewage carrier which lay under the surface of the ground or in the embankment were not liable to be rated at all, but that the gross estimated value of the other portions of the sewage carrier in the parish of Rumney was 145l. (whereas 40l. was the gross estimated value of the outfall and works in connection therewith), and that the rateable value thereof was 105l., and they accordingly allowed the appeal to this extent, subject to a case for the opinion of the court.

The Queen's Bench Division (Channell and Bucknill, JJ.) held that the whole of the sewer in the parish of Rumney was rateable, and accordingly reversed the order of quarter sessions.

The case is reported in 19 Mag. Cas. 453; 82 L. T. Rep. 58; (1900) 1 Q. B. 365.

The appellants appealed.

Jan. 14.—Cripps, Q.C. Boyle, Q.C. (Ram, Q.C. with them) for the appellants.—For a long time it has been held that an underground sewer belonging to a public authority is not assessable to poor rate:

Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works, 19 L. T. Rep. 348; L. Rep. 4 Q. B. 15.

The law as laid down in that case has been held by the House of Lords to be well settled:

London County Council v. Erith Churchwardens and Assessment Committee of Dartford Union; Churchwardens and Overseers of West Ham v. London County Council; Assessment Committee of St. George's Union v. London County Council, 69 L. T. Rep. 725; (1893) A. C. 562.

In the West Ham case (ubi sup.) the sewer, which was an outfall sewer as in the present case, was in an embankment made on land which had been purchased for the purpose of making the sewer. The House of Lords held that it was rateable; but the land on which it was made had formerly been rated, and the effect of the decision merely was that the fact of the sewer and embankment being constructed on the land, did not render the land not rateable. In the present case the surface of the soil does not belong to the appellants, and the facts before the court are that the land which was rated before the sewer was made is still rated at exactly the same assessment as before, i.e., the building of the sewer has made no difference whatever in the amount of rates charged on the land. The only exception to the ancient rule that underground sewers owned by public authorities are not rateable is a case where the public authority owns the surface of the soil under which the sewer is made. A sewer in an embankment such as there is in the present case is only rateable in a case where its existence has affected the previous rating of the surface. The West Ham case (ubi sup.) shows that for the purpose of rating the court will draw a distinction between the parts of a sewer which run underground and the parts which are above ground. In the court below Channell, J. relied on some words used by Collins, J.:

Mayor, &c., of Leicester v. Churchwardens, &c., of Beaumont Leys, 70 L. T. Rep. 659.

In that case some sewage works were held rateable, but the case is distinguishable from the present because the works were part of a sewage farm, as to which there could be no doubt with regard to their rateability. [COLLINS, L.J. referred to Assessment Committee of Holywell Union and others v. Halkyn District Mines Drainage Company, 71 L. T. Rep. 818; (1895) A. C. 117.]

A. T. Lawrence, Q.C. and Hugo Young, Q.C. (L. Morton Brown with them) for the respondents. —Prima facie, the sewer would be rateable. The only ground on which it is possible for the appellants to escape rating is that the case comes within the law laid down in Reg v. Metropolitan Board of Works (ubi sup.). But the decision in that case is anomalous. The exception of sewers from rateability rests on no logical ground but only on long usage. The exception that has been made ought not to be extended in any way beyond the limits which have been already laid down. In the West Ham case (ubi sup.) the sewer was held rateable. That case is exactly parallel to the present case so far as the embankment is concerned, though here there is one additional fact, viz., the receipt of money paid to the appellants by persons whom they allow to use the sewer, which makes the present case a stronger one. The provisional order, confirmed by Act of Parliament, under which this sewer was made, permits the appellants to demand payment from persons whom they allow to use it. Since the appellants receive these payments from persons using the sewer, it seems impossible for them to contend that they have not a beneficial occupation of it. They have not produced a single authority in which a sewer such as this, which brings in money to the owners, has been held not to be rateable. Even if the court should be of opinion that the parts of the sewer wholly underground might, if they were all that is in question, come within the limits laid down in Reg v. Metropolitan Board of Works (ubi sup.), yet there would be great difficulty in rating the sewer in small bits within the parish. The sewer ought to be treated as a whole.

Cripps, Q.C. in reply. — There would be no real difficulty in rating the sewer, if the parts underground were treated separately from the parts above ground. For rating purposes every railway has to be treated as split up into bits. As to the payments received by the appellants from other local authorities, that fact does not differentiate this case from the case of all other sewers owned by public authorities. Sect. 28 of the Public Health Act 1875 allows such payments to be received for all sewers constructed under that Act. [COLLINS, L.J. referred to Sheffield United Gas Company v. Sheffield Overseers (8 L. T. Rep. 692; 4 B. & S. 135) and Reg v. West Middlesex Waterworks Company (1 E. & E. 716).

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29.—The judgment of the court (Smith, M.R., Collins and Romer, L.JJ.) was read by ROMER, L.J.—Since the decision by the House of Lords of the three rating cases reported in 69 L. T. Rep. 725; (1893) A. C. 562, relied on by the appellants, we think it must be taken that the authorities which decided that certain underground sewers of public bodies were not liable to be rated are not based on sound principle and must be regarded as anomalies in rating law. These authorities will certainly not be extended; and to enable new sewers, which would be prima facie rateable according to ordinary principles, to escape from liability, it must be shown by their owners that they fall strictly within the narrow limits of the authorities we are referring to. On examination of the case of Reg v. Metropolitan Board of Works (ubi sup.), which is the leading one of the authorities in question, it will be found that the sewers there held not rateable had the following features: (1) They were quite underground, so that the surface under which they ran was not occupied or in any way affected by them, and (2) no payment was made to the owners of the sewers for the use of them by others. We think that all sewers which on general principles are prima facie rateable, and which are not protected by prior decisions, should be held rateable, unless the two features above mentioned are found to exist in relation to them. With regard to the first feature it is true that in the case of the Metropolitan Board of Works v. West Ham Overseers (23 L. T. Rep. 490; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 193), it was ruled that for rating purposes no distinction existed between a sewer carried underground and one carried upon an embankment; but after the decision of the House of Lords above mentioned, and the observations of Lord Herschell, L.C. (69 L. T. Rep. at p. 734; (1893) A. C. at p. 600), we think that it can no longer be considered that that ruling is law. With regard to the second feature, it appears to us from the judgment of the court in the case of Reg. v. Metropolitan Board of Works (ubi sup.) that that feature was treated as of great importance. In the judgment of the court delivered by Lush, J. he observes significantly that the sewers he was dealing with were not "at present" the subject of a beneficial occupation, and he proceeds to say that "no payment is made to the board for the use of them." We gather that if any such payment had been made the decision would have been the other way. It is true, judging from more recent authorities, that the judgment ought not to have been based on such a distinction as that pointed out; but the appellants here cannot take advantage of that error on the part of the judges who decided the case in order to extend in their favour the ambit of an anomalous case based on no sound principle. And, further, we cannot find in any reported case where sewers have been held not rateable that it has been proved that payments were being made for the use of those sewers by others, and that this fact has been called to the attention of the court. It was suggested by the appellants that by the above-mentioned decision of the House of Lords a principle was laid down that no sewers are rateable when the surface is rated both before and after the sewers are made, and the surface assessment remains unaltered. We cannot find that any such principle was there laid down. Lord Herschell, L.C., whose reasons for the judgment of the House were concurred in by all the members present, stated (69 L. T. Rep. at p. 733; (1893) A. C. at p. 598) why the older cases, which decided that underground sewers were not rateable, were allowed to stand. He, in substance, pointed out that those sewers had for a long period before the decisions in question been deemed free from rateability, and that it would not be just to make them rateable after they had been for so long a period deemed free from rateability. And he further observed that until the sewers in question (which in fact were wholly underground) were made, no rateable subject-matter existed where the sewers were; so that if the sewers were abandoned the rateability of the places where they existed would cease. And we think it is with reference to these observations that he says (69 L. T. Rep. at p. 734; (1893) A. C. at p. 600), that he had already stated the only ground on which the exemption of the sewers generally could, in his judgment, be rested. We can find nothing in his address to justify the assertion that he formulated or stated the principle urged by the appellants. Having regard to what we have already said it follows that the sewage carrier in the case now before us ought to be rated, and that the appeal should be dismissed. This carrier is new, and cannot claim an exemption from rateability for a long period. It is to a great extent above or on the surface, and even as to the part not immediately on the surface we cannot say that it is so far below the surface as in no way to affect it. Moreover, in this case we think that the sewage carrier in the parish of Ramey, being one continuous construction, should be dealt with as a whole, and that it would not be right, as to the part below the surface, to dis sever the sewer, and to say as to that part that it is to be taken as an independent sewer, and be separately treated for the purpose of rating. In respect of the above matters this sewage carrier does not fall within the protection of the anomalous authorities we have referred to, and on principle it clearly ought to be rated. Moreover, in respect of another matter, it is not within the last-mentioned authorities, for it is stated in the case that the owners, the appellants, receive substantial yearly payments from other bodies, namely, from the Dinas Powis Urban District Council, the Caerphilly Urban District Council, and the Cardiff Corporation, for the use of the sewage carrier by those bodies, and the costs of constructing and maintaining the carrier is to a large extent defrayed out of these payments. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

[CT. OF APP.]

SION COLLEGE v. CORPORATION OF LONDON.

[CT. OF APP.]

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XX.

Appeal dismissed.

SION COLLEGE v. CORPORATION OF LONDON. (a)
APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Rating—Exemption—Statutory exemption from "all taxes and assessments"—Rates imposed by subsequent statute—New imposition—7 Geo. 3, c. 37, s. 51—11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii., ss. 168, 169.

It was provided by sect. 51 of Geo. 3, c. 37, that certain lands in the City of London, reclaimed from the Thames, should vest in the adjoining owners "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever."

The City of London Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii.) provides, by sects. 168 and 169, for the making of "a consolidated rate" for the purposes of the Act.

Held (affirming the judgment of the Queen's Bench Division), that the exemption given by sect. 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, applied only to then existing taxes and assessments, and did not apply to the "consolidated rate" under 11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii., which was substantially a new imposition.

THIS was an appeal by the Sion College from the judgment of the Divisional Court (Grantham and Channell, JJ.) upon a special case stated upon an appeal to quarter sessions.

On the 23rd April 1899 the Corporation of London, acting in pursuance of the City of London Sewers Act 1897, the City of London Sewers Acts 1848 and 1851, and the Elementary Education Act 1870, and the Acts amending the same, duly made a consolidated rate for 1899 at 2s. 5d. in the pound (including 1s. 2d. for the school board).

The premises which Sion College occupied, and in respect of which they were assessed, were partly on land which was reclaimed under 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, the same having been previously, until so reclaimed, part of the foreshore of the river Thames.

[CT OF APP.]

SION COLLEGE v. CORPORATION OF LONDON.

[CT. OF APP.]

The questions arising on the appeal were solely concerned with that part of the land, which was occupied by buildings, which had been so reclaimed.

Since the conveyance to Sion College, and prior to the present rate, the college had not been assessed in respect of the premises in question to the consolidated rate owing, as the corporation alleged, to an error.

The college duly appealed against the rate to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the City of London, on the ground that the portion of land in question reclaimed under 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, was exempt by that statute from all rates, taxes, and assessments whatever.

The land and buildings in question were acquired by the college in 1886 by a conveyance to them dated the 8th April 1886.

The college contended that the land in question, and the buildings thereon, were not rateable to the consolidated rate made under the Acts mentioned, but were exempt by virtue of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37.

The corporation contended that the land was liable to be assessed to the consolidated rate under those Acts, and was not exempt.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the land was so exempt or not.

The statute 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, provides:

Sect. 51. And be it further enacted that the ground and soil of the said river so to be inclosed and embanked in the front of every such respective wharf or ground (and which shall be bounded on the east and west sides thereof by straight lines, running at right angles, to and upon the said intended front line) shall vest, and the same is hereby vested in the owner or owners, proprietor or proprietors, of such adjoining wharf or ground, according to his, her, or their respective estates, trusts, or interests therein, free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever.

The City of London Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. clxiii) provides:

Sect. 168. And in order to raise the money for the carrying the several purposes of this Act into execution, be it enacted that it shall be lawful for the commissioners, once in every year, or oftener if they think it necessary, to direct, by writing under the hand of their clerk, the alderman or his deputy, and the major part of the common councilmen of every ward within the said City within fourteen days after the order of the commissioners, to make one or more rate or rates, not exceeding in the whole the sum of fourpence in the pound in any one year, upon the owners or holders or occupiers of property within the City, in equal proportions, to be called "the Sewer Rate" for the purpose of constructing, altering, repairing, and cleansing the sewers within the City, and for otherwise maintaining effectually the wholesome sewerage and drainage of the City, and also for the purpose of securing, raising, and paying any moneys and the interest thereof, which may be borrowed on the security of the said sewer rate, in pursuance of the provisions of this Act; and in like manner, once in every year, or oftener, if they shall think it necessary to direct one or more rate or rates, not exceeding in the whole the sum of one shilling and sixpence in the pound in any one year, to be made upon the owners, and holders, or occupiers of property within the City, to be called "the Consolidated Rate," for the purpose of forming, making, maintaining, keeping in repair, paving, lighting, sweeping, cleansing, and watering the streets within the City, and of making and carrying into effect such improvements within the City as the commissioners are or shall or may from time to time or at any time be authorised to make and carry into effect, and of constructing, altering, repairing, and cleansing the sewers within the City, and for otherwise maintaining effectually the wholesome sewerage and drainage within the City, and also of defraying the salaries, gratuities, wages, and allowances of all officers acting in the execution of this Act, unless otherwise provided for, and all other incidental costs payments, charges, and expenses attending the execution of the powers, duties, and authorities hereby imposed upon and given to the commissioners, and which are not herein otherwise specially provided for, and for securing, raising, and paying any moneys, and the interest thereof, which may be borrowed on the security of the said consolidated rate, in pursuance of the provisions of this Act; and in case a rate shall not be made by the alderman or his deputy, and the major part of the common councilmen of any ward, within fourteen days after the order of the commissioners, or in case it shall be considered by the commissioners that a fair and just assessment has not been made in any ward, or in any precinct or place, parochial or extra-parochial (if any), it shall be lawful for the commissioners to direct an assessor to make a fair and just assessment on the net annual value, the expense whereof shall be added to the said rate, and shall be paid by the ward, precinct, or place, in which such a rate shall not have been made, or in which the commissioners shall consider that a fair and just assessment shall not have been made.

Sect. 169.—And be it enacted that every such rate as aforesaid shall be made by the alderman or his deputy and the major part of the common councilmen of each ward upon every person who shall inhabit, hold, occupy, possess, or enjoy any house or building within the City, or partly within and partly without the City (whether such person shall be now liable in respect of such house or building to be assessed to the relief of the poor, or be not liable to be assessed to the relief of the poor in respect thereof by reason of such house or building being situated in any precinct or extra-parochial place, or otherwise), according to the full net annual value thereof respectively (except in the several cases hereinafter mentioned), the same to be ascertained in manner hereinafter mentioned; and the said rates shall from time to time be collected and paid yearly, half-yearly, or oftener, if the commissioners shall think proper, and shall commence from such time after this Act shall come into operation as the commissioners shall think fit.

The Divisional Court (Grantham and Channell, JJ.) held that the provisions of the Act of 1848 repealed by implication the exemption from rates conferred by the Act of 7 Geo. 3, and judgment was therefore given in favour of the corporation (19 Mag. Cas. 656; 83 L. T. Rep. 76).

Sion College appealed.

Horace Ivory for the appellants.—The decision of the Divisional Court that the exemption given in respect of the land in question by sect. 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, was impliedly repealed by sect. 169 of the City of London Sewers Act 1848, was wrong. That exemption has not been repealed, either expressly or impliedly, by sect. 169 of the Act of 1848. The exemption which was taken away by sect. 169 was the exemption which existed in respect of persons living in extra parochial places and in precincts, and the words "or otherwise" must be construed as referring to some exemption ejusdem generis. The exemption given in respect of the land in question was not an exemption of that kind, but was given in consideration of the expenses incurred in reclaiming the land. It is a well-established rule that a subsequent Act does not repeal any privilege or exemption conferred by a prior local Act unless there is a clear intention to do so expressed in the subsequent Act:

[CT. OF APP.]

SION COLLEGE v. CORPORATION OF LONDON.

[CT. OF APP.]

Garnett v. Bradley, 39 L. T. Rep. 261; 3 App. Cas. 944.

There is not in the Act of 1848 any such clear expression of an intention to repeal the exemption given by the earlier Act. The general words of the Act of 1848, by which this consolidated rate is imposed, cannot take away the express exemption which previously existed by statute:

Liverpool Library v. Mayor, &c., of Liverpool, 2 L. T. Rep. 325; 5 H. & N. 526.

This consolidated rate is not a new imposition or tax at all, and therefore the exemption applies thereto even if the exemption is to be construed as relating only to taxes and assessments in existence when 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, was passed. In 1767 there was taxation for sewerage of the City, and for other matters included in this "consolidated rate." Even if there are under the Act of 1848 new subject-matters in respect of which the rate is levied, yet the previous exemption cannot be destroyed merely by adding new subject-matters to those which previously existed, and making one consolidated rate for the whole. The mere changing of the name of the imposition cannot affect the exemption.

Danckwerts, K.C. for the respondents. — The exemption given by sect. 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, was only in respect of then existing taxes and assessments, and was not given in respect of any new impositions which might come into existence in the future. It has been decided long ago, in several cases, that this exemption does not apply to any substantially new imposition created after the passing of the Act of 7 Geo. 3:

Williams v. Pritchard, 4 T. R. 2; 2 R. E. 310;
Perchard v. Heywood, 8 T. B. 468;
Rees v. London Gas Light Company, 8 B. & C. 54; Eddington v. Borman, 4 T. R. 4.

The "consolidated rate" brought into existence by the City of London Sewers Act 1848 was a substantially new imposition; a large number of new matters of expenditure are authorised by that Act, and especially a large increase of expenditure upon sanitary matters. This exemption is repealed by the provisions of sect. 169 of the Act of 1848. The general words of that section, which provide that the rate is to be levied upon "every person," are of themselves sufficient; but the further words, taking away all exemptions arising from residence in a precinct or extra-parochial place "or otherwise," show an express intention to take away every previously existing exemption. The general rule that a subsequent Act does not impliedly take away a privilege or exemption given by an earlier Act does not therefore apply. The Act of 1848 was a local and not a general Act:

Garnett v. Bradley, 39 L. T. Rep. 261; 3 App. Cas. 944;

London and Blackwall Railway Company v. Limehouse Board of Works, 3 K. & J. 123.

Avory in reply. — This consolidated rate was not a new imposition at all, within the meaning of the cases which have been cited. In Perchard v. Heywood (ubi sup.) there were express words amounting to a repeal of the previous exemption. There is also the further distinction that the subsequent imposition was an imperial and not a local tax.

SMITH, M.R. — This is an appeal from a divisional court, consisting of Grantham and Channell, JJ., and the question arises whether the president and fellows of Sion College are liable to be assessed and rated to a rate, which is called the "consolidated rate." There are two Acts of Parliament upon which the answer to this question depends. It is plain and beyond dispute that, at the time when 7 Geo. 3 was passed, 1767, the piece of land in question, upon which the college now stands, was part of the bed of the river Thames and was on the north bank of the river. It appears from the Act that it was desired to embank the river in some way, not in the way in which it is now done, upon the north bank. The purview of the Act was this, that if the frontagers upon the north side of the river Thames would embank the lands there situated at their own expense, then the land so embanked should become "vested in the owner or owners, proprietor or proprietors of such adjoining wharf or ground according to his, her, or their respective estates, trusts, or interests therein, free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever." I now pass on to what took place in 1848. In the year 1848 an Act was passed, which is called the City of London Sewers Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 143) by which a body of commissioners was brought into existence. The commissioners had large powers conferred upon them; they had large powers of improving the City; they had large powers of borrowing money upon the security of the rates, for the purpose of carrying out those improvements, and of making rates to provide money for those purposes; and they were empowered, by sect. 168, to make the rate, which was called the "consolidated rate," and is the rate in question in this case. Now, sect. 168 enacts that "it shall be lawful for the commissioners . . . once in every year, or oftener if they shall think it necessary, to direct one or more rate or rates, not exceeding in the whole the sum of one shilling and sixpence in the pound in any one year, to be made upon the owners and holders or occupiers of property within the City to be called 'the consolidated rate,' for the purpose of forming, making, maintaining, keeping in repair, paving, lighting, sweeping, cleaning, and watering the streets within the City, and of making and carrying into effect such improvements within the City as the commissioners are or shall or may from time to time or at any time be authorised to make and carry into effect, and of constructing, altering, repairing, and cleansing the sewers within the City, and for otherwise maintaining effectually the wholesome sewerage and drainage of the City, and also of defraying the salaries, gratuities, wages, and allowances of all officers acting in the execution of this Act, unless otherwise provided for, and all other incidental costs, payments, charges, and expenses attending the execution of the powers, duties, and authorities hereby imposed upon and given to the commissioners, and which are not herein otherwise specially provided for, and for securing, raising, and paying any moneys, and the interest thereof, which may be borrowed on the security of the said consolidated rate." The commissioners may do all those things, and may borrow money on the security of this consolidated rate, which they were under this Act entitled to bring into existence for the first time. Then sect. 169 provides that, "Every such rate as aforesaid shall be made by the alderman or his deputy and the major part of the common councilmen of each ward upon every person who shall inhabit, hold, occupy, possess, or enjoy any house or building within the City, or partly within and partly without the City (whether such person shall be now liable in respect of such house or building to be assessed to the relief of the poor or be not liable to be assessed to the relief of the poor in respect thereof by reason of such house or building being situated in any precinct or extra-parochial place or otherwise)." Pausing there, can it be doubted for a moment that, if this section of the Act of 1848 stood alone, the owners of Sion College would be liable to be assessed to this "consolidated rate"? That was not and could not be disputed. The question arises in this way: It is contended that, although by this Act of Parliament, passed in 1848, the "consolidated rate" was brought into existence, and the proper persons were empowered to levy it, and although by that Act Sion College would undoubtedly be liable to the rate, yet by reason of sect. 51 of the Act of 1767 (7 Geo. 3, c. 37) Sion College is exempt from paying this "consolidated rate." It is said that Sion College is exempt from this rate because sect. 51 of the Act 1767 provided that this land should vest in the owners "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever." Therefore it is contended that by this Act which was passed in 1767 there is an exemption from this "consolidated rate" which was first brought into existence in the year 1848. Now, in this case we have to consider what is the meaning of the words "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever," for it seems to me that this is the first and governing point in this appeal. Do those words mean that the land was to be free only from all taxes and assessments which were then in existence in the year 1767? Now this court in this case is not left without authority upon the question because, as it seems to me from the cases to which our attention has been called—Williams v. Pritchard (4 T. R. 2; 2 R. R. 310), Perchard v. Heywood (8 T. R. 468), and Rez v. London Gas Light Company (8 B. & C. 54)—the one judicial interpretation of sect. 51 of 7 Geo. 3, c. 37, has been that it only exempts the land from taxes and assessments which were then existing in 1767, and not from new or substantially new taxes or assessments which came into existence after 1767. During the argument Collins, L.J. read a passage from the judgment of Bayley, J. in Rez v. London Gas Light Company (ubi sup.), which is very apposite to the matter which we now have in hand, but I need not read it again. The substance of all those cases is this, as it seems to me: That if the tax, the subject-matter of the inquiry, is a substantially new tax which has come into being and is first levied after the passing of the exempting Act of 1767, then that new tax, as I will call it, does not come within the exemption, and that only those matters which were existing at the time of the passing of the Act 1767 come within the words "free from all taxes and assessments whatsoever." In my opinion, looking at what the present tax is, it is substantially a new tax which came into existence under the Act of 1848. I agree that it has some elements which would appertain to some of the old taxes which were levied prior to the creation of the "consolidated rate," but I cannot look at what this consolidated rate is, and when it was brought into existence, and the circumstances under which it was brought into existence, and the persons who were to administer it, without coming to the conclusion that it was substantially a new tax or assessment brought into existence under the Act of 1848. It seems to me, following the authorities upon the point to which I have called attention, that the Sion College does not come within the exemption, given by sect. 51 of the Act 1767, with regard to this consolidated rate, and that therefore the judgment of the Divisional Court was right. There was another point taken, upon which I am not going to deliver judgment. That point was whether, assuming this rate did come within the exemption, that exemption has not been repealed by sect. 169 of the Act of 1848. The inclination of my opinion is that it has not been repealed, but I give no judgment upon that point, for it is not necessary to do so in the view which I have expressed. For the reasons which I have stated I think that this appeal fails and must be dismissed.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. I confess that I felt a great deal of sympathy for the very clear and able argument of Mr. Avory in support of the appeal, but I think his real difficulty lies in the series of early decisions—Williams v. Pritchard (ubi sup.), Perchard v. Heywood (ubi sup.), and Rez v. London Gas Light Company (ubi sup.), to which I need not refer again. Those cases seem unquestionably to have established that, with respect to this particular exemption, it was intended to be an exemption only from existing taxes and assessments, with this possible degree of expansion—namely, that named by Bayley, J. in the case of Rez v. London Gas Light Company (ubi sup.), where he says: "The house and window tax was a new one imposed after the exemption was given; and the exemption may be considered analogous to a covenant to pay taxes, which applies to old taxes or others substituted for them, but not to taxes entirely new, unless there are express words to give it such extensive operation." That being so, we have got to deal now with the question whether this exemption extends to this consolidated rate. It seems to me that when the numerous subject-matters of that rate, which were not contemplated or known of at the time when this exemption was given, are considered, the inference is that the consolidated rate is an entirely new tax, and it is none the less an entirely new tax, because undoubtedly it does embrace certain elements of the old tax. I think that is the test, and, though I feel that there is an injustice done in this case to the extent to which the area of the two taxes coincides, still I think that, as a question of fact, having regard to the numberless matters to which Mr. Dankwerts has called attention, and others which are to be found distributed through the Act, the inference of fact is strong that this is so substantially a new tax that it is outside the limits laid down by the old cases as defining the area of the exemption. I do not think it is necessary to go into the other question—that is, assuming this was a rate or assessment which would have fallen within the exemption—whether the words of the subsequent Act are sufficient to take it out of the exemption. I desire to give no opinion whatever that they have that effect. I am not at all satisfied that they have; but it is not necessary for our decision to say anything about it.

BOMBE, L.J.—I agree. The point may be put, as far as I am concerned, very shortly. Having regard to the decisions to which our attention has been called, and which are of such long standing, that it would not be becoming of us to review them now, it is clear that the Act of 1767 has had an interpretation put upon it, and that the operation of the Act does not extend to any tax or assessment which was not substantially in existence at the time when the Act was passed, that is to say, it does not extend to any taxes or rates which are substantially new, viewing the matter as one of substance. Then one has to consider whether this consolidated rate, established by the Act of 1848, is or is not a substantially new rate. In my opinion, upon the facts of the case, we cannot avoid coming to the conclusion that it is, looking at the variety of purposes for which it is to be raised, and not the less because some of the purposes are purposes for which a rate was made in 1767. It is to be borne in mind that this consolidated rate is indivisible; it is a separate and indivisible rate, and cannot be split up; and it is for so many purposes, differing substantially from the purposes for which rates were made in 1767, that we are bound to hold, as it appears to me, that the consolidated rate is, for the purposes of the Act of 1767, substantially a distinct rate. It is said, and I have no doubt truly, that this is somewhat hard upon the appellants, but the Act of Parliament has created that hardship, and it is not for us, as it appears to me, to question its wisdom. That this Act did intend, in some respects, to do away with immunities from rating is clear, although whether it intended to do away with the general immunity of Siou College under the Act of 1767 is a question about which I express no opinion. Upon the grounds which I have stated, which are the grounds given by the Master of the Rolls and the Lord Justice, I think this appeal must fail, and, like them, I express no opinion upon the other points which have been raised.

Appeal dismissed.

EASTWOOD BROTHERS LIMITED v. HONLEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Local government—Sewers—Right to discharge liquids from manufactories—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 21—Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 59), s. 17—Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 75), s. 7.

The plaintiffs were the owners of certain manufactories, and since 1885, with the consent of the local authority, had caused a drain which received the liquids proceeding from their mills and the manufacturing processes carried on there to empty into the sewer of the local authority.

The present local authority threatened to disconnect the drain from the sewer.

Held, that under sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875 the plaintiffs had an absolute right to discharge their effluent into the sewer; and if that right had been qualified by sect. 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876, the facilities which had been given by the local board for dealing with the effluent ought not to be withdrawn unless the case came within one of the provisions to sect. 7, which had not been proved, and the plaintiffs were entitled to an injunction restraining the defendants from severing the connection between the drain and the sewer.

Decision of Byrne, J. (19 Mag. Cas. 628; 83 L. T. Rep. 22) affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from a decision of Byrne, J. granting an injunction restraining the defendants from cutting off the connection between the plaintiffs' drain and their sewer.

The facts and sections of the various Acts of Parliament are fully set out in the report of the case in the court below.

Asquith, K.C. and Clayton for the appellants.—Sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875 does not apply to trade effluents, and the decision of Charles, J. in Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council (75 L. T. Rep. 689; (1897) 1 Q. B. 384, 392) on this point was wrong. His decision was reversed on appeal (76 L. T. Rep. 315; (1897) 1 Q. B. 625; 78 L. T. Rep. 569; (1898) A. C. 387), but this point was not considered. The plaintiffs have no statutory right. They also referred to

Attorney-General v. Clerkenwell Vestry, 65 L. T. Rep. 312; (1891) 3 Ch. 527;

Vestry of St. Mary, Islington v. Hornsey Urban District Council, 19 Mag. Cas. 577; 82 L. T. Rep. 580; (1900) 1 Ch. 695;

Charles v. Finchley Local Board, 48 L. T. Rep. 569; 23 Ch. Div. 767, 774.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Waggett for the plaintiffs.—The plaintiffs had sent this trade effluent into the dyke since 1853; therefore in 1885 they had acquired a prescriptive right to do so, and the change made by the then local authority did not affect it. The plaintiffs have an absolute right to discharge their trade effluent into this sewer. Sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875 applies to trade effluents, and the decision of Charles, J. in Peebles v. Oswaldtwistle Urban District Council (ubi sup.) is correct. His decision is corroborated by sects. 16 and 17 of the Public Health Acts Amendment Act 1890. The plaintiffs also have a right under sect. 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876. There is no evidence to bring the case within either of the provisions in that section. They also referred to

Ogilvie v. Blything Union Rural Sanitary Authority, 65 L. T. Rep. 338.

Asquith, K.C. in reply.

RIGBY, L.J.—I have found some difficulty in dealing with this case on account of the rather vague way in which it has been brought forward. But it is obvious that the local authority of their own free will did some years ago allow the effluent water from the plaintiffs' manufactory to be introduced into their sewers, and I can find no allegation that the sewers of the district are insufficient for carrying off that trade effluent as well as all other sewage which has to be carried away by them. With reference to the first proviso of sect. 7 of the Act of 1876, Byrne, J. upon the evidence before him has found that there is nothing to bring the case within that section, and I do not see any reason for overruling that finding. Under the circumstances, the local board come before us and say: "We object because we find that the land for the purposes of irrigation to dispose of the sewage is small in area in our district, and our engineers think that the nature of the trade effluent is such that it will render the processes of irrigation and filtration somewhat less efficient, and therefore it will be objectionable"; but there is no objection that I can find on the ground that there will be pollution within any ordinary meaning of the word, or any applicable meaning, by the sewage matter so as to prevent it being proper for conveyance into the sewer. I can find no grounds on which we ought to differ from Byrne, J., and therefore think the appeal ought to be disallowed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree.

STIERLING, L.J.—Whether we look at sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875 or sect. 7 of the Rivers Pollution Prevention Act 1876, I think no sufficient ground is shown for reversing the decision of Byrne, J. If sect. 21 applies, then, according to the authorities, the plaintiffs have an absolute right to discharge their effluent into the sewer. If, on the other hand, that right is qualified by sect. 7 of the Act of 1876, it seems to me that the facilities which have been given by the local board for dealing with the effluent ought not to be withdrawn unless the case is brought within one or other of the provisos in the two sub-sections which follow the first part of sect. 7. I agree that the local authority have not brought the case within either of the provisos, and consequently that the appeal ought to be dismissed.

(Before RIGBY, WILLIAMS, and STIERLING, L.JJ.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

London County Council—Statutory powers—Working tramways—Running omnibuses in connection therewith—Trading—County fund—Ultra vires—Local Government Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41), ss. 2, 68, 79—London County Tramway Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. li.), s. 2.

By sect. 2 of the London County Tramway Act 1896 the London County Council were authorised to purchase and work tramways. Accordingly they purchased certain tramways from a limited company which had, under its memorandum of association, power to run omnibuses in connection with its undertaking. The county council on taking over the undertaking continued to run omnibuses, and extended the route over which they travelled.

Held, that sect. 2 did not enable the London County Council to exercise any powers other than those which had been conferred upon them by the Local Government Act 1888; that, although sect. 2 clearly enabled them to work tramways, they had no statutory power to purchase and run omnibuses, nor to apply the county fund in that way; that the running of the omnibuses was an entirely separate undertaking; that it was not so closely connected with the powers which were expressly conferred upon them that it might be impliedly understood as included in those powers; and that it could not be included merely because it might be convenient.

Decision of Cozens-Hardy, J. (19 Mag. Cas. 586; 82 L. T. Rep. 671) affirmed.

The discretion exercised by the Attorney-General to interfere, and to allow his name to be used in actions brought at the relation of private individuals, ought not in any way to be fettered by the court.

UNDER the powers conferred upon them by the London County Tramway Act 1896, the London County Council purchased from the London Tramways Company Limited certain tramways south of the River Thames, with termini south of Westminster Bridge, Waterloo Bridge, and Blackfriars Bridge, respectively.

The London Tramways Company Limited had under its memorandum of association, as altered pursuant to the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act 1890, power to run omnibuses in connection with its undertaking.

At the time of the purchase the tramway company, while working the tramways, ran three sets of omnibuses in connection with and as feeders to the tramway business—viz., a set of omnibuses from the tramway terminus at Westminster Bridge, across the bridge up to Charing Cross and back; a set of omnibuses from the tramway terminus near Waterloo Bridge, across the bridge to the Strand, and back; and a set of omnibuses from the tramway terminus near Blackfriars Bridge, across the bridge to a point near Farringdon-street Station, and back.

After the purchase the London County Council ran the last set of omnibuses in the same way. Instead of the first two sets, they ran one set of omnibuses from the Westminster Bridge terminus over the bridge, past Charing Cross, through the Strand, and over Waterloo Bridge to the tramway terminus ending there, and back.

An action was brought by the Attorney-General, at the relation of a large number of the omnibus proprietors of London, and the omnibus proprietors themselves, suing as ratepayers, seeking a declaration that the London County Council had no power to carry on the business of omnibus proprietors in connection with their tramways, nor to apply the county fund for the purpose of maintaining and working the omnibuses; and consequential relief.

The London County Tramway Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. li.) recites that

There are in force within the county of London other local Acts authorising tramway undertakings (all or some of which are mentioned in the schedule to this Act), under and by virtue of which Acts the council have or claim to have powers to purchase at the expiration of certain periods the several tramways and undertakings thereby respectively authorised so far as they are within the county of London, but some of the said Acts confer no powers on the council for the working of the said tramways after they have been purchased.

And that

It is expedient that powers such as are in this Act contained should be conferred on the council for the working of the tramways authorised by the local Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act as and when such tramways are acquired by the council.

Sect. 2 provides that

It shall be lawful for the council to exercise with respect to any tramways authorised by the local Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act, which have been or shall be purchased or acquired by them under their statutory powers, the same powers of working such tramways respectively as were possessed by the company or companies respectively owning such tramways, and the council may provide, place, and run carriages thereon, and provide such horses, cars, fixed and movable plant, harness, and apparatus as may be requisite or convenient for enabling the council to exercise such powers, and they may employ such persons as may be requisite or convenient for working the tramways for the time being worked by them.

The action came on for trial before Cozens-Hardy, J. on the 22nd March 1900, when his Lordship reserved judgment.

On the 6th April 1900 his Lordship decided (82 L. T. Rep. 671) that the London County Council were carrying on a separate and distinct business as omnibus proprietors, which was not authorised, either expressly or by implication, by the Act of 1896.

From that decision the London County Council now appealed.

Haldane, K.O. and Vernon Smith, K.O. (with them Methold) for the appellants.—We submit that, upon the authority of the decision in Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (42 L. T. Rep. 810; 5 App. Cas. 478), and especially on the observations of James, L.J. in that case, the tramway omnibuses are works and property connected with the tramways, and were properly purchased under the London County Tramway Act 1896. They are ancillary to the tramways; they are for use in connection therewith. Applying the same principle as in that case, the purchase of the omnibuses was within the express power of the London County Council to "provide and run carriages" upon the tramways. Moreover, the words of sect. 2 of the Act of 1896, the words conferring the power to "provide horses, cars, fixed and movable plant, harness, and apparatus," are sufficient to permit of the carrying on of the omnibus business. "Cars" would include omnibuses. Sect. 21 of the London County Council (Vauxhall Bridge Tramways) Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. cxxi.), which relates to receipts and expenditure in connection with tramways and set-off, applies to all the tramways acquired by the London County Council, not to the Vauxhall line only. The principles laid down for the construction of statutes appear from Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.) and Mayor, &c., of London v. Galloway (14 L. T. Rep. 865; L. Rep. 1 E. & I. App. 34). The court ought not to apply the doctrine of ultra vires to a public body such as the London

County Council. A more liberal construction should be given to powers conferred upon a public body for the public benefit than where powers are conferred upon a company trading for gain. The case, therefore, is not like Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Company Limited v. Riche (33 L. T. Rep. 450; L. Rep. 7 E. & I. App. 653) and Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Company (53 L. T. Rep. 62; 10 App. Cas. 354). Assuming, however, that it is ultra vires of the London County Council to run these omnibuses, non constat that the rates are being interfered with. Even if there is no statutory authority to do what has been done here, still the London County Council, although a statutory corporation, is in a position analogous to that of a municipal corporation, not to that of a commercial company where every thing which is not strictly authorised is to be treated as ultra vires. It has, therefore, as part of its business, power to do all that a municipal corporation could do subject to the rates being unaffected, and it is for the plaintiffs to establish that the rates will be raised. There is no evidence to show that the running of the omnibuses will affect the rates. Sect. 2 of the Local Government Act 1888 defines the constitution of county councils, and shows that they resemble municipal corporations in their functions. The scheme of that Act was to establish a council for every county, and there was a certain transfer of powers; but there is no section of that Act which says that those are to be the powers exclusively. Instead of a charter which is granted to municipal corporations, there is sect. 79 relating to the incorporation of county councils; but nowhere is there an exhaustive definition of the powers possessed by county councils. As to the effect of the Municipal Corporations Acts 1835 and 1882 upon municipal corporations, see

Grant on Corporations, p. 16;

Rutter v. Chapman, 8 M. & W. 1;

Mayor, &c., of Newcastle v. Attorney-General, 67

L. T. Rep. 728; (1892) A. C. 568;

Sutton's Hospital, 10 Co. 1.

Further, in this action the Attorney-General is suing at the relation of rival traders who do not approve of the competition of the London County Council. There is, however, no sufficient public benefit shown to arise from the action which is brought in his name to justify it. The Attorney-General ought not to have allowed his name to be used at all. There is no sufficient ground for his interfering and bringing the action to prevent what is complained of.

Hon. E. C. Macnaghten, K.O. and Blaklock for the respondents.—It lies upon the London County Council to show that they have statutory authority or a common law right to do what they claim that they have the right to do—that is to say, to carry on this separate business of omnibus proprietors. In this, they have entirely failed. It is said, however, that assuming that they are wrong as to their statutory authority, nevertheless they are not in the position of a corporation founded by statute, but in the position of one of the old municipal corporations and can carry out what they require provided that they avoid coming upon the rates, and that they say they are not doing. But we submit first that they are not like an old municipal corporation, but are a mere creation of statute for a particular purpose,

[CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

and have only those powers which the statute confers. What is not expressly or impliedly authorised must be taken to be prohibited. They have no charter from the Crown like municipal corporations. The constitution of the London County Council entirely depends upon the Local Government Act 1888. Sect. 2 is the section relied upon by the London County Council. It is said that that puts them in the position of the old municipal corporations. The establishment of a "county fund" by the carrying thereto of all receipts of a county council, whether for general or special county purposes, is expressly directed by sect. 68 of the Act of 1888. It is said, however, that sect. 21 of the London County Council (Vauxhall Bridge Tramways) Act 1896 determines the rights as to the receipts and expenditure in connection with tramways. That section, we admit, applies to all the tramways acquired by the London County Council. But unless they can establish that omnibuses can be run in connection with the tramways, sect. 21 cannot assist them in any way. The London County Council can only run these omnibuses out of the fund which it holds. But they have not and never had any fund out of which to run omnibuses, and the expense must come out of the rates. Upon that ground also the plaintiffs are entitled to an injunction. This is not a case like Mayor, &c., of Newcastle v. Attorney-General (ubi sup.). Apart from the London County Tramway Act 1896 the London County Council have no power to work tramways. All that the London County Council were authorised by the Act of 1896 to acquire was the tramways. They have no power at all to work omnibuses. There is nothing in the Act to give them such a power by implication. Omnibuses are not connected with the tramways nor have they any relation to the working of the tramways. Again, there is no reason why the London County Council should stop the omnibuses at any particular place. It was the London County Council who thought that it would be more convenient to run the omnibuses along the Strand instead of stopping at the original termini. The fact that it is for the benefit of the public is quite immaterial. If it goes forth that the London County Council have power to run these omnibuses why not from other parts of London to the tramway termini? Their object is to carry on a commercial undertaking. They might just as well run a system of omnibuses all over London. Anything reasonably connected with the tramways they might do. But when it comes to running omnibuses because advantageous to the public that is no ground for permitting it. That was the point put forward in Colman v. Eastern Counties Railway Company (10 Beav. 1) and negatived by the court. It cannot be done unless shown to be really ancillary to that which the London County Council are expressly authorised to do. Then it is said that this is not a case in which the Attorney-General should interfere. As to an action being brought by the Attorney-General at the relation of other plaintiffs there is very little authority. There is the view of James, L.J. in Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (40 L. T. Rep. 265; 11 Ch. Div. 449, at p. 483) on the one side, and the view of Baggallay, L.J. in the same case on the other. There is also the statement of Lord Blackburn in the House of Lords in that case. There is no decision on the point, but only the divergent opinions of James and Baggallay, L.J.J. This, however, is a case of considerable public importance, and the Attorney-General has very properly allowed the action to be brought in his name. Moreover the matter does not quite rest there because the relators are not rival traders laying hold of the Attorney-General's name, but are ratepayers of the county of London, and they are entitled as individuals to say that the rates are employed in paying for the carrying on the business of omnibus proprietors in which business the London County Council have no power to engage. On that ground the relators are entitled to move in the matter. They referred also to

Reg. v. Reed, 42 L. T. Rep. 835; 5 Q. B. Div. 483.

Haldane, K.C. replied.

RIGBY, L.J.—The question raised in this case is as to the power of the London County Council to act as omnibus proprietors, not in general, but in respect to a particular line of omnibuses which in great part was used by the London Tramways Company Limited, who were the predecessors in title of certain tramways which, under an Act of Parliament (the London County Tramway Act 1896) the London County Council were authorised to purchase and use. The first point—or, at any rate, one that it will be convenient for us first to deal with—is as to the legal situation of the London County Council. Now, there is no doubt whatever that the London County Council are constituted by statute. They are, in fact, incorporated by sect. 79 of the Local Government Act of 1888. Sect. 79 says that "The council of each county"—and here it is the county of London—"shall be a body corporate by the name of the county council, with the addition of the name of the administrative county, and shall have perpetual succession," and so on. Undoubtedly, therefore, so far the London County Council is a statutory body, and is not a common law corporate body at all. But counsel for the London County Council have referred to sect. 2 of the same Act, which provides that "The council of a county and the members thereof shall be constituted and elected and conduct their proceedings in like manner, and be in the like position in all respects, as the council of a borough divided into wards, subject, nevertheless, to the provisions of this Act." Then the section goes on to deal with other special matters. Now, the argument submitted to us is that the council of a municipal corporation has, by the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, power to perform the duties of a corporation; and that whatever a corporation can do is to be done by them. Then it is said that municipal corporations are really creations not of an Act of Parliament, but of Royal Charter in each individual case; that, although their proceedings are regulated by an Act of Parliament, that does not prevent them from being in effect, corporations by Royal Charter which otherwise may be called corporations at common law; and that such corporations are not within the doctrine which is laid down—and was first indicated in modern times perhaps—in Ashbury Railway Carriage and Iron Company v. Riche (33 L. T. Rep. 450; L. Rep. 7 E. & I. App. 653), but subsequently in several cases, including that of Baroness Wenlock v. River Dee Company

[CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

(63 L. T. Rep. 62; 10 App. Cas. 354)—namely, that you must find within the four corners of the Act of Parliament something to justify the assumption of the power which they claim to exercise. If there be nothing in the Act to justify the assumption of such power, then the power does not exist. Counsel for the London County Council say—and no doubt it is to a considerable extent true—that that doctrine does not apply to a corporation not created by Act of Parliament, because it existed by the grant of a Royal Charter, and that, inasmuch as a municipal corporation is not within that doctrine, the council of a municipal corporation is able to do in the name, and on behalf of, the corporation many acts which are not included in any statute and which are the general powers of a common law corporation. Granted that that is the case, how does sect. 2 of the Local Government Act of 1888 make a county council capable of exercising the same powers? The provision is not that they shall have the same powers and authorities that the council of a municipal corporation has, but that the county council shall be constituted and elected and carry on their proceedings in the same manner and be in the same position in all respects. It is clearly those last words, if any, that could be construed as giving powers outside any statute. But are they intended to have so wide an effect? "In the same position in all respects" means subject, of course, to this statute—that is to say, subject to sect. 79 of it—subject, therefore, to the creation of the county council as a statutory corporation under sect. 79. That leaves the county council in a different position from the council of a borough, and is sufficient, in my opinion, to dispose of the argument that they are to be in all respects in the same position. They are not to be in all respects in the same position, but they are to be subject to this Act with this reservation (I am paraphrasing the words) that wherever you find a provision in this Act dealing with the County Council you must give effect to it, and make the position different from that of a council of a borough. That, I think, is quite sufficient to dispose of the suggestion that they can exercise common law powers of corporations created by Royal Charter, although the council of a borough may do so. I hold, therefore, that that section does not enable the London County Council to exercise any other powers than are contained in and conferred upon them by statute, excluding what their counsel seek to derive from sect. 2, which I hold has no such effect as that attempted to be attributed to it. Now, the next point is this: Have the London County Council, by any statute whatsoever, the power to deal with omnibuses and the power to run omnibuses? We are referred to the London County Tramway Act of 1896, which was an Act to enable the London County Council to work tramways, and for other purposes. Sect. 2 provides that "It shall be lawful for the council"—meaning the London County Council—"to exercise with respect to any tramways authorised by the local Acts mentioned in the schedule to this Act which have been or shall be purchased or acquired by them under their statutory powers the same powers of working such tramways respectively as were possessed by the company or companies respectively owning such tramways, and the council may provide, place, and run carriages thereon, and provide such horses, cars, fixed and movable plant, harness and apparatus, as may be requisite or convenient for enabling the council to exercise such powers, and they may employ such persons as may be requisite or convenient for working the tramways for the time being worked by them." Now that section quite clearly enables, and was intended to enable, the London County Council to work the tramways which were transferred to them under statutory powers. But it is said that at the time when the transfer took place—the transfer authorised by Act of Parliament—the London Tramways Company Limited were possessed of omnibuses and horses and other matters which were run in three directions, one being over Blackfriars Bridge to somewhere in Farringdon-street; one from Waterloo Railway Station, over Waterloo Bridge, to somewhere near Somerset House; and a third over Westminster Bridge to somewhere near Charing Cross. It was argued that, by virtue of this section the London County Council acquired the right of running, in the first place, the same tramways that were run by their predecessors. Now, those very predecessors commenced their existence as a tramways company only. Then it occurred to them that it would be convenient to run omnibuses as feeders to their main tramways. They got—I do not precisely know whether it was in the historical order of events before they began to use omnibuses or whether it was soon afterwards, but at any rate they did get, under the Companies (Memorandum of Association) Act of 1890—power to amend their memorandum of association so as to entitle them to run omnibuses. So they were in effect possessed, as one undertaking, no doubt, of two separate and distinct lines, one being the tramway line and the other the omnibus line. They had the power to use both, it is perfectly true. It would have been easy to say in this clause 2, which I am now dealing with, that the London County Council should have the right to take the whole undertaking of the tramways company, including the omnibus line as well as the tramway line. When I say "easy," I mean easy as a mere matter of drafting; that could have been made quite plain. But whether as a matter of Parliamentary policy it would have been easy, or even possible, I cannot say. I know nothing about that. But if the intention was, and Parliament were inclined to authorise, that the County Council should exercise the whole of the undertaking, including both branches—namely, the tramway branch and the omnibus branch—it would have been easy to have said so. Nothing of the sort, however, is said. And it is a very notorious circumstance that there is nothing which clearly refers to that sort of transfer, the transfer of the whole undertaking and power to run both tramcars and omnibuses. It is said that the words conferring the power to "provide such horses, cars, fixed and movable plant, harness, and apparatus as may be requisite or convenient for enabling the work of the tramways to be carried on" are sufficient. I am of opinion that they are not. The suggestion was made that "cars" would include omnibuses as well as tramcars. I think that a little investigation leads to the conclusion that "cars" was used in the Tramway

Acts in reference to tramcars, and with the meaning of tramcars. When the word "cars" is used with regard to omnibuses, it is coupled with the word "road." There is a large omnibus concern which is called the Metropolitan Road Car Company or some such name. But "road car" would seem to be used as distinct from "tramcar." Therefore, I find no power under these general words to take and use the omnibus line. Then there is the word "works." There are no works about the omnibus line at all. The works there may be said to be about the tram line, because the proprietors have to lay down a special line in the roadway over which the cars have to travel. But the omnibuses move over the street like any other vehicles, and there are no works at all. If the London County Council have power, it is a power to buy the omnibuses under this clause; and I do not find any power or any words that can reasonably be held to signify the power to run the omnibuses over the line. But there is something more, if it is necessary at all to deal further with the matter. The London County Council in what they have done—I am by no means prepared to say that it is not very reasonable, very proper, and very beneficial to the public, if only it was within their power under the statutes—have extended what I may call the subsidiary lines beyond where the London Tramways Company Limited, who were their predecessors, ever carried them; for whereas one line went over Westminster Bridge to Charing Cross and back, and another went over Waterloo Bridge and back, the London County Council have joined the two together. They now run what one would think is a much better and more convenient and more beneficial line altogether—a line, that is to say, beginning at Waterloo Station, going over Waterloo Bridge, along a portion of the Strand to Charing Cross, and then over Westminster Bridge, it is not necessary to say how far, and then back again. It is not, therefore, what the London Tramways Company Limited did, but something different—altogether an improvement, I agree, so far as I can see—but it is not the same thing. Now, one difficulty that the London County Council had to deal with was that by sect. 68 of the Local Government Act of 1888 provision was made for payment of all receipts connected with any of their business into a fund which was entitled the "County Fund," or some such appellation, and for paying out everything that they had to expend from that same fund. So that unless they are authorised as trustees and administrators of that fund to spend the money on the running of omnibuses they have no title to do what they have been doing. Their counsel sought to get over that difficulty by a reference to clause 21 of the London County Council (Vauxhall Bridge Tramways) Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. cxxi.), which enables the London County Council to make a tramway over Vauxhall Bridge. In general, that is alien to the questions now before us, although sect. 21 seems to be admitted to be quite a comprehensive enactment. It is an enactment as regards receipts and expenditure. The council may cause accounts to be kept of their receipts and expenditure in connection with tramways. Then provision is made, in effect, for a set-off of one over the other and there is no necessity under that section for payment into the General County Fund under sect. 68 of the Act of 1888. But it is all governed by those words "in connection with tramways," and if you do not make out that this running of a line of omnibuses is, within the meaning of the statute, part of the tramways scheme, then this sect. 21 does not help you in any way. Now, I think that really those are the important questions which have been raised. Of course I have not called attention to it, but it must be assumed that I have intended to deal with clause 31 of the London County Tramway Act of 1896. The company on the one hand, and the London County Council on the other, may, from time to time carry out arrangements with reference to the purchase by the London County Council of all the tramways for the time being belonging to the company, including any works and property, and so on. I thought for the moment that that phrase "works and property" was comprised in the other section; but now I see that that is in sect. 31 of the Act of 1896. But what I have said applies equally to sect. 31, namely, that there are no works to be bought, and the works and property dealt with there clearly would not have entitled them to any works in connection with the omnibus line, and if it entitled them to purchase property, it would only be the omnibuses, and would not give any power of running the omnibuses. Now, it is said that although the London County Council may not be expressly authorised to run the omnibuses, yet that is an undertaking so intimately connected with the powers that are expressly given to them of running the tramway that under the doctrine mainly depending on the judgment of James, L.J. which was given in the case of the Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (42 L. T. Rep. 810; 5 App. Cas. 473) it may be treated as tacitly understood to be something belonging to, and so connected with, the other powers which are expressly given, as to be really within the statute. Now, it is not to be denied, and I do not think anyone ever has denied, that there are certain things which a statutory corporation may do which are not absolutely mentioned in their Act. But they must be things of a very different degree of importance from the present thing. This is specified to be the running of omnibuses as a separate undertaking, and I cannot read in the observations of Lord Justice James anything to authorise the notion that a separate undertaking might be entered upon, merely because it was thought to be convenient for the purposes of the main undertaking. I find no authority for that at all. Indeed, in the case of Colman v. Eastern Counties Railway Company (10 Beav. 1) it might well have been argued, if it were enough really, that to run a steamboat from Harwich to the Continent or somewhere else was most advantageous for the Eastern Counties Railway Company, and therefore ought to have been taken as impliedly granted to them for the purposes of the undertaking which they undoubtedly had. It appears to me that that argument might have been used there; but Lord Hatherley would not have it at all. He said that it was outside the powers given to the railway company by the Act of Parliament, and however advantageous it might be—and I dare say it was very advantageous—there was no authority to do it. In the present case this line of omnibuses run

[CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

by the London County Council may be—and I am willing to assume that it is—very advantageous for themselves and for the public. But if they have no power, and no authority by their statutes to run the omnibuses, all that avails nothing. They must show authority to run the omnibuses before they can be allowed to do it. Then it was said that in this case the Attorney-General is suing at the relation of rival traders or companies, and that there is not sufficient public benefit shown to arise from the action which is brought in his name to justify it. For my part, I must say that, if there be any case in which a public body is going beyond its powers, I do not see any reason why the Attorney-General should not interfere. He, of course, has to consider whether in his discretion it is worth while to interfere before he allows his name to be used. But any attempt to tie him down to rules which I do not know to exist anywhere—or to tie him down for the first time by rules—should not, I think, be allowed. But in this case it really is not necessary to go into that question, for the fact is that the relators are also plaintiffs. They are plaintiffs and they are ratepayers in the county of London. I think, therefore, that there is no doubt whatever that, in the combination of information and bill, the suit is properly constituted, and the case made against the London County Council properly raised. I do not at all accede to the suggestion which was made by Mr. Macnaghten that they must necessarily be ratepayers, and that you cannot have, at any rate as a rule, an information without the relators being plaintiffs, because that is not a rule and never was. Consider, for example, all the cases of charities where an individual may not be plaintiff; but there are constant cases of individuals interested in a charity appearing as relators to an information by the Attorney-General. However, in the present case these relators are as a matter of fact also plaintiffs, and we are therefore absolved really from any minute inquiry as to the degree of public benefit that may be concerned in the information so as to justify the Attorney-General in bringing this action. I think that upon all the grounds that have been stated the case for the London County Council fails, and that it must be held that they have no power to run these omnibuses. The result, therefore, will be that the appeal fails and must be dismissed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I entirely agree with all that has been said by the Lord Justice. I feel that I ought to say a word or two, because the case is a case of some importance; but I do so with some hesitation, partly because my Lord has so fully and forcibly expressed the law upon the subject, and secondly, because, if I tried to express my view in a few words, I do not know that I could do so in better words than those which have been already used by Cozens-Hardy, J. in the court below. There is one short passage in his judgment which seems to me to express the whole case. "It seems to me," says Cozens-Hardy, J., "that the London County Council are really carrying on a separate and distinct business as omnibus proprietors. They do not, and they cannot lawfully, convey in their omnibuses only passengers from and to their tramways. By the Act of 1843 for regulating hackney and stage-carriages in and near London, they are bound to take any passenger who desires a ride, and is willing to pay a halfpenny, provided there is a vacant seat. The running of omnibuses in the streets of London is certainly not expressly authorised by the Act of 1896, and, in my opinion, it is not impliedly authorised." I will, however, say a word or two about the points which have been made here. These points seem to me to be as follows—I mean the points made on behalf of the London County Council. First of all, it is said that the London County Council, by reason of the powers granted to them by the London County Tramway Act of 1896 of acquiring the tramways, and the property of the tramways company, and running the tram-cars, had, in the events which happened, the power by express words, or reasonable implication therefrom, of running these omnibuses. Secondly, it is said that the London County Council is, by virtue of the Local Government Act of 1888, in the position of a municipal corporation created by charter. It is said that it has the same power of action and of contracting that a private individual would have, even although the running of these omnibuses should be outside the statutory power of the London County Council, expressed or implied, unless, indeed, the London County Council for the purpose of maintaining and running the omnibuses had to come upon the rates, or some other fund, which is appropriated to statutory purposes. Now, as to the first point, I think that the express statutory powers do not extend to the running of these omnibuses. The express powers relied on are those contained in sect. 2 of the London County Tramway Act of 1896, which was an Act to enable the London County Council to work their tramways, and for other purposes. The other power relied on is that which is contained in the 31st section of the London County Tramway Act of 1896. My Lord has already pointed out that the express words which are contained in these two sections do not cover the running of these omnibuses. Of course, when I say this, I am taking the same view of the facts which Cozens-Hardy, J. did. These omnibuses are not run, and could not be run, even if it were necessary so to do, solely as ancillary to the tramway business. They, necessarily, coming from the south side of the Thames at the terminus of the tramway lines near Westminster Bridge, and from the terminus of the tramway lines on the south side of the Thames near Waterloo Bridge, by a route over the two bridges and along the northern side of the Thames, must carry passengers who wished to be carried in that direction, and along that not inconsiderable distance, although such passengers may have no intention to travel by the tramways at all, and have no intention to go to, or come from, the tramways at all. Then it is said that the power to run these omnibuses is really, although not within the express words that I have been dealing with, yet expressly or impliedly given by the terms of one or other, or both of those sections. Now, I do not propose to go any further into this question. In the case of Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.), Lord Blackburn in his speech on page 481 of the report in 5 App. Cas., and Lord Watson in his speech on page 486 of the same report, both it will be observed say that where you have got a body exercising statutory powers of this sort, you are not limited to the express powers, but that you may treat the powers as extending to matters which are expressly or by implication included in the express powers. They go on, however, to point out that if you cannot bring the matter within the expressed or implied powers, the Legislature must be held to have prohibited everything which you cannot bring within those expressed or implied powers. I mention that now because it is a convenient moment to do so. That observation, which is made both by Lord Blackburn and Lord Watson, seems to me to have a considerable bearing upon the order, which it was right, in my judgment, that the court should have made in this particular case. I ought to add this, however: When one is dealing with the question whether the power of running these omnibuses is fairly to be implied from the expressed power to run the tramways—because, as it is said, it is found very convenient for the tramway business to have such omnibuses—one has not only to take into consideration that those omnibuses going the distance and the route which they do must necessarily take passengers who have nothing to do with the tramway lines or the trams at all, but also that the powers of the tramway companies are very strictly defined by the General Act—the Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78). That Act deals amongst other things with the power to make bye-laws, with the fixing of the fares and tolls, and with various offences which may be committed upon the tram lines. And it seems to me that it would be a very strong thing to say that you must include the power to run omnibuses among the powers implied from the grant to the London County Council of the power to run tramways. The power to run omnibuses is not in any respect governed by the elaborate provisions of the Act of 1870. On the contrary, it is governed by a statute which in many respects is entirely different in its provisions—that is to say, the Metropolitan Stage Carriage Act of 1843. That is all I propose to say as to the first point. Now I will deal with the second point. That point is that the corporation here are to be treated really as if it were a common law corporation created by charter, and having all those powers which are defined by the case of Sutton's Hospital (10 Co. 1), which was cited by Mr. Haldane; and that therefore the London County Council should not be restrained here, even although the running of these omnibuses should be outside their statutory powers. Now, that argument is based upon sect. 2 of the Local Government Act of 1888. That section says: "The council of a county and the members thereof shall be constituted and elected and conduct their proceedings in like manner, and be in the like position in all respects, as the council of a borough divided into wards, subject nevertheless to the provisions of this Act, and in particular to the following provisions," and then follow some provisions relating to qualification, to periods of election, and to other matters of detail of that sort. Now I read that section as if it had said: the council of a county created by this statute shall be constituted, elected, and so on, in like position in all respects as the council of a borough, subject, nevertheless, to the provisions of this Act. It seems to me that, under those circumstances, it is impossible to hold that whereas one of the provisions of this Act is the creation of this corporation—the London County Council—those words enable you to say that this corporation is to be treated as if it were not created by a statute at all, but had been created by a common law charter, because municipal corporations under the Act of 1882 were common law corporations so created. It seems to me that so to read sect. 2 would give no effect to the words "subject, nevertheless, to the provisions of this Act." Further than that it seems to me that this is a mere machinery section. The reason why I call attention to the sort of provisions which are contained in sect. 2 of the Local Government Act of 1888 under letters (a) to (e) is that if one looks at the part of the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882—beginning at sect. 10 and going on to sect. 16—one will find that the matters that are provided for in those sections are matters of machinery and detail just of the same character as those which are provided for in the provisions of sect. 2 of the Local Government Act of 1888. I therefore should read sect. 2 as a mere machinery section, dealing with the constitution, election and conduct of proceedings, and not as a section making a radical alteration in the origin and incorporation of the county council, changing it, in effect, from a corporation incorporated by a statute for the particular purposes mentioned in the statute to a corporation created by charter outside the statute altogether. I will just add on that point that if it had been intended to make any such provision one would not have expected to find it in this machinery section at all, but in the 79th section of the Act of 1888. Now, another matter that I wish to deal with is that it is suggested or argued to a certain extent that the London County Council could not be restrained because they can maintain and run their omnibuses without coming upon the rates. Well, so far as that point is concerned, it seems to me that there is absolutely nothing in it because that point admittedly depends on sect. 21 of the "Vauxhall Act," as I will call it for shortness. It is plain that that section has no application at all unless the London County Council are able to satisfy the court that that which they are doing in running these omnibuses is something which they are doing in connection with the tramways under the statutory powers which they have to run tramways. Lastly, there has been an argument put forward that the court ought not to grant an injunction in this case, because it is a case in which the Attorney-General should not have allowed his name to have been used at all, it being really an application by some omnibus proprietors, who do not like the competition of the London County Council for the purpose of preventing if they can that competition. There is no doubt that if there was anything at all in the argument in this particular case, the relators are at all events rate-payers, and as such would have a right to ask the Attorney-General to allow his name to be used to test the question of whether the running of these omnibuses can be justified.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. There are two main points which have been argued before us in this case. The first is as to the construction of sect. 2 of the London County Tramway Act of 1896, and that seems to have been the point that was mainly argued before the learned judge in the court below—Cozens-

[CT. OF APP.]

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[CT. OF APP.]

Hardy, J. As regards that, I do not propose to say anything, because I entirely agree with the conclusions of fact and of law at which the learned judge arrived, and for the same reasons. But out of respect to the arguments which have been addressed to us, I should like to say a few words with reference to the second point, which, so far as I gather, has been brought out for the first time before ourselves—that is, that the London County Council has got all the powers of a common law corporation. Now, unquestionably the London County Council is a creation of statute, for it was created by the Local Government Act of 1888. That does not end the question, because it may be that the statute has conferred upon the London County Council all the powers of a common law corporation. The incorporation is effected by sect. 79 of the Act of 1888, which says: "The council of each county shall be a body corporate by the name of the county council with the addition of the name of the administrative county, and shall have perpetual succession and a common seal," and so forth. Now, the first observation that one would make there is that that section at any rate does not confer on this statutory corporation the powers of a common law corporation. Again there is another observation that I may make, which is this: There is a group of clauses in the Act of 1888 beginning with sect. 3, which is headed, "Powers of County Councils," and we do not find any such express power conferred there. It is not there expressly enacted anywhere that the powers of the county councils are to be those of the common law corporations. What is relied upon are the words which are found in sect. 2, sub-sect. 1 of the Act, the first two sections being grouped together under the head of "Constitution of County Council." What is said there is this, "The council of a county and the members thereof shall be constituted and elected and conduct their proceedings in like manner, and be in the like position in all respects, as the council of a borough divided into wards, subject nevertheless to the provisions of this Act." Now the way in which it is proposed that we should hold that the powers of the London County Council are those of a common law corporation is this: We are referred to the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882 to find the position of a council of a borough, and sect. 10, sub-sect. 1, is relied upon. It enacts that: "The municipal corporation of a borough shall be capable of acting by the council of the borough, and the council shall exercise all powers vested in the corporation by this Act or otherwise." Now, the first observation that occurs to me upon that is that the council of the county is not to be in a like position in all respects as the council of a borough, but only of a particular class of borough—namely, the council of a borough divided into wards. I apprehend that that qualification points to something which is peculiar to the position of the council of a borough divided into wards, and which distinguishes it from a council of a borough which is not divided into wards. And if the sections which follow sect. 10 of the Municipal Corporations Act of 1882 are looked at it is found that there are peculiarities which distinguish a council of a borough divided into wards from those which are not. But in the second place there is this remarkable difference: The council of a borough is not a municipal corporation. The municipal corporation is, generally speaking at any rate, a common law corporation created by charter; and the way in which the Legislature has thought fit to confer powers upon the municipal corporation of a borough is this: "Shall exercise all powers vested in the corporation by this Act or otherwise." So that the council of a borough is to exercise all the powers of a common law corporation and the municipal corporation of a borough. Now, if the words "in a like position in all respects," were intended to refer to powers it seems to me that we should arrive at this extraordinary conclusion, because there is no separate corporation here whose powers the council are to exercise. The council, by sect. 79, is itself the corporation; and it seems to me that this would be a very elaborate way of really saying nothing at all about the powers, because we should be still driven back to sect. 79 or the subsequent sections, namely, sect. 3 and the following sections which do confer powers on the county councils. I come to the same conclusion, therefore, as my learned brothers, that really sect. 2 in this portion of it does not relate to the powers of county councils at all, but is simply dealing with matters which relate to their constitution, or in other words, as Williams, L.J. described it, it is a "machinery section." Now, that being so, the London County Council is left simply in the position of a statutory corporation and anything which is beyond the powers conferred upon it by statute must be taken according to the decision to be in terms prohibited. That brings me to the last point which has been argued before us—namely, that there is not sufficient ground for the Attorney-General interfering and bringing the action in this case to prevent the exercise and abuse of the powers. Now, that argument is based upon the opinion expressed by James, L.J. in the case of Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (40 L. T. Rep. 265; 11 Ch. Div. 449; on appeal, 42 L. T. Rep. 810; 5 App. Cas. 473), which, at the time, was dissented from by Baggallay, L.J. in the same case. It does not seem to me necessary on this occasion to say anything or decide anything as to the point upon which those two learned judges differed, because James, L.J. himself, at page 483 of the report in 11 Ch. Div., says this: "Where a company intrusted with large powers is deliberately violating an express enactment, or disregarding an express prohibition of the Legislature, it is really committing a misdemeanour, and ought to be at once stopped." Now, it seems to me that here the London County Council is violating an express enactment upon the facts which have been found by the learned judge in the court below, and with which finding we agree, because by sect. 68 of the Local Government Act of 1888, it is provided that: "All receipts of the county council, whether for general or special county purposes, shall be carried to the County Fund, and all payments for general or special county purposes shall be made in the first instance out of the fund." That is a section which was introduced for important purposes. The London County Council (Vauxhall Bridge Tramways) Act, 1896, creates an exception from that general rule, but it only authorises the exception in the case of receipts and expenditure in connection with tramways. And the moment you arrive at the conclusion at which Cozens-Hardy, J. arrived, and with which we agree, that the London County Council are really carrying on an independent business of omnibus proprietors, the exception created by sect. 21 of that Act no longer applies. Therefore in respect of that the London County Council must obey the injunction which is contained in sect. 68 of the Local Government Act of 1888. It seems to me, therefore, that the case is brought within the very rule laid down in Attorney-General v. Great Eastern Railway Company (ubi sup.) by James, L.J. himself, and that the declaration in this case has been properly made, and the injunction properly granted. The appeal must therefore be dismissed with costs.

JONES (app.) v. ROBSON (resp.). (a)

Coal mines—Explosives—Statutory rule—“Notice shall be given” as Secretary of State “may direct”—Prevention of contravention of rules—Coal Mines Regulation Acts 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), s. 50, and 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 43), s. 6.

By sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896 (which is to be read with the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887) a Secretary of State is empowered on being satisfied that any explosive is or is likely to become dangerous by order “of which notice shall be given in such manner as he may direct” to prohibit the use thereof in any mine, &c. And by sect. 50 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 the owner, agent, and manager of a mine in the event of any contravention of or non-compliance with any such rule “by any person whomsoever” are each to be guilty of an offence against the Act unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means by publishing and to the best of his power enforcing such rule to prevent such contravention or non-compliance.

Held, that a rule made by a Secretary of State under sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896 is valid and binding though there is no evidence, except the fact that he had made the order, to show that the Secretary of State was satisfied that the explosive referred to in the order was or was likely to become dangerous, and no evidence, except the publication of such rule under the Rules Publication Act 1893, of notice of such rule being given.

Held, further, that a manager of a mine may be guilty of an offence under sect. 50 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 where the explosive improperly used was brought into the mine by one of the workmen without his knowledge or authority.

CASE stated by the justices of the county of Glamorgan sitting at Aberdare.

(a) Reported by J. ANDREW STRAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

On the 6th June 1900 an information was laid by the respondent that the appellant on or about the 7th May 1900, being the certified manager of a certain coal mine, situate in the parish of Aberdare in the said county, known as the Aberdare Merthyr Colliery, unlawfully did contravene and did not comply with rule 4 of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order of the 24th May 1899, made under sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 43), to be observed in the said mine by him as such manager thereof—to wit, by allowing detonators to be used in the mine, in respect of which detonators the following conditions required by such rule had not been observed—namely, that detonators shall be under the control of the owner, agent, or manager of the mine or some person specially appointed in writing by the owner, agent, or manager for the purpose, and shall be issued only to shot firers or other persons specially authorised by the owner, agent, or manager in writing.

This information came on for hearing on the 12th June 1900, and the justices convicted the appellant and fined him 10*l.* and costs.

The proceedings were taken under rule 4 of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, the 24th July 1899, which is as follows:

On and after the 1st day of October 1899 no detonator shall be used in any mine unless the following conditions are observed: (a) Detonators shall be under the control of the owner, agent, or manager of the mine or some person specially appointed in writing by the owner, agent, or manager for the purpose, and shall be issued only to shot firers or other persons specially authorised by the owner, agent, or manager in writing; (b) Shot firers and other authorised persons shall keep all detonators issued to them until about to be used in a securely locked case or box separate from any other explosive.

This order was issued under the powers given by sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 43), which is as follows:

A Secretary of State, on being satisfied that any explosive is or is likely to become dangerous, may, by order of which notice shall be given in such manner as he may direct, prohibit the use thereof in any mine or any class of mines, either absolutely or subject to conditions, and the provisions of the principal Act as to contraventions of general rules shall apply to contraventions of such prohibition.

At the hearing the solicitor for the respondent handed in to the court a Government printers' copy of the order purporting to have been made by a Secretary of State under sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896; and it was proved and the justices found as facts as follows: That the appellant was the certificated manager of the Aberdare Merthyr Colliery; that detonators were used in the colliery; that the appellant as such manager of the colliery received from Alfred Phillips Jones, the agent of the colliery, a copy of the order of the 24th July 1899, with instructions from him to see the provisions of such order carried out; that thereupon the appellant gave detonators to the under-manager, Daniel Davies, with verbal instructions to issue them to the workmen as required at the face of the workings—that is, the workmen's working-place—and that the appellant appointed one John A. Lewis to be the shot firer by an entry made in the journal of the colliery; that the appellant did not make any appointment in writing placing detonators under the control of any person, and no such person was appointed in writing by the owner or agent; that Daniel Davies, the under-manager, did not issue detonators as verbally directed by the appellant to the workmen at their working-places; that the workmen applied at the office of the colliery to Daniel Davies for detonators, and he supplied them; that shortly before the 7th May 1900 one John Lewis, a collier in the colliery, applied to Daniel Davies for detonators and was told there were none at the colliery; that John Lewis thereupon bought seven detonators at an ironmonger's shop and took them into the mine without the knowledge of the appellant; that John Lewis charged a blasting hole and applied one of the detonators so bought by him and sent for John A. Lewis, the appointed shot firer, to fire the charge; that blasting charges in the colliery were exploded by electricity applied by John A. Lewis, the shot firer; that upon this particular occasion the charge missed fire, and the said John Lewis withdrew the detonator, and whilst he was handling it it exploded and blew his hand off.

At the hearing before the justices it was argued on behalf of the appellant: (a) That notice of the order of the 24th July 1899 was necessary, and had not been proved; (b) that no proof had been given on the part of the respondent of the making by a Secretary of State of the alleged order of the 24th July 1899 set forth in the information; (c) that no proof had been given of any direction by a Secretary of State as to the manner in which notice should be given of the making of such order; and (d) that there was no proof of any such notice having been given of the making of such order as required by sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896.

It was also contended that upon the evidence it was clear that no detonators were issued by the under manager on the 7th May 1900, the date mentioned in the information, and that there were no detonators then under his control, and that the detonators used by the man John Lewis having been taken by him into the mine surreptitiously never got into the possession of the owner, agent, or manager, and could not therefore be under their control within the meaning of the said order.

The justices were of opinion as to contentions (a), (b), (c), and (d) (sup.) that the printed document was in itself sufficient evidence of the alleged order of the 24th July 1899, having been made by a Secretary of State, and the printing of such document was in itself sufficient evidence of a direction of a Secretary of State as to the manner in which notice should be given of the making of such order. They were of opinion that the sending of the order by A. P. Jones to the appellant was also sufficient evidence of such notice having been given within the meaning of sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896.

As to the other contention the justices found that although no detonators were issued by the under manager on the 7th May 1900, yet it was the practice at the mine to allow Daniel Davies the under manager to have the control of the detonators he not being a person specially appointed in writing for the purpose, and it was the practice for him to issue detonators to persons other than shot firers or other persons specially authorised in writing.

The questions of law for the opinion of the court were: Was the printed document produced sufficient proof of the making of the order of the 24th July 1899 by the Secretary of State; and was the printing of such document sufficient evidence of a direction by the Secretary of State as to the manner in which notice should be given of the making of the order; and was the sending of the order by the agent of the colliery to the appellant sufficient evidence of such notice having been given as required by sect. 6 of the Act of 1896; and were the justices right in convicting the appellant on the ground that although no detonators were issued by the under-manager on the 7th May 1900, yet the practice of the mine was to place detonators under the control of the under-manager who was not specially appointed for the purpose in writing, and for him to issue detonators to persons other than shot firers or other persons specially authorised in writing?

Francis-Williams, Q.C. (Trevor Lewis with him) for the appellant.—We rely upon three points. In the first place there is no evidence that the Secretary of State was satisfied that this explosive was dangerous; and in the second place there is no evidence that he has given notice of the new rule as required by sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896. These two points go to the validity of the order itself. In the third place we say there is no evidence of any breach of the order on the day on which the explosion took place. The offence alleged in the information is that we allowed detonators to be used on that day—7th May 1899. The whole evidence shows that we did nothing of the kind. There were as a matter of fact no detonators in the mine on that day at all belonging to us. The man who used this detonator did not receive it from us, but bought it himself, and, as the case expressly finds, brought it into the mine without our knowledge.

H. Sutton for the respondent.—It cannot now be contended that the Secretary of State was not satisfied that this explosive was dangerous. The making of the order by him is sufficient evidence of this. Nor can it be contended that it is necessary to show he gave notice of the rule to the appellant. The words of sect. 6 as to giving notice are simply directory, and the notice is perfectly valid even though no notice is given. It has been published in the manner set out in the Rules Publication Act 1893, ss. 1, 3, and see Re Miller (8 E. & B. 321, at p. 332). Besides, this maxim applies to both these objections that official acts are presumed to have been done regularly until the contrary is shown. There is no evidence here that the acts were done irregularly. As a matter of fact the appellant had notice of the rule though it may not have been from the Secretary of State himself. As to the objection of substance no doubt the summons is not well drawn, but there are two answers to the objection. In the first place under Jervis' Act (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 1) the time at which an offence is alleged to have been committed is immaterial, and in the second place by sect. 50 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 the burden is thrown on the appellant to show that he took all the care possible to prevent the contravention of the rule.

Francis-Williams, Q.C. in reply.—The fact that no detonators were on that day in the manager's hand is surely the best possible evidence that the

Q.B. Div.]

JONES (app.) v. ROBSON (resp.).

[Q.B. Div.]

manager took all possible means to prevent the misuse of them.

BRUCE, J.—Two points have been taken in this case. The first relates to the question whether the order of the Secretary of State is valid and binding. The provision for making the rule is contained in sect. 6 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896. The first point was that it did not appear that the Secretary of State had been satisfied or that any evidence had been laid before him that this explosive was or was likely to become dangerous. I think that the fact that the secretary has undoubtedly made an order is sufficient evidence that he was satisfied that it was likely to become dangerous. The main point relied upon for the appellant was that there was no evidence that any notice had been given by the Secretary of State of the order or that any direction had been given as to the manner in which the notice should be published. I am not satisfied, after considering the evidence given on behalf of the respondent, that any notice was in fact given by the Secretary of State or that he did direct in what manner the notice should be published, and therefore I am driven to consider whether the giving of the notice by the Secretary of State is a condition precedent to the order coming into force. I think it is not. It seems to me that the directions contained in the section about notice are directory only; that the order comes into force when it is made by the Secretary of State; and although power is given to him to give notice and to direct how notice shall be given of the order, yet that is not essential to the order coming into force, but is merely directory, and the fact that no notice is given does not prevent the order from operating. Therefore I think the order was good and valid, although there is no evidence of any notice having been given by the Secretary of State or of any direction as to how the notice should be given. The next point is whether there was any evidence of the commission of the offence on the 7th May, the day mentioned in the information. I have some difficulty in finding that there was evidence that the appellant allowed the detonators to be used; but I think it was undoubtedly proved that on that day detonators were used in the mine. It has also been proved that the appellant was at the time the manager of the mine. Now, sect. 50 of the Act of 1887 provides that "Every person who contravenes or does not comply with any of the general rules in this Act shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and in the event of any contravention of or non-compliance with any of the said general rules in the case of any mine to which this Act applies, by any person whomsoever, the owner, agent, and manager shall each be guilty of an offence against this Act unless he proves that he had taken all reasonable means by publishing, and to the best of his power enforcing, the said rules as regulations for the working of the mine, to prevent such contravention or non-compliance." The respondent has satisfied us that the rule in question is a rule coming within the meaning of this section. We therefore have it proved that there was undoubtedly a contravention by some person of the rule on the 7th May. We also have it proved that the appellant was the manager of the mine without finding whether he had allowed the particular act to be committed on the 7th May. The act was committed; he was the manager at the time; and therefore he must be taken to be responsible for it unless he satisfies the justices that he has taken all reasonable means to enforce the rules and regulations in the mine and to prevent any contravention of them. It does not appear to me that the justices have considered that, and therefore if the appellant's counsel had wished it we should have sent the case back to them in order that they might consider the point. But as we are not asked to do this, I think we must come to the conclusion that the justices have acted simply upon the fact that there was a non-compliance on the 7th May, and have found that the appellant was manager of the mine at the time. Therefore he becomes responsible under this section for the act which was committed on that day by another person. The justices have not found that he allowed the detonators to be used. It was not necessary that they should have found that; but we must take it that they would probably have found that he had not taken the best means in his power to prevent them from being used. Therefore I have come to the conclusion that we must hold that the justices acted rightly, and that the appellant had committed the offence with which he was charged.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I will only say as to the last point touched upon by my learned brother that when the prosecution had proved that there had been an illegal use of detonators, and that the appellant was manager of the mine, they had proved all that was requisite. The burden of proving the further point lay on the appellant. I agree that the form of the summons was confusing, and that it would have been fair to the appellant if there had been any chance of his being acquitted, to send down that point for reconsideration, and if the appellant's counsel had pressed us, we should have done so: but I think he was wise in not pressing us, for it seems clear upon the evidence that no magistrate could have found that the appellant had taken all reasonable means to prevent contravention of the rule. The summons is puzzling because it is misconceived. It is no offence per se to allow an illegal act to be done; it is an offence to cause such an act to be done, or possibly to direct it to be done. The offence here arises out of the statutory provisions, and upon the principle Omne majus continet in se minus adopted by the court for the consideration of Crown Cases Reserved in Reg. v. West (77 L. T. Rep. 536; (1893) 1 Q. B. 174). I am of opinion that the conviction was good and must be affirmed.

Local government—Buildings—Bye-laws—Temporary wooden structures—“New building” within meaning of bye-law—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 157.

Under the powers given by sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875 to make bye-laws with respect to the structure of new buildings, an urban sanitary authority made a bye-law that every person who should erect a “new building” should cause such building to be constructed of good bricks, stone, or other hard and incombustible materials properly put together.

A wooden structure, measuring about 10ft. by 7ft. with a height of 10ft., was erected as a cover for a large weighing-machine on an esplanade where the public stopped for the purpose of using the weighing-machine. It had a wooden framing on all four sides, a wooden roof, and a wooden floor resting on joists, but was not fixed to the soil, and had no foundations. It was used only during the summer season, when it was open daily, but was closed at night, and no person remained therein at night. It had no sanitary arrangements or provision for lighting or heating.

A similar wooden structure, measuring about 9ft. by 7ft. with a height of 7ft., was erected and used during the summer months for the sale of light refreshments. It was put up at the beginning of each season, and at the end of the season was taken down and removed. It was made of wood with a roof of canvas on wooden cross pieces. It had no sanitary arrangements or provision for lighting or heating, and it rested on the ground without being fixed to the soil, and had no foundations. It was daily used as a shop for the sale of light refreshments from an opening in front for that purpose, and was locked up at night and no person remained therein.

Held, that neither of these wooden structures was a “new building” within the meaning of the Act of Parliament or the bye-law.

MAYOR, &C., OF SOUTHEND-ON-SEA (apps.) v. ARCHER (resp.).

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the borough of Southend-on-Sea sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction.

The respondent was summoned on the information of the appellants, acting as the sanitary authority for the borough of Southend-on-Sea, for that he (the respondent) did within six months prior to the date of the information unlawfully erect a new building—namely, a weighing-machine house, without causing such building to be inclosed with walls constructed of good bricks, stone, or other hard and incombustible materials properly bonded and solidly put together, contrary to No. 11 of the bye-laws in force in the borough with respect to new streets and buildings.

At the hearing the following facts were proved:—

That the structure was erected by the defendant within six months of the information as, and was used for, a house or shelter for a large weighing-machine on the esplanade on the sea front where the public passing along could and did stop for the purpose of using the weighing-machine; that the erection was used only during the summer months, and could readily be moved, being made in sections for that purpose.

That the structure measured 10ft. 4in. by 7ft., with a height of 10ft. in front and 8½ft. at the rear; that it consisted of wood framing closely boarded with match-boarding on all four sides, and had an opening 7ft. wide in front which was open during business hours but closed at night with wooden shutters and secured by bolts inside, and there was also a door which was locked at night.

It had a wooden floor close-boarded and placed on joists, and the roof was constructed of wood covered with felt. Inside there was a large weighing-machine, a small table, two chairs, and some hat-pegs.

There were no sanitary arrangements, and no provision for artificial lighting or for heating. It was not fixed to the soil, and had no foundation other than the wooden floor joists resting on the ground.

During the summer season the structure was open daily from 8 a.m. to 8 p.m. and was visited by persons using the weighing-machine, the defendant being in charge thereof. It was securely closed up at night, the weighing-machine and other articles being inside, but no person remaining on the premises.

*The appellants contended that the object of the power of making bye-laws, conferred by sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875, was to prevent the erection of wooden buildings or buildings of combustible materials in unfit situations; that the bye-laws in effect prohibited the erection of new buildings of wood, except such as were exempted therefrom; that the structure was not an exempted building, and that it was a new building within the scope and meaning of the bye-laws, and they cited Stevens v. Gourley (1 L. T. Rep. 33), Richardson v. Brown (49 J. P. 661), and Brown v. Corporation of Leicester (67 L. T. Rep. 686; 57 J. P. 70) in support of their contentions.*

*The respondent contended that the structure was not a building or a new building within the bye-laws; that the terms and requirements of the bye-laws as to new buildings showed that they could not be intended to apply to such an erection; that it had none of the features or uses with respect to which the corporation had power, under sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875, to make bye-laws; that in the ordinary sense of the words it had no foundation, roof, or chimney, and furnished no element of danger with regard to stability or fire, nor did its use render any provision for health necessary; that it was distinguishable in size, construction, permanency, and use from the structures (fitted for use as human habitations) which were the subject of the decisions in Stevens v. Gourley (ubi sup.) and Richardson v. Brown (ubi sup.); and that sects. 12 and 13 of the Southend-on-Sea Corporation Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. clviii.) defines “new build-* ings" for the purposes of these bye-laws as an erection of a permanent character.

The justices adjourned their decision and on the 2nd July 1900 they delivered a written judgment. They found the above facts proved and upon such facts they were of opinion that the erection was one of an entirely different character to those dealt with in Stevens v. Gourley (ubi sup.) and Richardson v. Brown (ubi sup.), and they were also of opinion that the power given by sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875 to make bye-laws, and the bye-laws made thereunder, did not purport to deal with erections of such a temporary nature and use, and they held, as a matter of law, that the erection was not a new building within the meaning of the bye-laws in force within the borough with respect to new streets and buildings, and they dismissed the information.

The question for the opinion of the court was: Whether upon the above facts the justices were right in holding in point of law that the structure was not a new building within the meaning of the bye-laws.

MAYOR, &C., OF SOUTHEEND-ON-SEA (apps.) v. ROMANIS (resp.)

A similar information was taken out against the respondent as in the previous case.

The structure in question was erected by the defendant within six months of the information for the purpose of being used during the summer months for the sale of tea, mineral waters, and light refreshments, on land on the sea front, and the public passing along stopped and made purchases from the erection. The defendant was in the habit of erecting the structure at the beginning of each season (in April) for the sale therefrom of mineral waters and light refreshments until the end of the season (in September), when it was taken down and removed, being built in sections for that purpose.

The structure measured 9ft. 3in. by 6ft. 11in. with a height of 7ft. 5in. It consisted of wood framing closely boarded with matchboarding on all sides. The front was movable and was taken down during business hours and closed and locked up at night. It had a wooden floor close boarded and fastened to its sides, and a roof of canvas or calico securely fixed on wooden cross pieces and fastened down all round.

Inside it had shelving, and a counter and goods were placed on the shelves. There were no sanitary or drainage arrangements and no provision for artificial lighting or for heating other than an urn for making hot water. It simply rested on the ground by its weight without being fixed to the soil and had no foundation or chimney.

During the summer season the structure was daily used and occupied as a shop for the sale of tea, mineral waters, and light refreshments, the defendant's tenant or a person employed by the tenant being in charge thereof and serving customers therefrom, and at night it was securely fastened up, the goods and articles remaining inside, but no one remaining on the premises.

The same contentions were urged as in the previous case, and the justices, having adjourned their decision, gave a written judgment on the same day and in the same terms as in the previous case, holding that, as a matter of law, the erection was not a new building within the meaning of the bye-law.

The question for the opinion of the court was the same as in the previous case.

The bye-laws were bye-laws made under sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875 by the Local Board for the District of Southend, acting as the urban sanitary authority, with respect to new streets and buildings in the urban sanitary district of Southend.

Bye-law No. 11 provided:

Every person who shall erect a new building shall cause such building to be inclosed within walls constructed of good bricks, stone, or other hard and incombustible materials properly bonded and solidly put together: (a) With good mortar compounded of good lime and clean sharp sand, or other suitable material; or (b) with good cement; or (c) with good cement-mixed with clean sharp sand.

No. 98 (as to penalties):

Every person who shall offend against any of the foregoing bye-laws shall be liable for every such offence to a penalty of five pounds, and in the case of a continuing offence to a further penalty of forty shillings for each day after written notice of the offence from the sanitary authority: Provided, nevertheless, that the justices or court before whom any complaint may be made or any proceedings may be taken in respect of any such offence may, if they think fit, adjudge the payment as a penalty of any sum less than the full amount of the penalty imposed by this bye-law.

Sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides:

Every urban authority may make bye-laws with respect to the following matters; that is to say (3) with respect to the structure of walls, foundations, roofs, and chimneys of new buildings for securing stability and the prevention of fires and for purposes of health.

Sect. 12 of the Southend-on-Sea Corporation Act 1895 provides:

For the purposes of this Act the expression "building" (including "new building" as defined by the next following section, shall include any erection or construction of a permanent character whether of masonry, brickwork, wood, iron, or other materials, and whether under or above the natural ground level and whether intended for human habitation or for trade or any other purpose whatever.

Macmorran, K.C. (Herbert Smith with him) for the appellants.—The question is whether these structures are "new buildings" within the meaning of the bye-law. To see whether a structure is a building or not, we have to look at the purpose for which it was erected. In Stevens v. Gourley (1 L. T. Rep. 33) a wooden structure intended to be used as a shop was held to be a building within the Metropolitan Building Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 122). In that case Erle, C.J. said that he was of opinion that a house constructed of wood, although it be not resting on masonry, let into the ground by way of foundation, is, when one considers the combustible material of which it is formed, within the mischief provided against by the Act. The case on which the justices seem to have gone wrong is the case of Fielding v. Rhyl Improvement Commissioners (38 L. T. Rep. 223; 3 O. P. Div. 272), in which it was held that a certain structure was not a new building within a similar bye-law; but the reason of that decision, as clearly appears from the judgments of Denman and Lindley, J.J., was that the structure was only of a temporary character, and was intended to be taken down again. If the structure in this case were put up for a merely temporary purpose, that case would be an authority for the proposition that this bye-law would not apply to it. That, however, is not so. The structure was not put up for a temporary purpose, and the danger arising from it is exactly the same as in larger buildings. In Slaughter v. Mayor, &c., of Sunderland (65 L. T. Rep. 250), although the structure was held not to be a "new building" within the meaning of a similar bye-law, the judgments show that the bye-law would have applied if the structure had been roofed in and had been capable of affording shelter, as in the present case. In Richardson v. Brown (49 J. P. 661) it was held that a wooden structure which was brought along the street on wheels and placed on the defendant's ground abutting on the street, and was used by him as a butcher's shop, was a "new building." It is not necessary to cite cases on other Acts, as a structure may be a building for the purposes of some Acts, and yet not be a building for the purposes of this Act. But, to illustrate the proposition that buildings erected for a temporary purpose are not "buildings" within a bye-law of this kind, reference may be made to

K.B. DIV.] MAYOR, &c., OF SOUTHEEND-ON-SEA v. ARCHER; SAME v. ROMANIS. [K.B. DIV.]

London County Council v. Pearce, 66 L. T. Rep. 685; (1893) 2 Q. B. 109;

London County Council v. Humphreys Limited, 71 L. T. Rep. 201; (1894) 2 Q. B. 755.

Brown v. Corporation of Leicester (67 L. T. Rep. 686; 57 J. P. 70), which was referred to before the justices, was decided on a different Act altogether. The structure in Archer's case is clearly a "building" within this bye-law. With regard to the second case, that against the respondent Romanis, the point of difference is that in this case the structure was taken down at the end of each season and put up again at the beginning of the next season. There is no such finding in Archer's case, as all the justices there say is that the structure is capable of being taken down. That is the sole difference between the two cases. The corporation contend that if it is lawful to erect one of these buildings in this way, then it would be equally lawful to make a whole street of them. These structures were not put up merely for a temporary purpose; in every way they are constructions within the bye-laws, which were made for the very purpose of making it impossible to put up buildings of this kind in urban districts without the supervision of the proper authority. The bye-law in question applies in each case, and the respondents ought to have been convicted. He also referred to Watson v. Cotton, 5 C. B. 51.

The respondent did not appear in either case.

BRUCE, J.—In both cases I am of opinion that the erections in question are not "buildings." I will deal with the first case which was argued. First, having regard to the size of the building—10ft. 4in. by 7ft. and height of 10ft.—the smallness of the size of the building, coupled with the fact that it contained a large weighing machine, a small table, two chairs, and some hat pegs, indicates to my mind that the structure was not a building adapted for human habitation, and could not be treated as a building, but was rather in the nature of a mere cover for the weighing machine. The magistrates have gone very near to finding as a fact that it was not a building. They have not found it as a matter of fact, yet they have almost expressed the opinion that it was not a building and they have found that in law it does not come within the meaning of the bye-laws. I think, as a matter of fact, we cannot hold that this erection covering the weighing machine was a building within the meaning of the Act, or within the meaning of the bye-laws. The cases that have been cited to us are, in my opinion, distinguishable from the present case. The first case, Stevens v. Gourley (ubi sup.), is a case in which the parties themselves in their contract described the building as a house, and it was considered not the less a house because, although it was originally intended to be constructed of brick, it was in fact constructed of wood, and because the foundations were not embedded in the soil. The court came to the conclusion that it was not the less a house than it otherwise would have been if it had been constructed as originally intended; and that a building does not cease to be a house because it is constructed of wood and is merely laid on the soil and not let into the soil. Therefore that case seems to me to be distinguishable from the present. In the other case of Richardson v. Brown (ubi sup.) there was a wooden structure which was in all respects a building, except that it was brought in on wheels and fitted with down spouts and gas, and the court there came to the conclusion that the mere fact that it was brought in on wheels did not prevent it being a building, because in other respects it was constructed as a building. In the case of the London County Council v. Pearce (ubi sup.) the case of the pay-box which was not capable of being used for human habitation, but which was a mere structure much like the structure in the present case, the erection was held not to be a building, and not even a wooden structure, within the meaning of the bye-laws. That is the view I come to with reference to the first case, and I hold a still stronger opinion in regard to the second, because in the first case if the structure which was used to cover the weighing machine, was not a building, certainly in the second case the structure to cover the refreshments cannot be spoken of as a building, but was a mere cover or shelter or pavilion for refreshment. That certainly cannot be spoken of as a building. I therefore think the magistrates were right in their opinion when they held that these structures were not buildings within the meaning of the bye-laws, and that there was no infringement of the bye-laws.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. I attach considerable weight in these cases to the view which the magistrates took. Whereas in Richardson v. Brown (ubi sup.) the magistrates took the view that the structure was a building, it is obvious that in these cases the magistrates strongly took the view that the structures were not buildings, and they have gone as nearly as they can to finding that they were not buildings. They have left that matter to us, but it is obvious what conclusion they came to, and from their local knowledge they would know a good deal about these things. With regard to the second case I have no difficulty at all. One might as well call a pavilion or a kiosk, a building within the meaning of the Act of Parliament, and the bye-laws, as call the structure in this case a building. With regard to Archer's case I see more difficulty, and as at present advised I agree with the contention for the appellants that an ordinary lock-up shop could be a building. It may be found that there are distinctions, and the cases must sometimes run very fine, but I think on the whole that this structure was not in that respect a lock-up shop. It certainly was a shelter for the weighing machine, and there was just room where a man could sit and possibly have his customers sit by him, where he wrote out the weights or sat while waiting for customers, but certainly there was not a place where he could move about unless he came outside. It was fitted up in that way with no accommodation for artificial heating, and there was no connection with the permanent supplies from the town, such as gas or water. I therefore come to the conclusion, although with more doubt than in the other case, that the erection in Archer's case was not a building, and I agree that both these appeals should be dismissed.

Appeals dismissed.

STOKES (app.) v. HILL (resp.). (a)

Mine—Abandonment—Notice—Limitation—Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), s. 38—Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 43), s. 4.

By the Coal Mines Regulations Act 1887, s. 38 (5), "A complaint or information of an offence under this section may be made or laid at any time within six months after abandonment of the mine or seam, or after service on the owner aforesaid of a notice to comply with the requirements of this section, whichever last happens."

By the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896, s. 4, certain requirements were to be fulfilled by the owner of the abandoned mine or seam, and these were substituted for those contained in sect. 38 of the Act of 1887.

Held, that the six months' limit applied equally to the date of the abandonment of the mine or seam, and the giving of the notice to comply with the requirements of the Act.

On the 25th Jan. 1900 the appellant, an inspector of mines, sent to the respondent a letter as follows: "I beg to point out to you that no plan of the abandoned workings in the Seven Feet Coal Seam has yet been forwarded as required by sect. 38 of the Mines Act. Will you please give the matter your early attention." This was received by the respondent on the 26th Jan.

Held, that the time limited by sect. 38 (5)—viz., six months—within which the information might be laid for a breach of sect. 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896 commenced to run from that date.

CASE stated upon an information laid on the 27th July 1900 by the appellant against the respondent charging him that, he being the owner of the Pooley Hall mine, unlawfully failed to comply with sect. 38 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887, as amended by sect. 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896, which requires him within three months after the abandonment of the Seven Feet Coal Seam in such mine to send to the Secretary of State an accurate plan of such seam, with certain particulars.

Upon the opening of the case for the prosecution the respondents' counsel took a preliminary objection that the justices had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case.

He read the following letter, which, it was admitted, had been written and been sent by post by the appellant to the respondent on the 25th Jan. 1900.

Green Hill, Derby, 25th Jan. 1900.—Gentlemen,—I beg to point out to you that no plan of the abandoned workings in the Seven Feet Coal has yet been forwarded as required by sect. 38 of the Mines Act. Will you please give the matter your earliest attention.—Yours faithfully, A. H. STOKES.—To the Pooley Hall Colliery Company.

It was admitted that the alleged abandonment of the mine was anterior to the sending or receipt of the letter, and also that no plan has been sent in by the respondent.

It was thereupon contended by the respondent's counsel that the letter constituted a notice, under sect. 38 (5) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887, to the owner to comply with the requirements of that section, and that the six months within which the information is required to be laid by that section and sub-section commenced, to run from the date of service thereof, namely, the 26th Jan. 1900; that it was not open to the appellant to extend the period of six months therefrom by giving one or more subsequent notices; and that the information having been laid on the 27th July 1900 the same was out of time, and the justices had no jurisdiction to hear the case.

The appellant's solicitor read the following letter, which, it was admitted, was written and sent by post by the appellant to the respondent on the 25th May, and was received in due course of post on the following day:

Green Hill, Derby, 25th May 1900.—Gentlemen.—Pooley Hall Colliery.—I beg to point out to you that no plan of the workings of the abandoned Seven Feet Coal Seam at this colliery has been sent as required by sect. 38 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887, and I hereby give you notice in accordance with sect. 38 (5) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 to comply with the requirements of the above-named section of the Mines Act.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, A. H. STOKES, H.M. Inspector of Mines.—The Pooley Hall Colliery Company.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the above last-mentioned notice was the only notice given in accordance with sect. 38 (5) of the Act of 1887, and that, even assuming (which was not admitted) the letter of the 25th Jan. was a sufficient notice within sect. 38 (5) of the Act of 1887, the respondent having still failed to send in the plan, the appellant was not precluded from giving the notice of the 25th May, and that the information was properly laid within six months after the service of the last-mentioned notice.

It was further contended that, assuming the letter of the 25th Jan. constituted "notice to comply" within sect. 38 (5) of the Act of 1887, the information was laid within six months after service of such notice, on the ground that the letter having been sent by post it was deemed to have been served when it was delivered on the following day, the 26th Jan. (sect. 73 of the Act of 1887), and that the 27th July was within six months after (that is, exclusive of) the 26th Jan.

The justices were of opinion that the respondent's contention was correct, on the ground that the appellant's letter of the 25th Jan. 1900 constituted in law a notice within sect. 38 (5) of the Act of 1887 to the respondent to comply with the requirements of that section, and that the statutory period of six months within which the information should be laid must be calculated from the date of service of that notice, and that the appellant was not entitled, by giving the subsequent notice of the 25th May, to extend such period, and that the information which was laid on the 27th July 1900 was therefore out of time, and they accordingly dismissed the information.

H. Sutton for the appellant.—The letter of the 25th Jan. was not such a notice as is contemplated by the Act. It was merely a reminder, and the time began to run only after the second notice of the 25th May. But here I contend that the limitation contained in sect. 38 (5) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 only applies to the abandonment of the mine or seam, and does not limit the time where a notice is given to comply with the requirements of the section. If that were not so, the words "whichever last happens" could have no meaning. The offence created by non-compliance with sect. 38 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887, as amended by sect. 4 of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1896 is a continuing one. He also referred to the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887 (50 & 51 Vict. c. 58), s. 59.

Simsy for the respondent. The justices were right in holding that the letter of the 25th Jan. was a notice within the Act, and that the limitation contained in sect. 38 (5) commenced to run from that date. The limitation applies equally to the abandonment of the mine or seam and the giving of a notice.

BRUCE, J.—I think that the justices in this case have come to a right conclusion, and that we cannot interfere with their decision. The question turns in the first instance on the construction we ought to put upon sect. 38 (5) of the Coal Mines Regulation Act 1887. I think there can be no doubt that that clause is a clause for limitations, limiting the time within which a complaint or information, if there is an offence under the Act, may be laid. Now, it is clear that it first of all limits the complaint or limits the information to a period six months after the abandonment of the mine or seam, and if counted from that period, the information I understand is too late. But there is a further provision in the same subsection: "Or after service on the owner aforesaid of a notice to comply with the requirements of this section." A question has been raised as to the meaning of the words "after service." I think that read in conjunction with the former words it means "written six months after service." The words are "A complaint or information of an offence under this section may be made or laid at any time within six months after abandonment of the mine or seam, or after service on the owner aforesaid of a notice to comply with the requirements of this section." I think the whole of the section must be read together, and regarding it as a limiting section I think it must mean six months after service on the owner aforesaid.

It is quite true that there are some difficulties of interpretation occasioned by the last words in the section "whichever last happens"; and if those words could be so construed as to favour either the one construction or the other they might afford us some guidance. But they are inconsistent with either construction, and those words afford us no guidance at all. We must regard the section independently altogether of those words, because neither counsel can give any sensible construction to them. Then we have this last question: Was there a notice given within a period of six months from the information or complaint? That depends upon whether the notice of the 25th Jan. 1900 was a good notice under the Act. I felt some doubt on this question because the notice required under the statute is a notice to comply with the requirements of this section, and the notice does not in express terms use those words. It does not require compliance with the provisions of the section, but it does refer to the section; it does call attention to the plans required by the section and finishes up by saying, "Will you please give the matter your early attention." I do not think that in a matter of this kind we ought to be too strict, and, giving the matter my best attention, I have come to the conclusion that I cannot say that the justices were wrong in coming to the conclusion that this was a notice within the meaning of the section requiring compliance with the provisions of the section. If so six months had expired before the proceedings were taken, and therefore it was too late. I have only one other word to say, and that is as to sect. 59, to which our attention has been called by Mr. Sutton. I am quite satisfied that that section does not apply to this case. The whole section, or the second part of it at any rate, applies only to the case where a person is guilty of an offence against this Act for which a penalty is not prescribed. In this case a penalty is expressly prescribed, and I think we cannot regard this section as applying here.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

Appeal dismissed.

Food and Drugs Act 1875 of selling to the prejudice of the purchaser a drug "which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded."

The appellant, a chemist, was asked to supply "mercury ointment," an article named in the British Pharmacopœia. He supplied mercury ointment which was not in accordance with the prescription in the Pharmacopœia, as the mercury was only about one-quarter strength, and he stated that the ointment supplied was a dilute preparation of mercury ointment which was generally supplied to persons asking for "mercury ointment." The purchaser asked for "mercury ointment" merely, and did not state that he required the same to be according to the directions of the Pharmacopœia.

Held, that the appellant was properly convicted under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, as, in the absence of a prescription by a medical practitioner, he ought to have sold the article according to the standard in the Pharmacopœia; and that he might probably have been also convicted under sect. 7 of selling "a compounded drug which is not composed of ingredients in accordance with the demand of the purchaser."

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the West Riding of the county of York, sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction at Skipton.

An information was laid by A. Randerson, the complainant and respondent, and an inspector of food and drugs, against Frederick Dickins of Skipton, chemist, under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63) for having at Skipton unlawfully sold to the prejudice of the complainant (the purchaser) a certain drug, namely, 2oz. of mercury ointment, which on analysis was found to be deficient in mercury and contained the parts as follows: mercury 12.5 per cent., and lard 87.5 per cent., and was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser.

The information was heard by the justices sitting at Skipton on the 20th June 1900, when the defendant was convicted of the offence and was fined in the sum of 60s. and was ordered to pay the costs.

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

On the 14th May 1900 the complainant went to premises known as "Taylor's Drug Stores" at Skipton, where the defendant, who is a duly certified chemist, was at that time employed, and asked to be supplied with 2oz. of "mercury ointment." Ointment was supplied to him by the defendant in a small wooden box, the lid of which was labelled—"Taylor's Drug Company Limited—The Ointment. Mercurial—Poison—London, Leeds, &c." The words "The Ointment" were in print, and the words "Mercurial—Poison" were in writing. He also handed to the complainant a bill in which he charged "Mercurial ointment, 4d.," which sum the complainant handed to the defendant. The complainant then informed the defendant that the ointment had been purchased by him for the purposes of analysis.

A portion of the ointment was analysed by the public analyst who certified that it contained mercury 12.5 per cent., lard and suet 87.5 per cent., and the analyst stated that "mercury ointment," according to the directions of the British Pharmacopœia contains 48.5 per cent. of mercury, and hence the medicinal activity of the sample would only be one-fourth that of an ointment prepared according to the British Pharmacopœia.

The complainant admitted that he had asked for "mercury ointment" merely, and that he did not state that he required the same to be according to the directions of the British Pharmacopœia, and that the ointment sold to him by the defendant contained the ingredients mentioned in the British Pharmacopœia for mercury ointment, but not in the proportions therein prescribed. He did not allege that the preparation was injurious to the purchaser, or that there was any imposition on the part of the defendant, but he contended that as the ointment supplied was not according to the standard of the British Pharmacopœia it was not of the "nature, substance, and quality demanded" within the meaning of the statute, and he relied upon the case of White v. Bywater (19 Q. B. Div. 582), and that "mercury ointment" was not a compounded drug within the meaning of the Act.

It was contended on behalf of the defendant that the proceedings would not lie under sect. 6 of the Act, but ought to have been commenced under sect. 7 thereof, the article in question being a compounded drug.

The justices being of opinion that the proceedings were properly brought under sect. 6, overruled this objection.

The defendant gave evidence that the ointment supplied was a dilute preparation of mercury ointment well known to, and supplied by all retail chemists and such as would be usually supplied to a person inquiring for "mercury ointment." He stated that out of hundreds of sales of that commodity which he had made he had never supplied it according to the standard of the British Pharmacopœia for human application, except when making up the prescription of a medical practitioner, for the reason that he considered the frequent use thereof by a person of a delicate constitution might probably set up mercurial poisoning from which death might ensue. Both the dilute and the standard preparation were kept in stock by the defendant's employers at the premises. The dilute preparation was known to the public by a variety of names, and it was usually asked for under the name of "blue ointment." Two other chemists of thirty-five and twenty-seven years standing respectively were called as witnesses for the defendant, and gave similar evidence as to the practice of chemists in supplying mercury ointment.

Upon this evidence it was contended on behalf of the defendant: (a) That he was not in law required to sell "mercury ointment" to a purchaser in accordance with the standard quality prescribed by the British Pharmacopœia except when specially asked by the purchaser to do so, or when making up the prescription of a medical practitioner; and that accordingly it was within the discretion of the defendant to supply the dilute preparation in all cases in which he thought fit to do so; (b) That the complainant had failed to establish that the commodity was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, as provided by the Act, or that he had been prejudiced by the sale thereof, and that therefore no offence had been committed, and he relied upon Lane v. Collins (52 L. T. Rep. 257; 14 Q. B. Div. 193).

The justices, being of opinion that the commodity sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, and that the defendant was bound to supply the commodity according to the formulary prescribed in the British Pharmacopœia, whether expressly asked to do so or not, convicted the defendant.

The questions for the opinion of the court were :

(1) Whether the defendant was in law so bound as last aforesaid, or not; (2) whether under the circumstances herein stated there was evidence upon which the justices might properly find that the commodity sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, or that he had been prejudiced by such sale; (3) whether the information was properly laid under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875; and (4) whether the conviction was good in law.

If the court should be of opinion that the conviction was legally and properly made then the conviction was to stand; otherwise it was to be reversed.

The Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63) provides:

Sect. 6. No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds; provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases; that is to say, (1) where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food or drug because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce, in a state fit for carriage or consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, weight, or measure of the food or drug, or conceal the inferior quality thereof; (3) where the food or drug is compounded as in this Act mentioned.

Sect. 7. No person shall sell any compound article of food or compounded drug which is not composed of ingredients in accordance with the demand of the purchaser under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

C. A. Russell, K.O. (J. A. Compston with him) for the appellant.—The question is whether when a chemist is asked to supply an article which is one of the numerous articles named in the British Pharmacopœia, he is bound to supply it under all circumstances according to the prescription in the British Pharmacopœia so that he commits an offence if he does not do so. Our submission is that he is not so bound; at all events for the purpose of determining whether the article is of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded, within the meaning of sect. 6, and whether the seller has committed an offence under that section. There is nothing in the Act to say so, as only general terms, such as "food" and "drug," are defined by the Act. The question under sect. 6 is always this: When a purchaser has asked for an article it has to be ascertained whether it is an article the nature, substance, and quality of which can be fixed by reference to some natural standard (such as milk), or whether it is an article the nature and quality of which is ascertainable by reason of there being some known meaning attached to the article. Neither of these considerations would apply here. As to the article itself, what the inspector asked for was "mercury ointment" simply, and no evidence was given by him to show what "mercury ointment" was. To show what it was he simply relied on the description as given in the Pharmacopœia. The British Pharmacopœia is not mentioned or referred to in the Act, so that the case is not the same as if there was to be found in the Act itself a provision that in the case of a particular drug it was to be made up according to the standard in the British Pharmacopœia. If the prescription of a medical practitioner relating to a drug named in the Pharmacopœia were taken to a chemist, then he might be bound to make up that prescription and sell that article according to the formulary in the Pharmacopœia. There is a wide range as to the meaning of "mercury ointment." It may mean one thing in a medical prescription, and a totally different thing when asked for as it was asked for in this case. The British Pharmacopœia was introduced that chemists might know what ingredients to put in when making up prescriptions. The statutes relating to it are set out in Chitty's Statutes, vol. 7 (Medical Acts). By the Medical Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 90), s. 3, the general medical council was established, and by sect. 54 they were required to publish "a book containing a list of medicines and compounds, &c. . . . to be called the British Pharmacopœia." That was its origin, and it so remained until the Pharmacy Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121); s. 15 of which Act provided that "any person who shall compound any medicines of the British Pharmacopœia except according to the formularies of the said Pharmacopœia" should be liable to a penalty. In White v. Bywater (19 Q. B. Div. 582), where the defendant was convicted, evidence was given by three witnesses to show that the article was not of the nature, &c., of the article demanded. There was no such evidence in this case. The prosecutor designedly rested his case upon the certificate of the analyst, and upon the fact that by that certificate the article was not up to the standard of the Pharmacopœia. The defendant and two chemists gave evidence that the article sold was one commonly dealt with; that it was the one usually supplied to persons asking for "mercury ointment," that, in fact, it was the "mercury ointment" of commerce and the article known in commerce and in that neighbourhood as such. That distinguishes the case from White v. Bywater (ubi sup.), where the fact was that the tincture of opium supplied was not the tincture of opium of commerce. It is a strong proposition to say that if a person asks for an article in the Pharmacopœia it cannot be supplied unless it contains the exact ingredients in the Pharmacopœia, and that the seller commits an offence if it is not so supplied. The question in each case must be this, What would an ordinary purchaser mean by the article. As to the second point that the proceedings ought to have been under sect 7 instead of sect. 6, the article was "a drug compounded as in this Act mentioned," within sub-sect. 3 of sect. 6, and therefore there was no offence under sect. 6. The offence, if any, was under sect 7:

Houghton v. Taplin, 13 Times L. Rep 386;

Beardsley v. Walton and Co., 19 Mag. Cas. 471; 82 L. T. Rep. 119; (1900) 2 Q B 1.

[K.B. Div.]

question is important, because if it be permissible when an article is mentioned in the Pharmacopœia, to supply something different from what is there prescribed, the consequences may be serious whether an article much weaker or much stronger is supplied. To avoid that inconvenience we have the British Pharmacopœia introduced as a standard with regard to the articles mentioned therein; and certainly after the Pharmacy Act of 1868 any person going into a chemist's shop to buy a drug, mentioned in the British Pharmacopœia, would be warranted in believing that the drug sold to him would be made up according to the standard of the Pharmacopœia. Sect. 15 of that Act expressly says that "any person who shall compound any medicines of the British Pharmacopœia except according to the formularies of the Pharmacopœia" commits an offence and is liable to a penalty. Any person who asks for a drug is entitled to assume, and must be taken to assume, that the drug is a lawfully compounded drug, and therefore when he goes to the vendor and asks for a specified drug the vendor ought to understand clearly what is asked for. When the inspector went to the defendant's shop and asked for mercury ointment, he must be taken to have asked for something which was lawfully compounded, and not for something which was illegally compounded; and the defendant must be taken to be asked to supply something lawfully, and not illegally, compounded. The seller cannot sell otherwise, unless he is selling either according to the British Pharmacopœia, or according to a medical prescription, or is asked for and is selling something different to what is in the Pharmacopœia. Here the defendant says he kept both articles in his shop, one according to the Pharmacopœia, and the other according to that usually sold; but the Act enjoins the exact opposite to this. Sect. 16 of the Act of 1868 reserves the right of certain persons such as apothecaries, but it does not reserve the right of chemists or druggists, so that these latter in conducting their business come within the Act. The section was evidently intended to enable medical practitioners, but not chemists, to vary the prescriptions in the Pharmacopœia. Beardsley v. Walton and Co. (ubi sup.), is a clear authority for the proposition that where a person goes to a shop and asks for an article named in the Pharmacopœia he is entitled to get it according to the standard of the Pharmacopœia, and if a different article is supplied to him, an offence is committed. White v. Bywater (ubi sup.) is to the same effect. Houghton v. Taplin (ubi sup.) is a different case. The defence there was that the "arsenical soap" asked for and sold was not a drug at all, and it was held that no offence had been committed under sect. 6, by Hawkins, J., on the ground that it was not a drug at all, and by Wright, J. on the ground that it was a compounded drug within sub-sect. 3 of sect. 6. The intention of the Pharmacy Act was to compel everybody to conform to the Pharmacopœia in compounding drugs. After that Act everybody asking for a drug named in the Pharmacopœia would be entitled to suppose that he was getting something compounded according to the Pharmacopœia; and in the case of articles named in the Pharmacopœia if something different from the Pharmacopœia is asked for, the seller ought not to sell it without having the prescription of a medical practitioner; that is, he commits an offence if, without a proper prescription, he sells articles mentioned in the Pharmacopœia but compounded differently, and that is the present case.

Cur. adv. vult.

Jan. 29.—The judgment of the court (Bruce and Phillimore, JJ.) was read by

PHILLIMORE, J.—We think that this conviction must stand. The appellant professed to sell mercurial or mercury ointment. Mercury ointment is a drug in the British Pharmacopœia, known by that name and having a certain fixed ratio of mercury to unguent. The appellant was asked for mercury ointment, and should have sold the drug in the Pharmacopœia, or, if he was going to do what he in fact did—namely, sell an ointment in which the mercury was about one-quarter strength—he should, if he may lawfully sell such a drug (see sect. 15 of the Pharmacy Act 1868), have explained that he was selling a weaker or diluted drug, and have so named it. He acted under no sordid motive, but none the less was he in the habit of selling to his customers something which was not of the nature, substance, and quality which they must be taken to have demanded and which certainly the purchaser in this case demanded. It is said that the appellant sold the mercury ointment of commerce, and that for commercial purposes there is a standard different from that of the Pharmacopœia. Having regard to sect. 15 of the Pharmacy Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 121), that is unlikely, though perhaps possible. But he failed altogether to prove that there was any commercial standard for this article different from that of the Pharmacopœia. He did not even attempt to prove it. What he attempted to prove was that there were two commercial standards of wide difference, a thing in itself unreasonable, while he stated that he kept both standards in his shop, and sold according to one standard or the other according as the customer brought or did not bring a prescription from a medical man. He might almost as well have kept two weights and two measures. The mischief of such a practice was pointed out in the argument. If there be any danger on the other side, it would be avoided by the simple expedient of having (if he lawfully may) two drugs, calling them as in fact they are, the strong one "mercury ointment," and the weak one "dilute mercury ointment," and recommending the latter to any customer whom he might think unskilled and likely to use the proper drug in a dangerous manner. The cases of White v. Bywater (ubi sup.) and Beardsley v. Walton (ubi sup.) almost if not quite, conclude the matter. But without them we should have arrived at the same result upon the construction of sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63). They establish, and we should have thought without their assistance, that if a drug is to be found in the Pharmacopœia and is asked for, this drug must be supplied, and that if it is not sold with the ingredients and in the proportions prescribed by the Pharmacopœia there is at least prima facie evidence that what is sold is not of the nature, substance, and quality which was demanded. It was argued that, as the drug in question was a compounded drug, proceedings ought not to have been taken under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, but under sect. 7; and for this purpose some observations of Wright, J. in Houghton v. Taplin (ubi sup.) were invoked. We think that those observations have been misunderstood. In any case it is quite clear from the definition clause that a compounded drug is none the less a drug, which shows that proceedings can be taken under sect. 6, though it may be that in the case of a compounded drug they can also be taken under sect. 7. We wish to add a few words with reference to the exception contained in sub-sect. 3 of sect. 6. We entertain no doubt that the appellant sold to the prejudice of the purchaser a drug which was not of the quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, and so contravened the provisions of the earlier part of sect. 6. But the difficulty we have felt arises from the provision that an offence shall not be deemed to have been committed under that section where the drug is compounded as in the Act mentioned. It was argued by counsel for the appellant that because the article in question was a compounded drug the sale of it fell within the exception in sub-sect. 3 of sect. 6, and constituted an offence, not under sect. 6, but only under sect. 7. We think it probably did constitute an offence under sect. 7, but we think it did also constitute an offence under sect. 6. The offence in sub-sect. 3 of sect. 6 does not apply to all compounded drugs, but only to drugs compounded as in the Act mentioned. It is very difficult to understand the meaning of the words "as in this Act mentioned." We find no provisions in the Act to which the words can apply. But it seems to us that it is impossible to reject the words. We cannot read the exception in sub-sect. 3 as if it were not qualified by the concluding words. But, although it is difficult to say what is the exact meaning of the words, this, we think, is clear—that no possible meaning that can be given to the words can apply to the ointment in the present case. It was certainly not compounded as in the Act mentioned. The sale of it, therefore, does not fall within the exception.

Conviction affirmed.

PEARL ASSURANCE COMPANY v. SCOTTISH LEGAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY. (a)

Industrial assurance—Transfer of person insured from one company to another—Notice of transfer—Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 26), ss. 4 (2), 14 (1).

By sect. 4 (1) of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Act 1896 it is provided that a person insured with a collecting society or industrial assurance company shall not, except in certain cases, become or be insured with any other society or company without his written consent. By sect. 4 (2): "The society or company to which . . . the person is sought to be transferred shall within seven days from his application for admission to that society or company give notice thereof in writing to the society or company from which he is sought to be transferred." By sect. 14 (1): "It shall be an offence under this Act if . . . (c) a collecting society or industrial assurance company to which a . . . person is sought to be transferred fails to give such notice as is by this Act required." B. was insured in P. Company, which was an industrial assurance company within the Act. J. induced B. to agree to transfer to the S. Assurance Society and in exchange for his policy in the P. Company gave B. a policy in the S. society. The S. Society gave the P. Company no notice of the transaction, and B's policy in the P. Company was still subsisting, and the P. Company admitted their intention of continuing it as long as possible. The P. Company laid an information against the S. Society for a breach of sect. 4 (2) of the above Act. The magistrates dismissed it on the ground that as the policy in the P. Company was still subsisting there was no transfer of B. from the P. Company within the Act.

Held, that, as a matter of fact B. had become a member of the S. Society and would cease to be a member of the P. Company as soon as the period covered by his past payments had elapsed, and that therefore he was a person "sought to be transferred" from the P. Company to the S. Society within the Act.

THIS was a case stated by an alderman of the city of London raising a question under the Industrial Assurance Companies Act of 1896.

An information was preferred before a court of summary jurisdiction at the Mansion House by the Pearl Life Assurance Company against the Scottish Legal Assurance Society for that that society in the city of London being a collecting society within the meaning of sect. 4 of 59 & 60 Vict. c. 26, did not within seven days from the application, dated the 13th June, of one William Perkins, a person insured with the Pearl Life Assurance Company, for admission to the Scottish Legal Assurance Society, give notice in writing of such application to the Pearl Life Assurance Company from which Perkins was sought to be transferred contrary to sect. 4 (2) and 14 (1) of 59 & 60 Vict. c. 26, and that the default had continued up to the date of the issue of the summons. There was a second information alleging against the Scottish Legal Assurance Society a similar offence in respect of Rebecca Perkins, the wife of William Perkins. The alderman, after hearing the parties, dismissed the information.

Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 26):

Sect. 4.—(1) A member of or person insured with a collecting society or industrial assurance company shall not . . . become or be made a member of or be insured with any other such society or company without his written consent, or in the case of an infant without the consent of his father or other guardian. (2) The society or company to which the member or person is sought to be transferred shall, within seven days from his application for admission give notice thereof in writing to the society or company from which he is sought to be transferred.

K.B. Div.] PEARL ASSURANCE CO. v. SCOTTISH LEGAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY. [K.B. Div.]

Sect. 14.—(1) It shall be an offence under this Act if . . . (c) a collecting society or industrial assurance company to which a member or person is sought to be transferred fails to give such notice as is by this Act required.

The facts as found in the special case were as follows:—

The Pearl Life Assurance Company (hereinafter called the appellant company) was an industrial assurance company, and the Scottish Legal Life Assurance Society (hereinafter called the respondent society) was a collecting society within the meaning of sect. 1 of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Assurance Companies Act 1896, and were duly registered under the Friendly Societies Acts.

The man William Perkins stated that he and his wife, the said Rebecca Perkins, had been insured in the office of the appellant company about two years, and that a collector named Jones, whom he had known as a collector for the appellant company had in or about the month of June 1900, asked him to transfer to the respondent society. He assented to this and signed a proposal form in the respondent society, and gave up to the collector Jones his books and policies in the appellant company, and received in lieu thereof the policies in the respondent society which he produced before the alderman. At the time this transaction took place collector Jones had left the appellant company, and was a collector of the respondent society.

The applications of William Perkins and Rebecca his wife for insurance in the respondent society, dated the 20th June 1900, were produced at the hearing. The policies issued by the respondent society were in different form to the policies issued by the appellant company.

A witness for the appellant company, named Herbert Pilbeam, stated that when he was conversing with William Perkins, at Perkins' house, the assistant superintendent of the respondent society accompanied by the society's collector, Jones, came in and stated to the witness that Perkins' insurances had been transferred to the respondent society.

No notice was given by the respondent society to the appellant company within the meaning of sect. 4 (2) of the Collecting Societies and Industrial Insurance Companies Act 1896, either within or at any time subsequent to the period prescribed by that sub-section.

The two policies on the lives of Mr. and Mrs. Perkins in the appellant company were in existence on the day when the said informations were heard by the court below. The company further admitted that it was not their wish or intention to cancel Mr. or Mrs. Perkins' policies, and that they were desirous under the circumstances of keeping them alive.

The alderman was of opinion on these facts that no actual transference had taken place at the date of the alleged offence, and that sect. 4 (2) did not apply as, the policies in the appellant company and those in the respondent society being admittedly co-existent, there could be no legal "transfer" or "seeking to transfer" within the meaning of sect. 4 (2).

Avory, K.C. (Bousell with him) for the appellant company.—Sect. 1 of the Act should be looked at to see the scope of it. That shows that it is intended to apply only to insurance companies whose dealings are with the poor, and therefore with a class more or less uneducated. That circumstance indicates that the provisions of sect. 4 are precautionary in their nature—to prevent I submit the collectors making a trade in transferring the persons insured in one company to another, according as their own personal interests require. As a matter of fact the persons insured in these societies insure practically with the collector and not with the company, and when the collector leaves or is dismissed by one company and becomes collector for another he usually can induce the persons who were insured by him in his late company to transfer to his new one. In this very case we had to get an injunction to restrain Jones from soliciting persons insured with us to join the respondent society. And I submit the object of sect. 4 is to take care as far as possible that the insured shall know what he is doing when he is transferred by making his written consent necessary, and by making the transferee company give notice to the transferor company of the transfer. Of course this last provision is also for the protection of the transferor company against the proceedings of dismissed servants. Both purposes are served by giving the transferor company notice—the company is enabled to ascertain what its agents or former agents are doing, and at the same time it is enabled to make the member transferred aware of the nature of the transaction to which he has consented, and so to prevent his being induced to transfer by misrepresentation or fraud. This seems clear from the language of the section. The section refers to the transfer not of the policy as the magistrate seems to think, but of the member himself. Its object is to prevent the member being transferred at the will of the collector without himself or the company in which he was insured being aware of it. A legal transfer of the policy is not necessary to create an offence under the section.

Cohen, K.C. (J. B. Mathews with him).—I submit that the object of this action or of sub-sect. (2) at any rate, was not to protect the insurance company against the former collectors but to facilitate the work of different companies. It often happens that two or more companies have members in the same district. One of these finds it unprofitable to keep a collector there on account of the small number of its members. Therefore it agrees to transfer them to another company. In order to enable it to know with certainty who have and who have not agreed to be transferred the transferee company is bound to give notice to it of each member transferred. I submit this must be the object of the provision since a member can be transferred from one company either by operation of law, of which there is no question here, or by consent of both the companies and the persons transferred. On the facts stated in the case there is neither a transfer of the member nor a transfer of the policy. The member is not transferred because the appellant company has not agreed to the transfer, and the policy is not transferred since the original policy still exists. In fact, so far as it from the new policy being the old one transferred, that its terms are quite different from those of the old one.

Avory, K.C. was not heard in reply.

K.B. Div.] PEARL ASSURANCE CO. v. SCOTTISH LEGAL LIFE ASSURANCE SOCIETY. [K.B. Div.]

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that in this case the magistrate has come to an erroneous conclusion. The Act of Parliament is certainly not artificially drawn, but I do not desire to use disrespectful language concerning it on that ground, because I think it is exceedingly likely that the phraseology used is that which is perfectly well understood among the class of people to whom it refers, and the transfer of a member from society A to society B is a phrase which would be perfectly intelligible to them. I think it is very likely indeed to be the case that the language is, from any point of view, popular rather than artificial. It seems to me quite abundantly plain what it does mean. Everybody knows that among the poor people who are insured by these societies there is a vast amount of touting for the insurances by the agents, and that all sorts of frauds are very often committed on poor people by reason of the temptation offered to the agents to make money per fas or nefas, and it is not too much to say that they are a class that rather want watching, and I think this section is intended to put some check on their proceedings. The first check is that if a member of one society proposes or is persuaded to drop his insurance with that society or go over to another there should be evidence that he intended to do it at all events by requiring that his written consent should be produced or should be capable of production. That puts some sort of a check on it. It prevents people at all events from making such entries as are necessary to effect what is called a transfer without some sort of evidence that the man knows what is being done. But then comes the second sub-section, and it does not seem to me to be really capable of much doubt as to what it means. "The society or company to which the member or person is sought to be transferred" (it is not to which he is transferred, but to which he is sought to be transferred) "shall, within seven days from his application for admission to that society or company, give notice thereof in writing to the society or company from which he is sought to be transferred." When he makes his fresh insurance, if it dates from a time which is still covered by the first insurance the result may be that there will be two policies concurrent for a certain time. I should think probably that would give rise to some difficulty of a different nature; probably somehow or other he would be required to state whether he was insured with any other society or not. But it may very well be that for a few weeks, or a few months, he is doubly insured; and certainly I should think from what I have seen as a judge (I have not seen so much of it as my learned brother has, but I have tried some cases in criminal courts in the north of England which have made me pretty familiar with the proceedings of these collecting agents) it is very likely that an agent will himself pay a small premium for a few weeks or whatever may be necessary, in order to secure the man. But whether there is a concurrent policy or concurrent insurance by another society or not, as soon as he pays his first premium there is an insurance with the second society. Nobody who knows anything about these people will suppose he really means to be permanently insured twice over, and the natural course of events would be that as soon as the current year in company A comes to an end he will drop his connection with the insurance company A, and he will be insured only in company B; and in that sense he is transferred from company A to company B. And the Act of Parliament says in language which I cannot help thinking would among these people be perfectly well understood, and is probably better in that respect than more formal language, that any attempt to effect that transfer should be communicated to the other society from which he is sought to be transferred. I do not suppose there was any passionate desire on the part of the Legislature particularly to protect the first company, but I think the intention was to put a check upon this touting. It was a very mischievous process, of course, and I think the intention was to make it less operative than it otherwise would be, and therefore to discourage it, and that seems to me to be the principle and the motive which underlie the legislation which we have to deal with. And, if I am right in my construction of sect. 4, then cadet quæstio, because it is clear that this offence has been committed. Being of opinion that I ought to adopt that particular construction of sect 4 (2), I have come to the conclusion that this appeal must be allowed, and that the judgment must be altered.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I am of the same opinion. The clause is a strange one, and strangely expressed. But I think with the knowledge we possess of this class of business, these agents, these companies, and these insurances, we can see what was attempted to be driven at. I agree with the contention made on behalf of the respondent before the alderman, and made by Mr. Cohen to-day, that at least one object of the 1st sub-section may have been to protect a man from being transferred by a company to another company without his consent, and I think it is quite possible that such cases might happen but for this provision. But the words are wide enough, and under them we must hold he is not to be transferred by a company to a company, or by a collector from one company to another company without his consent. Then, with regard to the 2nd sub-section, I differ a little from my learned brother in this respect, that I rather doubt whether it was intended for the protection of the assured, and I rather agree with the alderman that it is difficult to see what it was intended for. I incline to think it was intended as a protection for a company against its servants and agents. I do not think it was intended so much for the prevention of touting; but I think it was to prevent that which I know does happen, and I think on this occasion has happened. A collector quarrels with his society. He has got all the good-will of the connection; he knows all the people insured, and all these know him, and he revenges himself on the society by going over to another society. Without saying in the least that it has happened in this case, it does often happen that the cause of the quarrel is some act of dishonesty or malpractice on the part of the collector. Now, the difficulty in such a case is as to dismissing him, since he is usually able to take away all the clients he has collected. It seems to me it is more likely that it was with a mind to prevent this that sub-sect. 2 was drawn. However that may be, there are the words, and when once we get to the understanding on which this section is based, which is that a member is in practice treated as a bale of goods, and passed from hand to hand as it seems to me he is, there is no difficulty in construing the words of this section.

WILLS, J.—I only wish to add that I do not differ from anything my learned brother has said. He has seen more of the working of these societies than I have, and it is very likely that his view of this section is more correct than mine. I do not wish to differ from him. I only want to point out that for one reason or another the Legislature has thought it desirable that the first society which is affected by this transaction shall have notice of what is going on.

ANDREWS (app.) v. WITTS AND HOLLY (resps.). (a)

Water—Supply for certain purposes—Use for other purposes—Agreement between water company and district council—Waterworks Clauses Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 93), s. 18.

By an agreement made between the T. District Council and the W. G. Water Company, the company covenanted to supply water sufficient for purposes of domestic use and the washing of carts, as well as in the case of fire, but not for street watering or sewer flushing purposes.

The respondents were ratepayers of T., and used the water for trade purposes.

Held, that they had been guilty of an offence within sect. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1863.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the appellant, the secretary and manager of the West Gloucestershire Water Company, against the respondents, charging them with having used water for purposes other than those for which they or either of them were entitled to use the same—namely, for trade purposes, contrary to the provisions of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1863.

By an agreement, dated the 16th Sept. 1898 and made between the Thornbury Rural District Council and their assigns of the one part and the West Gloucestershire Water Company of the other part, certain mains, stand pipes, &c., the property of the district council in Thornbury, were demised by the council to the water company for thirty years at a nominal rental of 1s. a year, and, in consideration of such demise and of a rental of 30l. per year and of certain covenants contained in the agreement the water company, covenanted to supply the stand pipes with water sufficient for purposes of domestic use and the washing of carts, as well as in the case of fire, but not for street watering or sewer flushing purposes; the district council covenanted on their part (inter alia) that they would, to the utmost of their power, assist the company to prevent the waste or misuse of the water of the company by means of the stand pipes.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The water was supplied to the stand pipes in accordance with the agreement.

The respondents were both ratepayers of Thornbury and pay the rates imposed and authorised by the district council.

On the 16th July 1900 the respondent Holly was seen by the appellant to fill a cask with water from one of the stand pipes in Thornbury and take it to the premises of the respondent Witta, who is a baker carrying on business in Thornbury. The premises to which the water was taken were used as a bakery. It was admitted by Witta to the appellant that he had used water for baking purposes and said that he should continue to do so.

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that they were not the proper persons to be proceeded against if an offence had been committed, and that the respondents paid the district council for the water, and had the water from the council and did not pay, and had no agreement with the water company, nor did they get the water from the company.

It was, on the other hand, contended on behalf of the appellant that the water in this case had been drawn for an improper purpose and not authorised by the agreement; and that, therefore, the water so drawn and used by the respondents still remained the property of the water company, and that the property in it had never passed either to the district council or to the respondents; and that, therefore, the respondents were misusing the water belonging to the company.

It was also contended that the district council had made the agreement for and on behalf of the ratepayers of Thornbury, who were really the principals in the agreement and who really paid through the agency of the district council for the water supplied through the stand-pipes by the water company.

The justices, however, were of opinion that the respondents were not persons who had from the company a supply of water for other than domestic purposes as charged in the information, and they accordingly dismissed the charge.

By the Waterworks Clauses Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 93):

Sect. 18. If any person, first, not having from the undertakers a supply of water for other than domestic purposes, uses, for other than domestic purposes any water supplied to him by the undertakers; or secondly, having from the undertakers a supply of water for any other than domestic purposes, uses, for any purposes other than those for which he is entitled to use the same, any water supplied to him by the undertakers, he shall for every such offence be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings, without prejudice to the right of the undertakers to recover from him the value of the water misused.

Duke, K.O. (Metcalf with him) for the appellant.—The question in this case depends upon the construction of sect. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1863 (26 & 27 Vict. c. 93). Was this a supply from the water company that was being misused? The offence is defined in the second part of sect. 18, and the undertakers are the water company. North, J. in West Surrey Water Company v. Guardians of Chertsey Union (71 L. T. Rep. 368; (1894) 3 Ch. 513), said: "What is 'supply'? 'Supply' I understand to mean the passing of water from persons who have it to persons who want it." The power of the Thornbury Rural District Council to make the agreement is to be found in the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55).

The respondents did not appear.

WILLS, J.—The case is clear. At first I could not see why the first part of sect. 18 of the Waterworks Clauses Act 1863 did not apply. But under the second part of that section the respondents are persons who have a supply of water from the undertakers. The water came from nowhere else but the water company. They, the respondents, used it for other purposes than those for which they were entitled to use it.

CHANNELL, J.—I think the justices were puzzled by the words "from the undertakers," but sect. 18 is directed against persons who rightfully get water for one purpose and use it for another.

Appeal allowed and case remitted to the justices.

MAYOR, &C., OF SOUTH SHIELDS (apps.) v. WILSON BROTHERS (resps.). (a) Local government—Buildings—Bye-laws—Wooden structure—Stable—"New building"—Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98), s. 34.

Under the powers given by sect. 34 of the Local Government Act 1858 a local board made a bye-law that every person intending to erect any "new building" should give fourteen days' notice to the local board of such intention, and should at the same time deliver detail plans and sections of the proposed new building:

Held, that a wooden structure, being under 20ft. each way and with a slanting roof of 12ft. high, intended for a stable and erected in the centre of inclosed private ground of nearly an acre in extent, was a "new building" within the meaning of this bye-law.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the borough of South Shields in pursuance of a rule granted by the High Court directing the justices to state a case.

The complaint was made on behalf of the appellants (the corporation of South Shields) against Wilson Brothers (the respondents) for that they within the last four months did unlawfully erect a new building in the county borough of South Shields without having first given fourteen days' notice to the corporation of the borough by a writing delivered to the surveyor or left at his office, and without having delivered to the surveyor plans thereof, contrary to the bye-laws.

The following facts were proved or admitted:—

The defendants were owners of a piece of ground of nearly an acre in extent, situate in Headhead-street. It was boarded on every side, and was occupied in part by a veterinary surgeon who has an office, a stable, and some other wooden erections for his business. The defendants also occupy other part of the ground as a builder's yard, and near the centre of the ground the defendants have an open shed; against this shed the defendants put up the wooden structure complained of. It was of no great size, being under 20ft. each way and, at the apex of a slanting roof, only 12ft. high. The public had no access to it, and it was to all intents and purposes on the inclosed private ground of the defendants and intended for a stable.

On the part of the complainants it was contended that this wooden erection required plans to have been delivered to and approved by the corporation before commencing to build the stable, and this the defendants had not done, nor proceeded according to the bye-laws.

On the part of the defendants it was contended that it had never been the custom to require any plans for wooden built stables to be submitted to them, or in any way to have their approval, neither had this bye-law been insisted upon previously as being applicable to such a case as the present, and, in addition, that the bye-law did not apply to such a case as the present.

The justices adjourned the hearing, and surveyed the erection and its surroundings, and having carefully perused the bye-law, they came to the determination that the bye-law did not apply to a stable built of wood upon inclosed ground such as in the present case; and that, in their opinion, a building to be a building within that bye-law should answer to the description of an edifice having some approach to architectural design and structurally fit and intended for use and occupation by humanity in a civilised form.

They therefore decided (after due consideration and after inspection) that as a matter of fact it was not a building, and did not come within the bye-law, and they added that in their opinion no question of law arose upon the complaint.

If the court should be of opinion that their decision or order dismissing the complaint was right and proper, then the order was to stand; otherwise the complaint was to be sent back to them to be dealt with.

Bye-laws as to new streets, buildings, &c., for the borough of South Shields:

No. 6. Plans, &c.—Previous to building every person who shall intend to erect any new building shall give fourteen days' notice to the local board of such intention, by writing, delivered to the surveyor of the local board or left at his office, and shall at the same time deliver to such surveyor or leave at his office, detailed plans and sections, drawn in ink on drawing paper, tracing cloth, or mounted tracing paper on a scale of one-eighth or a quarter of an inch to every foot, of every floor of such intended new building, showing the thickness of the walls, the dimensions of the rooms, the situations of the fireplaces, stoves, chimneys, and flues, and generally the position, form, and dimensions of the several parts of such building, and of the water-closet, privy, gully, and drain, ashpit, coal-house, and all other buildings and appurtenances connected therewith; and such plans and sections shall be accompanied by a description of the materials of the building, the mode in which it is proposed to be constructed and the number of the site on estate plan it is intended to occupy. . . . Any person who shall erect any new building without giving such notice and delivering such plans and sections as aforesaid, or without having the said plans and sections approved of by the local board, or in anywise contrary to plans and sections which have been approved of by the local board, shall be liable for each offence to a penalty of forty shillings.

No 9. Materials for external walls:—

The external and party, or side and divisional walls of every new building shall be constructed, of brick, stone, or other hard and incombustible material. Any person offending against this bye-law shall be liable for for each offence to a penalty of forty shillings.

These bye-laws were made under sect. 34 of the Local Government Act 1858 (21 & 22 Vict. c. 98)—now repealed by sect. 343 of the Public Health Act 1875—which provided that Every local board may make bye-laws with respect to the following matters: (that is to say) . . . (2) With respect to the structure of walls of new buildings for securing stability and the prevention of fires.

B. V. Banks for the appellants.—The question is whether this wooden stable is or is not a new building within the meaning of this bye-law. The justices came to the conclusion that a stable built of wood was not a "building." Two points are raised here: First, is this a "building" within the meaning of the bye-law (No. 6), and secondly, is there any question of law raised for this court to determine. When the justices give their opinion and say that this as a matter of fact was not a building, that does not bind this court as a matter of fact; it is a mere inference from the fact, and does not bind this court, as the question is one of law. In Stevens v. Gourley (1 L. T. Rep 33) a wooden shop, very similar to the wooden stable in this case, was held to be a "building" within the Metropolitan Building Act 1855. As Byles, J. says in that case, the meaning of the word "building" must be decided by that which is its ordinary acceptation, and he says that an edifice built of wood, a house or a stable, or a coachhouse, are evidently buildings. In the recent case of Mayor of Southend-on-Sea v. Archer (ante, p. 129) a wooden shed erected as a cover for a weighing-machine was held not to be a "building"; but that was a temporary erection, whereas this structure is a permanent stable. In Hobbs v. Dance (29 L. T. Rep. 687; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 30) a wooden stable was held to be a "new building" within a bye-law made by a local board under the same Act of Parliament as the bye-law in this case. The justices in this case came to the conclusion that practically no wooden stable of this kind could be a "building," because there was an absence of architectural design. They were clearly wrong in that view and in the way they looked at the case, which is one of considerable importance to town councils, because these bye-laws were framed to prevent the risk of fire. [WILLS, J. referred to bye-law No. 9.] Although the justices say that they held as a matter of fact that the structure was not a building, yet that question is properly raised as a question of law for the opinion of the court (Hobbs v. Dance, ubi sup.), and the case ought to be sent back to the justices to be dealt with.

The respondent did not appear.

WILLS, J.—I think that this structure was a new building within the meaning of the bye-law. There is not much to be said on the question. It is clearly a "new building" within bye-law 9, which provides that "the external and party, or side and divisional walls of every new building shall be constructed of brick, stone, or other hard and incombustible material." That is a very strong reason for thinking that bye-law 6 also was intended to apply to such a building. The difficulty in the construction of the bye-law is caused by the use in it of terms which are properly applicable to dwelling-houses only. These words, however, ought to be read as if they were qualified by the words "if any." I think that the justices came to a wrong conclusion, and that this appeal ought to succeed.

CHANNELL, J.—I agree.

Appeal allowed. Case remitted to the justices.

HULL v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a)

Metropolis — Building — Projection from — Continuing offence — London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccciii.), ss. 73 (8), 200 (3) (c) — Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11.

By sect. 73 (8) of the London Building Act 1894 it is enacted that "Except in so far as is permitted by this section in the case of shop fronts and projecting windows, and with the exception of water pipes and their appurtenances, copings, string-courses, cornices, fascias, window dressings, and other like architectural decorations, no projection from any building shall extend beyond the general line of buildings in the street except with the permission of the council after consulting the local authority."

Held, that by "projection from any buildings" was here meant only a projection which was itself structurally part of the building itself, and not a projection which was subsequently attached to the windows or front wall of the completed building.

Held, further, that the offence arising under this sub-section and sect. 200 (3) was not a continuing offence, and that the offence was complete when the projection was erected, and an information laid more than six months after such erection was bad under sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848.

THIS was an appeal, by case stated, from the decision of the metropolitan magistrate sitting at Clerkenwell convicting the appellant upon an information preferred by Mr. Thomas Chilvers, on behalf of the respondents, charging the appellant with unlawfully extending a projection at No. 209, Seven Sisters-road, Islington, beyond the general line of buildings of Seven Sisters-road and Campbell-road, Islington, without the permission of the council, contrary to sect. 73 (8) of the London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccciii.).

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved:—

No. 209, Seven Sisters-road is at the corner of Seven Sisters-road and Campbell-road, Islington. By an agreement in writing made on the 9th June 1899, the appellant let to Mr. H. S. Benson, an advertiser's agent, a position covering the first floor window at the corner of the premises for the purpose of erecting thereon an electric or other advertising sign. The tenancy was to commence as soon as the sign was let, and in any case not later than the 24th June 1899, and was to be for the term of one year, with the option of renewal for a period of not less than two years at a yearly rental of 20*l*.

This agreement was entered into by Mr. Benson on behalf of his clients, Messrs. Frederick King and Co. Limited, whose registered office is in London. They were the proprietors of an article known as Edwards' Desiccated Soup, which was the subject-matter of the advertisement.

Between the 13th and 20th June 1899 the Electric Sign and General Advertising Company Limited put up for Messrs. Frederick King and Co. Limited an electric advertisement sign over the front of the appellant's premises in the position mentioned in the agreement. The sign was commenced to be put up on the 13th June 1899, and was completely affixed to the external wall of the premises on the 20th June 1899. It consisted of a wooden case with a glass front, the case being attached to the external wall of the premises by iron brackets, a space of 6in. intervening between the back of the case and the wall, and a portion of the apparatus working the sign being within the room on the first floor. The sign measured 10ft. 6in. in height by 7ft. in breadth, and when lighted by electricity showed an advertisement of Edwards' Desiccated Soup. The sign was placed immediately over the cornice of the shop front and, including the iron brackets, projected only 16in. beyond the external wall of the premises. The cornice of the shop front, which was below the sign, projected 20in. beyond the external wall of the premises, so that the sign projected 4in. less than the existing projection of the cornice. The sign did not project over the highway.

On the 16th March 1900 a notice was served on the appellant requiring him to comply with the law.

The information, which was preferred on the 17th May 1900, charged that the offence was committed on or about the 19th Dec. 1899, the date on which it was brought to the attention of the council.

On the 2nd June 1900 the superintending architect of metropolitan buildings gave his certificate defining the general line of buildings of the premises as being the main fronts of the buildings on the eastern side of Campbell-road and on the northern side of Seven Sisters-road respectively.

On the part of the appellant it was contended, firstly, that the information was invalid inasmuch as it was not laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter arose, as required by sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43); inasmuch as the offence, if any, was complete and the matter of the information arose on the 20th June 1899, the date on which the sign was completely affixed to the premises; and the alleged offence was not a continuing offence and was wrongly stated in the information to have been committed on or about the 19th Dec. 1899; secondly, that the sign was not a projection within the meaning of sect. 73 (8) of the London Building Act 1894, inasmuch as the sign did not extend beyond the existing projection of the shop cornice and did not extend over the highway; and, thirdly, that the appellant was not liable or a proper defendant to the information, inasmuch as by the agreement he had demised the part of the premises on which the sign was affixed, and had no power to control or alter the position of the sign without trespassing on the property of his tenant or to remedy the alleged breach of the section.

On behalf of the council it was contended that the offence was a continuing offence, that the sign was a projection, and that the appellant was liable notwithstanding the agreement.

The learned magistrate found as a fact that the sign did project beyond the general line of buildings in the street as defined by the superintending architect, and held that the offence was a continuing offence.

The questions for the opinion of the court were:

(1) Whether the prosecution of the alleged offence was barred under sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 by lapse of time; (2) whether the sign constituted a projection within the meaning of sect. 73 (8) of the London Building Act 1894; (3) whether the appellant could, having regard to the agreement, under the circumstances be properly convicted of the alleged offence.

London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxliii.):

Sect. 22.—(1) No building or structure shall, without the consent in writing of the council be erected beyond the general line of buildings in any street or part of a street, place, or row of houses in which the same is situate, in case the distance of such line of buildings from the highway does not exceed fifty feet or within fifty feet of the highway when the distance of the line of buildings therefrom amounts to or exceeds fifty feet, notwithstanding there being gardens or vacant spaces between the line of buildings and the highway.

Sect. 73, which comes into Part VI. of the Act, which is entitled "Construction of Buildings," begins by enacting that the following provisions shall (except with the consent of the council) apply to projections from buildings. The first sub-section deals with the material of which copings, cornices, balconies, &c., shall be composed; the second, with the mode in which balconies, cornices, and other projections shall be tailed into the wall; the third, with the distance shop fronts may project; the fourth, with the height of shop fronts; the fifth, with the mode of building and extent of projection of bay windows; the sixth, with the extent of projection of oriel windows and turrets; and the seventh, with the erection of gutters round balconies, verandahs, shop fronts, and other similar projections or projecting windows to prevent drip into the public road. Sub-sect. 8 then enacts:

Except in so far as is permitted by this section in the case of shop fronts and projecting windows, and with the exception of water-pipes and their appurtenances, copings, string course, cornices, facias, window dressings, and other like architectural decorations, no projection from any building shall extend beyond the general line of buildings in any street, except with the permission of the council after consulting the local authority.

Sect. 200. Subject to the provisions of this Act every person who does any of the things specified in this section shall be deemed to have committed an offence against this Act, and shall be liable upon conviction in a summary manner to a penalty not exceeding the amount hereafter specified in connection with such an offence, and to a further penalty not exceeding the amount hereafter stated as the daily penalty in connection with such offence for every day on which the offence is continued after such conviction (that is to say) . . . (3) Every person who (c) fails to comply with any of the provisions of part 6 of this Act . . . shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds.

a day during every day of the continuance of the non-compliance with the order of the court in reference to the matters aforesaid.

Macmorran, K.C. (G. H. B. Kenrick with him).—Of the grounds on which the appeal is based the second is the most important, and I will deal with it first. I submit that sect. 73 (8) does not refer to such a projection as this. The section occurs in the part of the Act dealing with the construction of buildings. The projection here has nothing to do with the construction of the building. I contend that sect. 73 (8) applies only to projecting parts of the building such as the shop fronts, projecting windows, and water-pipes referred to in it. Projections such as this which form no part of the structure of the building are dealt with in other Acts. Thus by sect. 119 of the Metropolitan Management Act 1855 projections causing annoyance to passengers are dealt with, and by sect. 164 (1) of this Building Act the council have power to make bye-laws regulating lamps, signs, or other structures overhanging the public way. [PHILLIMORE, J. referred to Fortescue v. Bethnal Green (Vestry of St. Matthew) (65 L. T. Rep. 256; (1891) 2 Q. B. 170).] The second ground is technical. We submit the information is barred under sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act as not having been laid until more than six months after the offence. The offence (if any) was complete on the 30th June 1899, the information was not preferred till May 1900. It will no doubt be contended that the offence is a continuing offence. But that point is concluded in our favour by London County Council v. Cross (66 L. T. Rep. 731). The effect of that decision is that where anything is forbidden by a statute the offence is complete when the thing forbidden is done. To make the neglect to undo the thing done a continuing offence, the statute must expressly direct that:

Marshall v. Smith, 28 L. T. Rep. 538; L. Rep. 8 C. P. 416.

Even if it is a continuing offence we are not liable since it is not we who continue it. Our part in the transaction ceased with the lease. Now, we cannot legally interfere with what the lessee does. To do so would be to commit a trespass. Therefore we are not continuing the offence, even though we were parties to the original committal of it:

Welsh v. West Ham Corporation, 19 Mag. Cas. 482; 82 L. T. Rep. 262; (1900) 1 Q. B. 324;

Metropolitan Board of Works v. Antony, 54 L. J. 39, M. C.

Avory, K.C.—As to the question whether or not this is a projection within sect. 73 of the Act, I submit that sects. 22 and 73 should be read together. If projection in sect. 73 means only a projection which is part of the structure of the house, then everything that comes within sect. 73 comes within sect. 22, and the former enactment is futile. I submit that the more reasonable interpretation is this, that where you erect any parts of your house beyond the building line, you come within sect. 22; where you erect something upon your house which projects beyond the building line, then you come within sect. 73:

Coburg Hotel Company v. London County Council, 63 J. P. 805.

[PHILLIMORE, J.—That was a dispute as to a portico which was part of the house. Now, as portico is expressly mentioned in sect. 73, it must come within that section as well as within sect. 22.] Sect. 73 consists of two distinct parts. The first part refers to the materials of which certain things must be made; the second as to the distance, &c., which certain things may project. I contend this thing is within the second part of the section, whether it is part of the structure of the house or merely something fixed to the house in a more or less permanent way. At the same time I do not contend that it is in fact a projection within sect. 73; but my argument is that the justice has found that it is, and it lies on the appellant to show that there is no evidence to support this finding. [PHILLIMORE, J.—The magistrate has not found that this was in fact a projection. He has found the facts about its nature, and then left to us to say whether these facts make it a projection within sect. 73.] Sect. 73 cannot apply merely to things which, at the original erection of the building, were part of the structure. Sect. 201 (16) excludes from the operation of Part VI. of the Act flower cases for windows, provided they do not project over the public way or more than 12in. beyond the external face of the wall. This shows that such cases would be within sect. 73 if not expressly exempted. As to the second point, this is clearly a continuing offence. The fact that sect. 200 (3) inflicts a daily penalty for its continuance is enough to prove this. There is no difference between this case and the Metropolitan Board of Works v. Antony (sup.), and see London County Council v. Wortley (71 L. T. Rep. 487; (1894) 2 Q. B. 826). [PHILLIMORE, J.—The continuing offence there was got out of the section creating the duty. Here you have to go to a general penalty clause.] Yes; but without this general clause there is no penalty attached to breach of the section creating the duty. [PHILLIMORE, J.—That may be; but the general penalty clause may, as far as the continuing penalty is concerned, be satisfied in many ways as well as by making this a continuing offence.] The offence created by sect. 73 is not the erecting of the projection. It enacts that "no projection shall extend." The continuance of the projection is therefore as much an offence as the erection of it. Counsel also referred to Rumball v. Schmidt, 46 L. T. Rep. 661; 8 Q. B. Div. 608.

Macmorran, K.C. in reply.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 17.—BRUCE, J. read the following written judgment of the court:—In this case we think that the sign does not constitute a projection within the meaning of sect. 73, sub-sect. 8, of the London Building Act 1894. The section in question commences: "The following provisions shall (except with the consent of the council) apply to projections from buildings." In order to ascertain the meaning of the phrase "projections from buildings," used at the commencement of the section, and the meaning of the words "projection from any building," used in the last sub-section, the provisions of the whole section must be considered. The 1st sub-section provides in substance that every coping, cornice, string-course, fascia, window-dressing, and such like, and every architectural projection or decoration and also the eaves, barge boards, and cornices to any overhanging roof shall, except as therein mentioned, be of brick, tile, stone, or other fireproof material. We think it clear that this sub-section refers only to projections from buildings in the nature of architectural projections or decorations and to the overhanging parts of buildings, and it relates to the material for the construction of the parts of buildings to which it refers. Sub-sect. 2 enacts that every balcony, cornice, or other projection shall be tailed into the wall of the building and weighted and tied down to the satisfaction of the district surveyor, and that no cornice shall exceed in projection 2ft. 6in. over the public way. This sub-section relates only to projections in the nature of architectural projections. Sub-sect. 3 lays down rules regulating the extent to which in a street a shop front and a cornice to a shop front may project beyond the external wall of the building to which the shop front or cornice belongs. Sub-sect. 5 relates only to bay windows, and sub-sect. 6 lays down the rules under which projecting oriel windows or turrets may be constructed. Sub-sect. 7 provides that the roof, flat, or gutter of every building, and every balcony, verandah, shop front, or other similar projection or projecting window shall be so arranged and constructed and so applied with gutters and pipes as to prevent the water therefrom from dropping or running upon any public way. We now come to the 8th sub-section, upon the construction of which the main question in the case turns. The sub-section is in these terms: "Except in so far as is permitted by this section in the case of shop fronts and projecting windows and with the exception of water-pipes and their appurtenances, copings, string-courses, cornices, fascias, window dressings, and other like architectural decorations, no projection from any building shall extend beyond the general line of buildings in any street except with the permission of the council, after consulting the local authority." The whole of the preceding part of the section relates to the construction of buildings, to projections from buildings, in the nature of architectural projection or decoration, or to the overhanging parts of buildings, and therefore it is plain that the projections from buildings to which the main provisions of the section apply are projections forming part of the buildings from which they project. The question we have to determine is whether the words in the 8th sub-section, "no projection from any building," are used in a different sense and apply to a different class of projection; whether they include such things as poles, blinds, sign-boards, or other structures hung out from or attached to the outside wall of a house. Giving the best consideration we can to the words of the 8th sub-section we think that the words "projection from any building" are there used in the same sense as in the earlier part of the section. It would be strange to find in the last sub-section of a long section containing a code of minute provisions relating to a particular class of projections, a sudden departure from the subject to which all the preceding provisions of the section are devoted. The meaning of the two branches of the 8th sub-section, we think, is that, with the exception of architectural decorations of the character specified, and for an obvious reason water-pipes, no part of the structure of a building, no architectural projection not being a shop front or projecting window falling within the first branch of the sub-section, shall extend beyond the general line of buildings in any street. But it is contended by the counsel for the respondents that, although the words apply to such projections as we have mentioned, yet that they are wide enough to extend to everything attached to a building and extending beyond the general line of buildings, and that they apply to a structure such as the wooden box attached to the external wall of a house by brackets as described in the case. We do not think that the words, even apart from the context, have so extended a meaning. A projection from a building means a part of a building projecting or jutting out; it means a prominence extending from the building in the sense of coming out from the building as part of the building. If the words are taken in this sense they fall in with the scope of the section. It is quite clear that the object of the section is to preserve the width of the street and the general line of building frontage, in order to maintain architectural uniformity. But to extend the meaning of the words in the 8th sub-section to include structures not being part of the building and not joining any part of the architectural structure of the building would be to give an effect to the enactments altogether beyond the object to which the section seems to be directed. Further, we feel strengthened in the conclusion at which we have arrived by the circumstance that the 73rd section is in Part VI. of the Act, which is headed "Construction of Buildings." In another part of the same Act, where power is given to the council to deal with dangerous structures, the word structure is said to include anything affixed to or projecting from any building, wall, or other structure: (see sect. 102). Had the Legislature intended the 73rd section to apply to a structure affixed to a building it may fairly be assumed that it would have used in that section words similar to the words used in the 102nd section. The 102nd section and the 73rd section were not, we think, intended to overlap. In each case the Legislature uses apt words to describe the particular kind of structure to which the several provisions apply. We may add that no inconvenience seems to be likely to arise from the construction we have placed on the sub-section in question, because the council has power under the 164th section of the same Act to make bye-laws for the regulation of lamps, signs, or other structures overhanging the public way not being within the City. And by the 7th sub-section of sect. 60 of the 2 & 3 Vict. c. 47, a penalty is imposed upon any person who shall set up or continue (inter alia) any pole, blind, awning or any other projection from any window, parapet or other part of any house, shop, or other building so as to cause any annoyance or obstruction in any thoroughfare. And by the 119th section of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 provision is made for the removal of any lamps, iron sign-post, show board, window shutter, gate, fence, or any other projection or obstruction placed or made against or in front of any house or building which shall be an annoyance in consequence of the same projecting into or being made in or endangering or rendering less commodious the passage along any street. Further, as to the point raised by the case whether the prosecution of the alleged offence is barred under sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, by lapse of time, we think it is. If any offence was committed it was, we think, complete on the 20th June 1899, the date on which the said sign was completely affixed to the premises. The case London County Council v. Cross (66 L. T. Rep. 731) is, we think, in point. As to the third point, we think that, if the sign had been a projection within the meaning of sect. 73 of the London Building Act 1894 and the proceedings had been taken in due time, the appellant could not have escaped liability on the alleged ground that he had no power to control or alter the position of the sign without trespass. The result of our judgment is that the conviction, determination, and order must be reversed, and we think the appellant is entitled to the costs of the appeal.

LANGRIDGE v. HOBBS. (a)

Vaccination—Neglect to have vaccinated—Limitation of proceedings—Vaccination Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 29—Vaccination Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 98), s. 11—Vaccination Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 49), s. 1 (1)—Vaccination Order 1898, sched. 4, par. 6 (d).

When a parent or person having the custody of a child has without lawful excuse failed to have such child vaccinated within six months from the birth, matter for a complaint or information against him has arisen for an offence under sect. 29 of the Vaccination Act 1867, and if a complaint or information be not laid against him within the twelve months following all proceedings for the offence are barred by sect. 11 of the Vaccination Act 1871.

Par. 6 (d) of the 4th schedule to the Vaccination Order 1898, which directs the vaccination officer to serve a notice on such a parent or person within seven days after the expiration of the said six months requiring him to have the child vaccinated within the time specified in such notice, does not affect the period of limitation of proceedings under the Vaccination Acts, but is merely an instruction to vaccination officers as to the mode in which they are to carry out their duties under those Acts.

CASE stated by three of the justices of the peace for the county of Sussex.

At a petty session holden at East Grinstead, in and for the division of East Grinstead, in the county of Sussex, on the 16th July 1900, an information preferred by Henry George Hobbs (hereinafter called the respondent) against John Langridge (hereinafter called the appellant) under sect. 29 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, charging that the appellant, being at the time of the offence thereafter mentioned the parent having the custody of a certain child called Charles Langridge, born in England, on or about the 30th Dec. 1898, unlawfully did neglect to cause the child to be vaccinated according to the provisions of the Vaccination Acts 1867 and 1898, that is to say that he, the appellant, did not within six months after the birth of the child cause it to be vaccinated by some medical practitioner, he, the appellant, not rendering a reasonable excuse for his neglect, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, was heard and determined, and upon such hearing the appellant was duly convicted before the justices of the offence, and they adjudged him to forfeit and pay the sum of 1l. and the sum of 1l. 12s. 7d. for costs forthwith.

By the Vaccination Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84):

Sect. 29. Every parent or person having the custody of a child who shall neglect to take such child or to cause it to be taken to be vaccinated, or after vaccination to be inspected, according to the provisions of this Act, and shall not render a reasonable excuse for his neglect, shall be guilty of an offence and be liable to be proceeded against summarily, and upon conviction to pay a penalty not exceeding twenty shillings.

By the Vaccination Act 1871 (34 & 35 Vict. c. 98):

Sect. 11. Any complaint may be made and any information laid for an offence under the Vaccination Acts 1867 and 1871 at any time not exceeding twelve months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information arose and not subsequently.

By the Vaccination Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 49):

Sect. 1.—(1) The period within which the parent or other person having the custody of a child shall cause the said child to be vaccinated shall be six months from the birth . . . and so much of that section as requires the child to be taken to a public vaccinator to be vaccinated shall be repealed.

At the hearing before the justices the following facts were proved in evidence or admitted:—

The appellant was the parent having the custody of the child Charles Langridge, born on the 30th Dec. 1898.

The appellant's name was duly included in form H by the vaccination officer and sent to the public vaccinator.

The usual notice in form I was served by the public vaccinator on the appellant of his intention to attend and vaccinate the child twenty-four hours previous to such attendance.

The public vaccinator visited the appellant's house on the 1st May 1899, being within two weeks after receipt of the notice from the vaccination officer, and offered to vaccinate the child, and vaccination was refused.

On the 7th July 1899 the vaccination officer served notice in form K on the appellant, requiring him to have the child vaccinated within fourteen days from the date thereof.

No certificate of postponement or successful vaccination had been received in respect of the child, and the information against the appellant was laid on the 12th July 1900.

Forms H, I, and K referred to above are those contained in the 5th schedule to the Vaccination Order 1898, made by the Local Government Board in pursuance of the powers given to them by the statutes in that behalf.

At the hearing the appellant by his counsel took the objection that the information was out of time by virtue of sect. 11 of the Vaccination Act 1871, but the justices overruled the objection and convicted the appellant.

K.B. Div.] KENTON (app.) v. SHEFFIELD COAL COMPANY LIMITED (resps.). [K.B. Div.]

The grounds set out in the case for this decision of the justices were as follows: The child Charles Langridge was born on the 30th Dec. 1898, and accordingly the six months allowed by sect. 1 (1) of the Vaccination Act 1898, in which the parent or person having custody of the child had to have the same vaccinated would expire on the 30th June 1899.

The Vaccination Order of 1898, made by the Local Government Board under the authority of statutes in that behalf, provides, by par. 6 (d) of the 4th schedule, that

If the vaccination officer has not received in respect of any child a certificate under sect. 2 of the Vaccination Act 1898 within the time limited by that section, and at the end of seven days, after the expiration of six calendar months from the birth of the child has not received any other of the certificates mentioned in subdivision (a) of this paragraph, the vaccination officer shall forthwith give a notice in form K set out in the 5th schedule to this order, or to the like effect, to the parent or other person having the custody of the child by delivering the same by post or otherwise at the last known residence of such person or persons. If that notice is not duly complied with within the time specified therein, it shall become the duty of the vaccination officer under the Vaccination Act 1871 to take proceedings for the enforcement of the law.

The notice in form K, in compliance with the Vaccination Order of 1898, was served on the appellant on the 7th July 1899, and required the appellant to have the child vaccinated within fourteen days from the date thereof, so that such notice expired on the 21st July 1899, and as therefore the vaccination officer could not commence proceedings before that date, the offence was not till then complete, and time should be reckoned as running from the date of the expiration of the notice, and not from the date of attainment by the child of the age of six months.

The justices therefore held that the matter of the information within sect. 11 of the Vaccination Act 1871 did not arise till the expiration of the fourteen days' notice, and that, therefore the time for taking proceedings could not expire until the 21st July 1900.

Schultess Young for the appellant. — The justices were mistaken in holding that the schedule to the Vaccination Order 1898 was intended to or could alter the statutory conditions of the offence. This order and schedule were made under the powers given to the Local Government Board by sect. 5 of the Vaccination Act 1871, sect. 1 of the Vaccination Act 1874, and sect. 6 of the Vaccination Act 1898. None of these Acts gives the Local Government Board power to alter any enactment of the statute. All it is empowered to do is to make rules and orders with regard to the duties of guardians and officers. This was clearly all that was meant to be done here. The very title of the schedule shows this. It is "Instructions to Vaccination Officers." It was intended to direct officers as to how they should carry out their duties under the Acts, not to alter the effect of the Acts themselves.

The respondent did not appear.

WILLS, J. — This seems to us a very clear case. The effect of sect. 29 of the Vaccination Act 1867 as read with sect. 1 (1) of the Vaccination Act 1898 is to impose on a parent or person having the custody of a young child to have it vaccinated within six months after its birth. This is a positive duty. If it is not performed within the six months the penalty is incurred, and under sect. 11 of the Vaccination Act 1871 an information may be laid against the person offending at any time within twelve months of the expiration of the six months, but if not laid within this period it is out of time. These are the only two sections which for our purpose are material. Now here the child was born on the 30th Dec. 1898. The offence was complete when it still remained unvaccinated on the 30th June 1899. The proceedings against the appellant were not commenced until the 12th July 1900. They were therefore out of time. The magistrates apparently thought that this had been altered by the Vaccination Order of 1898. This is a mistake. The Vaccination Order 1898 did not create fresh legislation. That order laid down and could only lay down rules for the guidance of vaccination officers in the discharge of their duties under the different Acts. This is clearly shown by the enactments giving them the power to make such rules, and also by the heading of the paragraph relied upon by the magistrates which is "Instructions to Vaccination Officers." The sole object was to explain to the vaccination officers how they should carry out the duties imposed upon them by the Acts and order, and not to alter the statutory conditions under which an information had to be laid for an offence under the Acts. Par. 6 (d) directs the vaccination officer at the end of six months and seven days from the birth of the child to serve the notice to have the child vaccinated within the time therein specified, and it is only on failure to comply with this notice that proceedings are to be taken. This does not and cannot alter the statutory conditions of the offence. It is only intended to give to offenders a locus penitentis, and amounts to an instruction to vaccination officers to take proceedings only after failure to get the Acts complied with by less harsh measures. The offence then was as I have said complete on the 30th June 1899, and no fresh offence was created by the failure to comply with the notice of the 7th July 1899. As the proceedings were not instituted till the 12th July 1900, they were out of time.

KENTON (app.) v. SHEFFIELD COAL COMPANY LIMITED (resps.). (a)

Local government—General district rate—Valuation list—Rate based on valuation list—Appeal—Reduction of valuation list and of general district rate—Claim for reduced rate—Time when "matter of complaint" arose—Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 256.

In a valuation list the respondents were rated as the occupiers of certain premises, and poor rates and two general district rates were made upon this valuation, and after demand payment of part of the general district rates was made by the respondents on account. The respondents, upon an appeal against the poor rates, succeeded in getting the valuation lowered for the periods in respect of which these general district rates were made, and the valuation list was amended accordingly, and the figures of the above general district rates were amended and lowered in accordance with the reduced valuation. A demand was then made upon the respondents to pay the amount of the two amended general district rates, less the sums which they had already paid on account, and a summons to enforce payment of the balance was taken out within six months after the demand for the reduced amount, but more than six months after the demand for the whole unamended rates.

Held, that, the complaint being that the respondents had not paid the amended rate, "the matter of the complaint" first arose within sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, when the demand was made to pay the reduced claim and not when the demand was made to pay the original rates, and that, as the summons was taken out within six months from the demand to pay the reduced rate, the claim was not barred by the section.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the West Riding of the county of York sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction at Sheffield, upon a determination by them of a claim made by the appellant on behalf of the Handsworth Urban District Council for the payment by the respondents to the council of the sum of 869*l.* 3*s.*

The facts proved or admitted were as follows:—

The appellant was the collector of rates of the Handsworth Urban District Council (herein called "the council"), and was authorised by the council to make the above-mentioned claim and to initiate summary proceedings in support of such claim.

The respondents were the rateable occupiers of certain premises situate in the parish of Handsworth within the council's district, and comprising the coal mine, shafts, and the land, buildings, machinery, plant, and sidings connected with the Birley Collieries (herein referred to as "the premises").

In a supplemental valuation list made for the parish on the 6th Nov. 1897, and included in the valuation list in force for the parish on the 28th Dec. 1897, the premises were valued and assessed at a rateable value of 10,137*l.*

On the 28th Dec. 1897 a poor rate was made by the overseers of the poor of the parish by which the respondents were assessed and rated in respect of the premises upon the rateable value of 10,137*l.*

On the 23rd March 1898 a general district rate of 3*s.* in the pound, payable in two instalments, was made by the council, to which the respondents were rated in respect of the premises upon the rateable value of 10,137*l.* at the sum of 1520*l.* 11*s.*

On the 21st June 1898 a second poor rate was duly made by which the respondents in respect of the premises were assessed on the same rateable value.

On the 28th July 1898 payment of the first instalment of the above sum of 1520*l.* 11*s.* was demanded by the council from the respondents by serving upon them a written demand note of that date, and on the 23rd Sept. 1898 the respondents paid the sum of 356*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, which last-mentioned sum was accepted by the council on account of the first half of the district rate; and on the 25th Oct. 1898 payment of the second instalment was likewise demanded as aforesaid, and on the 27th March 1899 the respondents paid a like sum of 356*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.*, which was accepted by the council on account of the rate.

On the 22nd Nov. 1898 a third poor rate was made for the parish by the overseers, by which the respondents were rated in respect of the premises upon the same rateable value of 10,137*l.*

On the 22nd March 1899 a general district rate of 3*s.* 4*d.* in the pound, payable in two instalments, was made by the council to which the respondents were rated in respect of the premises upon the above rateable value of 10,137*l.* at the sum of 1689*l.* 10*s.*

On the 21st April 1899 the respondents gave notice of appeal against the hereinbefore-mentioned poor rates, but not against either of the district rates.

Payment of the first and second instalments of the last-mentioned district rate was demanded by the council from the respondents on the 10th May 1899 and on the 17th Oct. 1899 respectively, by service upon them of written demand notes on these dates, and the respondents paid the sums of 475*l.* 9*s.* 10*d.* and 450*l.* on the 29th Sept. 1899 and 5th April 1900, which sums the council accepted on account of the district rate.

On the 4th Jan. 1900 the arbitrator (to whom the appeals against the above poor rates had been referred by agreement) awarded that the rateable value of the premises was for the several periods relating to the two first-mentioned poor rates of the 28th Dec. 1897 and the 21st June 1898 respectively the sum of 7517*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, and for the period relating to the last-mentioned poor rate of the 22nd Nov. 1898 the sum of 8279*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*

In accordance with this award alterations and amendments were duly made in the valuation lists upon which the above poor rates were based, and on the 19th March 1900 the council altered the figures of the above general district rates of the 23rd March 1898 and the 22nd March 1899 so as to accord with the alterations so made in the valuation lists—that is to say, the rateable value of the premises in the general district rate of the 23rd March 1898 from the sum of 10,137*l.* to the sum of 7517*l.* 9*s.* 9*d.*, and the amount due in respect of the premises from 1520*l.* 11*s.* to the sum of 1127*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; and the rateable value in the general district rate of the 22nd March 1899 from 10,137*l.* to the sum of 8279*l.* 4*s.* 1*d.*, and the amount due in respect of the premises from the sum of 1689*l.* 10*s.* to 1379*l.* 17*s.* 4*d.*

The council on the 30th May 1900, and again on the 14th June 1900, demanded payment by the respondents of the sum of 869*l.* 3*s.*, such last-mentioned sum being made up as follows:

1898, Sept. 23, Amount paid by the respondents on account of the said rate, 356*l.* 8*s.* 6*d.* 1899, do. do.,

K.B. Div.] KETTON (app.) v. SHEFFIELD COAL COMPANY LIMITED (resps.). [K.B. Div.]

356l. 8s. 6d. Total paid on account of the said rate, 712l. 17s. Balance claimed, 414l. 15s. 6d.

1900, March 22, General District Rate, 1689l. 10s., altered to 1379l. 17s. 4d.

Amounts paid on account of the said rate on 29th Sept. 1899 and 5th April 1900, 475l. 9s. 10d. and 450l. Total paid, 925l. 9s. 10d. Balance claimed, 454l. 7s. 6d. Total amount claimed, 869l. 3s.

The respondents having refused to pay this sum of 869l. 3s., complaint was made on behalf of the council and a summons was issued on the 24th July 1900, calling upon the respondents to answer the claim. This summons was heard by the justices on the 3rd and 14th Aug. 1900.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the matter of the complaint in respect of which the summons was issued arose more than six months previously to the issue of the summons, and that the recovery of the amount claimed was barred by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that until the general district rates had respectively been altered so as to agree with the valuation lists as amended in accordance with the award, no valid demand could be made upon the respondents by the council in respect of either of the rates, and that payment of the amount claimed had not been demanded until within six months of the issue of the summons, and that therefore the matter of the complaint in respect of which the summons was issued arose within six months, and the claim was not barred by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11.

The justices were of opinion that the recovery of the amount claimed by the council was, under the circumstances above stated, barred by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43, s. 11, and accordingly they dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the justices were right in so doing.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43) provides:

Sect. 11. And be it enacted, that in all cases where no time is already or shall hereafter be specially limited for making any such complaint or laying any such information in the Act or Acts of Parliament relating to each particular case, such complaint shall be made and such information shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint or information respectively arose.

Hugo Young, K.C. (R. Cunningham Glen with him) for the appellant.—The magistrates were wrong in holding that the claim was barred by sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 because the cause of complaint had not arisen within six months before the issuing of the summons on the 24th July 1900. Sect. 211 of the Public Health Act 1875 deals with the assessment and levying of general district rates under the Act; and sect. 256 provides for the recovery of these rates by summons before a court of summary jurisdiction where there is a failure to pay the rates within fourteen days after a lawful demand in writing, and sect. 269 gives a right of appeal to quarter sessions to any person who may feel aggrieved by any rate made under the Act, or by any order or determination of a court of summary jurisdiction. In this case the appeal was against the poor rates, and there was no appeal against the general district rates. Sect. 11 of the Act of 1848 says that the complaint shall be made within six months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose. When did the cause of complaint arise here? The cause of complaint was the nonpayment of the reduced sum of 869l., and the failure to comply with the demand for that sum. This reduced sum was the sum claimed in the proceeding, and the cause of complaint arose when there was a demand to pay this sum. Was there as regards this sum of 869l. a "lawful demand in writing" within sect. 256 of the Public Health Act 1875 on the 30th May 1900 and again on the 14th June 1900? We submit that there was a lawful demand in writing on these dates for the payment of this sum, and that within fourteen days afterwards we could have proceeded under that section for the recovery of the same. When the rates were amended and reduced in accordance with the award of the arbitrator given on the 4th Jan. 1900, they were in substance new rates and no valid demand could be made for these district rates until they were amended in accordance with the new rateable values. The cause of complaint therefore did not arise until there was a demand on the 30th May 1900 to pay this claim, and, as the summons was issued on the 24th July following, the claim was not barred by sect. 11. He referred to

Tindal Atkinson, K.C. (T. E. Ellison with him) for the respondents.—The claim was clearly barred by sect. 11 of the Act of 1848, and the magistrates were right in so holding. Sect. 221 of the Public Health Act 1875 gives an urban authority power to amend rates and to raise or reduce the sum at which a person has been assessed, and the section says that "no such amendment shall be held to avoid the rate." The cause of complaint was the nonpayment of the general district rates made respectively on the 23rd March 1898 and the 22nd March 1899. Sect. 11 says that the summons must be taken out within six months from the time the cause of complaint arose, otherwise the claim is barred. The summons ought to have been taken out within six months from the time these two rates were first demanded, but it was not taken out till the 24th July 1900, which was long afterwards. The demands made on the 30th May and the 14th June 1900, which are the demands relied on, were not demands for new or fresh rates. The rates, quid rates, had not been altered; the amount only had been altered or affected. It could never have been intended that the limitation in sect. 11 should apply to such a case where a long time might be taken to effect the alteration. It was the appellant's own fault that he did not pursue his remedy in time. When the whole of a debt is barred by a statute of limitations, no creditor can recover a part of it; so here if the whole of the old rates were barred by sect. 11—as clearly they were—a part of those rates cannot now be recovered. If summonses had been taken out within six months after each original demand was made, then the respondents would have had no answer to the claim; but this summons is out of time, as the rates claimed are still the rates made on the 23rd March 1898 and the 22nd March 1899.

WILLS, J.—I am of opinion that the decision of the magistrates was wrong, and that the amount of the amended rate is recoverable under the circumstances of this case. What was demanded and what was the subject of the summons was the amended and reduced amount. Until the amount had been reduced by the competent authority and until the rate had been amended there never was any right to demand that smaller sum. There was only a right to demand the larger sum. It is not necessary to decide it, but I am very much of the opinion that has been expressed by counsel for the respondents, that, if the demand had been proceeded with and a summons taken out on the larger demand that was made originally, there would have been no answer to it; but that does not seem to me to be material for the present purpose. Had that been the case, of course it would have been quite useless to proceed upon a summons for the amended and the reduced amount, because the larger amount would have been paid or recoverable, and, under these circumstances, nobody would have thought of taking out a fresh summons. In my opinion, also, the excess might have been recovered by a ratepayer who paid too much. It is not necessary to decide that, but I cannot believe that any such injustice as has been suggested—namely, that the rating authority might keep that rate which has turned out to be excessive—would have been allowed to stand. It seems to me that there are ample reasons consonant with both the legislation and the general law why that excess amount would have been recoverable, but it is not necessary to decide that. I take my stand on this—that the moment the rate was reduced by the process pointed out by the Act of Parliament, there came into operation for the first time a right to demand the reduced sum. Counsel for the respondents has said that if a man owes a large debt or owes a definite sum, and the Statute of Limitations runs with regard to that sum, he certainly cannot recover half of it beyond the period of limitation. No doubt he could not recover it as things stand, if that simple proposition is put; but I think if you add this to it, that by the effect of legislation and what has taken place, there is a new right altogether created afterwards which makes the smaller sum for the first time a debt, I think the matter might stand very differently. But here it seems to me we have to look at the words of sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, and we have to look at the question when the cause of complaint first arises. The complaint is that the respondents have not paid the amended rate. The amended rate is to follow the valuation list in force at the time being; the valuation list as amended never was the valuation list in force until the amendment was made, and therefore the rate which is amended according to the amended valuation list becomes for the first time the instrument which makes it the duty of the ratepayer to pay a smaller amount. It seems to me, therefore, that the case is really free from difficulty, and that the law in this instance is consonant with what reason and common sense would point out—namely, that the reduced amount is not to be extinguished by the payment of a small sum under the circumstances under which the respondents had last paid. I am clearly of opinion that the appeal must succeed, and that this case must go back to the magistrates to make the proper order—namely, an order for the payment of the arrears of the reduced rate.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion, and for the same reasons.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.)

LAMBERT v. MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF LOWESTOFT. (a)

Highway—Repair—Nuisance—Sewer under highway—Latent defect—Excavation under surface—Injury caused by—Liability of sanitary authority—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 13, 15, 19.

The plaintiff's horse while being driven along a highway under which was an old sewer, broke through the surface of the road and the horse's foot went into a hole and the horse was injured. The hole, which was underneath the surface, was caused by rats eating through the mortar of the joint which connected the sewer with a drain. The road had been taken over and made up by the defendants, the sanitary authority responsible for the sewers, and also the highway authority. There was no negligence on their part, and nothing to warn them that there was anything wrong with the sewer or the road, or that there was a hole underneath the road. The plaintiff sued for injuries to the horse upon the ground that the existence of the hole under the road caused by a defect in the sewer was a nuisance on the highway for which the defendants were liable as being the sanitary authority responsible for the sewers:

Held, that there being no negligence on the part of the defendants they were not liable for the injuries to the horse.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION by Lord Alverstone, C.J. in an action tried before him with a jury at the assizes for the county of Norfolk held at Norwich.

The plaintiff carried on business in Norwich, and the defendants were, under the Public Health Acts, the urban sanitary authority of the borough of Lowestoft, and also the highway authority.

The plaintiff in his statement of claim alleged that on the 11th July 1900 his horse was being driven along a highway in the borough of Lowestoft, known as Cambridge-road, when, owing to the defective condition of the highway, the horse broke the surface of the road and was injured, and that the defective condition of the highway was owing to the defendants having so negligently and improperly constructed a sewer therein that the soil of the highway was washed away and the highway undermined at the place where the plaintiff's horse broke through the surface; and, alternatively, that the defendants had negligently constructed the highway where it had been excavated in order to construct or repair a sewer therein, and that they, knowing that the sewer and the highway over the sewer were in a defective condition, neglected to repair the sewer and reinstate the highway: and that, owing to such neglect, the highway was unable to bear the weight of the horse.

[K.B. Div.]

The plaintiff claimed 76l. 3s. 6d. for injuries to the horse and expenses.

The defendants (inter alia) pleaded that there was no misfeasance on their part, and that they were not liable for their nonfeasance (if any); also that the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action.

The facts, which are fully stated in the judgment, were shortly these:—

Underneath the road in question and running along the middle of the road at a depth of some 4ft. or 5ft. was an old brick sewer constructed about the year 1863.

This road was taken over in 1886 by the defendants, who were the sanitary authority and also the highway authority for the district, and it was then made up.

A 6in. drain to take the surface drainage had been put in when the sewer was made, and the junction of the drain with the sewer had been made with mortar and with a mortar joint, which was then the usual way of making such joints.

At some subsequent time rats had eaten through the mortar of the joint, and had made a hole under the road, which was enlarged either by rats or by the water, and at the time in question there was a hole of some 2ft. in diameter under the surface of the road.

As the plaintiff's horse was passing along the road, the road gave way under the weight of the horse and the horse's foot went through the surface of the road into a hole and the horse was injured.

The learned judge at the trial found that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any negligence on the part of the defendants which caused the accident, and he withdrew the case from the jury. He also stated in his judgment that there was nothing to give the defendants warning that there was anything wrong with the sewer and drains or with the road, and that they could not by the exercise of reasonable care have discovered the hole until after the accident.

The case was then reserved for further consideration as to the liability of the defendants, apart from negligence.

Witt, K.C. and E. E. Wild for the plaintiff.—The defendants have two separate functions; they are the highway authority and they are the sanitary authority and as such are responsible for the maintenance of the sewers, but it is a mere statutory accident that the two functions are combined in one body. As sanitary authority they are liable for a nuisance existing on the road and arising from the state of the sewer, and they are so liable apart from negligence. Secondly, it is absolutely immaterial whether the defendants made this sewer or took it over, because, under the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875, ss. 13, 15, 19, they would be liable to keep the sewer right, and (sect. 13) this would apply to all existing and future sewers. By the statute these sewers are vested in the local authority, and therefore they take them over and are responsible for their future maintenance:

White v. Hindley Local Board, 32 L. T. Rep. 460; L. Rep. 10 Q. B. 219.

Thirdly, assuming that the defendants are in the same position as if they had made the sewer, they are liable for a nuisance without any negligence on their part. Negligence is absolutely distinct from nuisance, and in many cases where there is a liability the principle of the liability is not negligence, but the cause of action is that the act of the defendants has caused a nuisance on the highway. The distinction between an act of omission and an act of commission is important so far as highway authorities are concerned, but outside the highway authority it is not so important. That distinction is well brought out by Lord Herschell, L.C. in Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke (72 L. T. Rep. 605, at pp. 606-8; (1895) A. C. 433, at pp. 435-443). That case is important, because of the explanation there given by the Lord Chancellor of the case of Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson (41 L. T. Rep. 778; 4 App. Cas. 256). In the latter case the borough had constructed a drain under a highway; the drain fell into disrepair and the highway fell into it, leaving a hole into which the plaintiff's horse fell and the plaintiff was injured. The Judicial Committee were of opinion that the borough, by reason of their construction of the drain and their neglect to repair it, whereby the dangerous hole was formed which was left open and unfenced, caused a nuisance in the highway for which they were liable to an indictment and also in damages to the plaintiff. In Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke (ubi sup.), the case was merely one of nonfeasance in allowing the highway to fall into disrepair, and not of misfeasance; and Lord Herschell, after dealing minutely with Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson (ubi sup.), says (72 L. T. Rep. at p. 607; (1895) A. C. at p. 441): "The ratio decidendi was that the defendants had caused a nuisance in the highway. It was entirely independent of the questions whether there was an obligation to keep the highway in repair. . . . The case was not treated as one of mere nonfeasance, and indeed it was not so. The defendants had created a nuisance. Having made the drain, and failed to keep it in such a condition that the road would not fall into it, they were just as much liable as if they had made the excavation without constructing the drain, and the road had consequently subsided and become foundrous." There are many cases which show the same principle. Where drains have been merely neglected you must prove negligence, but, assuming that to be good law, it does not affect the present case, as it is an act of obstruction, the intentional doing or permitting the doing of a thing, and not negligence, which is the cause of action. The defendants caused a nuisance on the highway and are therefore liable to the plaintiffs. Steel v. Dartford Local Board (60 L. J. 256, Q. B.) is strongly in the plaintiff's favour. In that case the defendants, who were both the sanitary and the highway authority were held not liable, but only on the ground that it was the act of one Clifford, and not the defendants which caused the nuisance, and the judgment of Lindley, L.J. shows that the defendants would have been liable if they had done the thing complained of. The principle is that the local authority, quid sanitary authority, is as much liable for an interference with, or a nuisance on, the highway as a private person. In that case Clifford would have been liable, apart from negligence, because he created a nuisance on the highway, and that is the point here. They referred to Kent v. Worthing Local Board (48 L. T. Rep. 362; 10 Q. B. Div. 118), as showing the distinction between an act of omission and an act of commission; and Lord Alverstone, C.J. referred to Blackmore v. Vestry of Mile End Old Town (46 L. T. Rep. 869; 9 Q. B. Div. 451).

[K.B. Div.]

LAMBERT v. MAYOR AND CORPORATION OF LOWESTOFT.

[K.B. Div.]

A. H. Poyser and F. Low for the defendants.—The contention for the plaintiff is an attempt to establish a proposition which would render unnecessary all the decisions in the previous cases, because that contention, if well founded, would come to this, that the local authority would be in the position of insurers. The defendants have two functions, functions as a sanitary authority and functions as a highway authority. Dealing with them as a sanitary authority, they are, with regard to the sewers, in a statutory position; they are acting under an Act of Parliament and under particular powers given by statute. Therefore in doing what they are authorised to do they cannot be guilty of a nuisance. We quite agree that if there were negligence here, then it would be a different question; but here there was no negligence and therefore there can be no nuisance, as the defendants, in doing what they did, were acting under an Act of Parliament. A public body acting under statutory powers do not create a nuisance, though it is quite true they are bound to carry out their statutory duty without negligence. For instance, the vibration caused by a railway train or damage caused by sparks from the engine, is not a nuisance, because the railway company are carrying out a lawful act under statutory powers. If it were an unlawful act it might and would be otherwise. There is in such cases no liability for an act of nonfeasance unless the statute clearly imposes it. In the case of Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert (69 L. T. Rep. 510; (1893) A. C. 524), the case of Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson (ubi sup.) was dealt with, and the judgment there shows that practically the Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson (ubi sup.) is no longer an authority for the plaintiff's contention, and that, at all events, the conduct complained of there was not in the view of the Judicial Committee nonfeasance, but misfeasance arising from negligence. The defendants as the local authority have to look after their sewers, keep them in repair, and cleanse them (sects. 13, 15, and 19 of the Public Health Act 1875), but in doing these acts under their statutory powers they are not liable unless they are guilty of negligence—that is, negligence in the sense of there being some want of reasonable care. Here it is not pretended that there has been any want of reasonable care. Apart from negligence in such cases there is no liability. In Stretton's Derby Brewery Company v. Mayor of Derby (69 L. T. Rep. 791, at p. 795; (1894) 1 Ch. 431, at pp. 442-443), Romer, J., in a considered judgment on this question, says that the liability in circumstances like the present, "though in form not limited, is in fact limited to cases where the public authority has been guilty of negligence, or, as it is sometimes expressed, of want of reasonable care and diligence." Then the learned judge cites various authorities for that proposition, and, amongst others, Bateman v. Poplar District Board of Works (58 L. T. Rep. 720; 37 Ch. Div. 272), which is in point here. There is no case which supports the proposition that, whatever may happen in consequence of a sewer being under a road, the authority responsible for the sewers is liable, except, perhaps, the dictum of the Lord Chancellor in Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke (ubi sup.). The real test is, Has there been such a negligent omission by the defendants in carrying out their duties under the Act as to constitute what in law is negligence? If there has, then the defendants would be liable, but it would only be upon the ground of negligence: (Thompson v. Mayor of Brighton and Oliver v. Horsham Local Board, 70 L. T. Rep. 206; (1894) 1 Q. B. 332); Fleming v. Corporation of Manchester (44 L. T. Rep. 517, reversed by Court of Appeal, but only on the ground that there was no evidence of negligence to go to the jury. See Lumley's Public Health, 5th edit., p. 36).

Witt, K.C., in reply, referred to Baron v. Portlade Urban District Council (ante, p. 7; 83 L. T. Rep. 363; (1900) 2 Q. B. 588), and to the judgment of Blackburn, J. in White v. Hindley Local Board (ubi sup.).

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 18.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. read the following judgment:—In this case the plaintiff brought an action against the Mayor and Corporation of Lowestoft for injuries sustained by a horse while passing along Cambridge-road, Lowestoft, owing to the horse's foot going through the crust of the road into a hole underneath. Running along the middle of the road was an old brick sewer, constructed about the year 1863 by the Ipswich Building Society. The road was taken over by the defendants in the year 1886, when it was made up and manholes placed at certain points communicating with the sewer; the old gully pits replaced by new and larger ones which were connected with the then existing 6in. drains, which had been put in to take surface drainage when the sewer was originally constructed. The sewer was at a depth of some 4ft. or 5ft. and the length of the 6in. drain from the gully pit to the sewer was between 8ft. and 9ft. It was proved before me, and I find as a fact, that the junction of the 6in. drain with the sewer had been made in mortar, and that at some time rats had eaten or worked through the mortar of the joint, and had subsequently made a hole of about 2ft. in diameter underneath the surface of the road. The crown of the road had given in under the weight of the horse, thereby causing the injury. After the accident the road was repaired by the defendants, and the joint made good in cement. It was proved before me, and I find as a fact, that it was the common practice in the year 1863, and for some years afterwards, for sewers to be made in the way in which this sewer was constructed—namely, with mortar and with mortar joints for the connecting drains. Nothing had occurred to give the defendants warning that there was anything wrong with the sewer and drains or with the road. A previous subsidence in the road which was suggested as having been brought to the notice of the defendants some years before the accident, was proved at the trial to be in no way connected with, and I find that it was not connected with, either the sewer or the connecting drains. I held at the trial, and still hold, that there was no evidence to go to the jury of any negligence on the part of the defendants which caused or contributed to the accident. I therefore discharged the jury, the counsel on both sides agreeing that the court, or, if necessary, the Court of Appeal, should have the power to draw any inferences of fact necessary to decide the case. Upon further consideration, before me counsel for the plaintiff did not rely upon negligence, nor was any argument addressed to me to show that I was wrong in holding that there was no evidence of negligence to go the jury, but the plaintiff sought to recover on the ground that the existence of a hole under the road caused by a defect in the sewer constituted a nuisance, and that the defendants, as the authority responsible for the maintenance of the sewers, were liable apart from negligence. In my opinion, this contention cannot be successfully maintained. The responsibility of the defendants to maintain the sewers rests upon sects. 13, 15, and 19 of the Public Health Act 1875. In fulfilling these duties they are acting under statutory authority, and it is now clearly established that under ordinary circumstances no action lies for injury occasioned by the execution of statutory duty unless it has been negligently performed: (Geddis v. Proprietors of Bann Reservoir, 3 App. Cas., at p. 455; Bateman v. Poplar Board of Works, ubi sup.; Thompson v. Mayor of Brighton, ubi sup.; Stretton's Derby Brewery Company v. Mayor of Derby, ubi sup., and many other cases). It was, however, argued that if the conditions of the sewer which had been taken over by and vested in the defendants did, in fact, cause a nuisance, the plaintiff could recover apart from negligence. In support of this view the case of Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson (ubi sup.), and particularly the language of the Lord Chancellor in Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke (72 L. T. Rep. at p. 607; (1895) A. C. at p. 441) explaining that case, was relied upon. I am clearly of opinion that neither of these cases is sufficient to support the argument of the plaintiff. In the case of Borough of Bathurst v. Macpherson (ubi sup.) not only might the plaintiff have recovered upon the ground of negligence, but, as pointed out by the Lord Chancellor in Municipal Council of Sydney v. Bourke (ubi sup.), the defective drain had caused the road to become dangerous, and no steps had been taken by the defendants in that case to prevent accidents, although they were well aware of the condition of the road. Their Lordships, in the Bathurst case (ubi sup.), found that the appellants had caused a nuisance in the highway by the construction of the drain and by their neglect to repair it and by leaving a dangerous hole open and unfenced. In my opinion the expressions of the Lord Chancellor (at p. 441 (1895) A. C.) upon which great reliance was placed by counsel for the plaintiff, must be construed with reference to the subject-matter under discussion, and were not intended to lay down a general rule that, simply because an accident has occurred in a road due to a latent defect in a sewer, the defendants, whose duty it is to maintain the sewer, are liable, apart from negligence. I find that in this case there was nothing to warn the defendants that there was anything wrong with the sewer, nor could they, by the exercise of any reasonable care, have discovered the existence of the hole under the road until the accident happened. I therefore dismiss the action, and give judgment for the defendants with costs.

FORD AND OTHERS (pets.) v. NEWTH (resp.);
Re GLOUCESTER MUNICIPAL ELECTION PETITION. (a)

Municipal election—Office of councillor—Disqualification—Contract with corporation—Tender and acceptance of tender—Release from contract by committee—Ratification by council—Relation back of ratification—Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), s. 12, sub-s. 1 (c).

A city council advertised for certain articles for the use of the corporation during the ensuing twelve months ending the 31st Dec. 1900, and invited tenders. N. tendered and offered to supply the articles for the twelve months as required at stated prices. This tender was accepted by the council, and N. supplied the goods as required.

Held, that the acceptance by the council of N.'s tender created a contract for the twelve months between N. and the corporation, and that, therefore, during that time N. had an interest in a contract with the council, and was therefore disqualified by sect. 12, sub-sect. 1, of the Municipal Corporations Act 1884 for being elected and for being a councillor.

On the 19th Oct. 1900 N., with a view to becoming a candidate for the office of councillor, desired to be released from his contract, and a committee of the council on that day resolved that, subject to the approval of the council, he should be released from his contract as from that date, and this resolution of the committee was afterwards, on the 30th Oct., confirmed and adopted by the council.

In the interval—namely, on the 24th Oct.—N. was nominated for the office of councillor, and on the 1st Nov. was declared to be elected.

On a petition presented against N. alleging that his election was void on the ground that at the date of his nomination he had an interest in a contract with the council:

Held, that the ratification by the council of the act of the committee releasing N. from his contract as from the 19th Oct., whatever its effect may have been as between the parties themselves, did not relate back, for the purposes of removing any disqualification or so as to affect the rights of third parties such as the electors or other candidates, to the 19th Oct., so as to relieve N. from his contract as from that date; and that consequently N., having at the date of his nomination an interest in a contract with the corporation was disqualified for being elected.

ARGUMENT of questions of law reserved by a commissioner (Mr. Mansel Jones) to whom was assigned the trial of an election petition.

The petition was a petition under the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) against the return of the respondent, Mr. William James Newth, to the office of town councillor for the Tuffley ward of the city of Gloucester, which was tried before the commissioner to whom the trial of the petition was assigned, on the 29th and 30th Jan. 1901 at Gloucester.

The election was held on the 1st Nov. 1900, when the respondent was declared to be elected.

The petition alleged that the respondent, Mr. Newth, was disqualified for being nominated, and for being elected, and for being a councillor on the ground that at the time of his nomination and election he had an interest in a contract with, by, or on behalf of the council of the city, and prayed that it might be determined that the respondent William James Newth was not duly elected, and that his election was and is void.

It was proved that the council of the city of Gloucester upon the 5th Dec. 1899 advertised for certain articles for the use of the corporation during the ensuing year, and invited tenders.

The advertisement was as follows :

The Streets Committee of the Gloucester Corporation are prepared to receive tenders for the supply of the following materials for the twelve months ending the 31st Dec. 1900, namely [then followed a list of articles including "Oil, Colours, &c."]. Specifications and forms of tender may be obtained at City Surveyor's Office, Guildhall, and tenders must be sent in to Mr. R. Read, City Surveyor, Guildhall, Gloucester, on or before Wednesday, the 13th Dec. instant. Tenders must be inclosed separately in envelopes provided for the purpose, and endorsed with the name of the class of materials tendered for. The lowest or any tender will not necessarily be accepted.—Guildhall, Gloucester, 5th Dec. 1899.

On the 13th Dec. 1899 the respondent tendered for certain goods in the following form, which he had obtained from the council's office :

City of Gloucester.—To the Streets Committee.—Gentlemen,—I hereby offer to supply for the twelve months, ending the 31st Dec. 1900, the undermentioned goods as required, the best of their respective kinds, and to the entire satisfaction of the city surveyor, delivered at the Corporation Depot, Stroud-road, Gloucester, in guaranteed makers' drums or barrels sealed down.

Then followed a long list of articles and prices. It was signed by the respondent.

On the 22nd Dec. 1899 the Streets Committee resolved that it be recommended that certain tenders be accepted at the several prices therein respectively mentioned, among them being that of the respondent for oil and colours.

On the same date a letter was sent to him informing him that his tender was accepted.

On the 30th Jan. 1900, at a quarterly meeting of the council, it was resolved that the minute of the Streets Committee of the 22nd Dec. 1899 be approved, adopted, and confirmed.

From the 22nd Dec. 1899 up to and including the 20th Oct. 1900 the respondent supplied from time to time goods according to the tender when and as required by the council, and received payments for the same from time to time for a considerable amount.

On the 19th Oct. 1900 there were various accounts amounting to over 54*l.* due to him which were not all paid until the 19th Dec.

On the 19th Oct. 1900 the respondent being anxious to stand as a candidate at the forthcoming election of councillors in November, applied to the finance estates and waterworks committee (and not to the streets committee, which had risen for the day) to be relieved from his tender or contract, when the following minute and resolution of the committee was passed :

It was reported that Mr. W. J. Newth intended to offer himself as a candidate at the following elections if not prejudiced by the fact that he had given an estimate for supplying certain articles that may be required by the corporation up to the end of the year. Resolved : That subject to this minute being approved by the council Mr. Newth be released from the estimate or contract referred to as from this date.

On the 24th Oct. the respondent was nominated, and on the 1st Nov. declared to be elected to the office of councillor.

On the 30th Oct. the council resolved that the minute of the finance, estates, and waterworks committee of the 19th Oct. be approved, adopted, and confirmed.

On the above facts being proved it was contended before the commissioner by the respondent's counsel that the respondent was not disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor under sect. 12, sub-sect. (c), of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, on the ground that (1) There was no contract; (2) that if there was a contract it was rescinded before the 24th Oct.; (3) that the existence of a debt for goods supplied before the 24th Oct. and not paid for until December was not an interest in any contract within the meaning of the above section.

The commissioner determined, subject to the opinion of the High Court of Justice on the question of law hereinafter submitted, that William James Newth was not duly elected, and that his election was and is void, but he postponed granting his certificate until the question which he now submitted for the consideration of the High Court of Justice has been determined by them.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether William James Newth was disqualified for being nominated and elected and for being a councillor.

If the court should determine in the affirmative the certificate of the commissioner was to be that William James Newth was not duly elected, and that his election was and is void; and if in the negative, that he was duly elected, and that his election was and is valid.

The Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) provides :

Sect. 12.—(1) A person shall be disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor if and while he (c) Has directly or indirectly, by himself or his partner, any share or interest in any contract or employment with, by, or on behalf of the council.

H. Terrell, K.C. (L. Coward, K.C. with him) for the respondent.—The first point is that there was no contract between Mr. Newth and the corporation. It was simply an offer by him to supply certain articles and there was no consideration to support a contract or make it a contract. Before the day fixed for this election Mr. Newth withdrew this offer altogether, and a committee agreed to his withdrawing it; if it had been a binding contract he could not have withdrawn from it. There was no contract which bound the corporation to do anything whatever or take any goods from Newth, and there was no obligation on them to buy anything, even a single pennyworth from him. It was a purely unilateral arrangement not in any way binding the corporation to deal with Newth, and therefore there was no contract:

Sykes v. Dison, 9 A. & E. 693;

Burton v. Great Northern Railway Company, 9 Ex. 507.

The position is this that so long as the tender exists as a tender, the moment the corporation order anything from the person who makes the tender, then a contract is created if that is done before the tender is withdrawn. So, for each article, while the tender is existing and before it is withdrawn when the article is ordered and the order is accepted then there is a binding contract with regard to that article:

Great Northern Railway Company v. Witham, 29 L. T. Rep. 471; L. Rep. 9 C. P. 16.

There, as here, a railway company advertised for tenders, and what the court held was that where goods were ordered before the withdrawal of the tender, there was a contract. [DARLING, J.—In his judgment Brett, J. there says: "If there were no other objection, the contract between the parties would be found in the tender and the letter accepting it."] The very thing that Brett, J. there puts is that if before the tender is withdrawn an order is given, then the acceptance of the order creates a contract. There was nothing in the advertisement or in the acceptance of the tender by which the corporation bound themselves to order any oils or colours from Mr. Newth. They could go anywhere for these articles, and if they had done so, clearly the respondent would have had no remedy against them for getting these goods from any other person. They simply state that they are prepared to receive tenders and they accept his tender. That is a mere continuing order which at any time can be withdrawn. Great Northern Railway Company v. Witham (ubi sup.) is precisely the same as this case, and shows that there was no contract here unless and until the corporation ordered some particular article from Newth and he accepted the order. There would have been a contract if there had been an undertaking on the part of the corporation to take from Newth all the articles they required for the year, but there was no such undertaking. Secondly, if there was a contract it was rescinded before the 24th Oct., the day of the nomination. On the 19th Oct. the finance committee relieved the respondent of his contract, subject to the approval of the council; and the council approved on the 30th Oct., there being no meeting of the council before that date. Whether this was a contract or was not a contract, it was at an end on the 19th Oct., when the finance committee, who had as much to do with the matter as the streets committee, passed the resolution. When the resolution was confirmed on the 30th Oct., it related back to the 19th Oct., the date of the resolution of the finance committee to release the respondent. Sect. 22 (6) of the Municipal Corporations

Act 1882 shows that the finance committee had power to deal with the matter. If an agent, without the authority of his principal, does an act on behalf of the principal, and this act is afterwards confirmed and ratified by the principal, then the confirmation or ratification has relation back to the act done by the agent, and is binding on the principal as from that date:

Re Portuguese Consolidated Copper Mines Limited, 63 L. T. Rep. 428; 45 Ch. Div. 16;

Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert, 60 L. T. Rep. 687; 41 Ch. Div. 295.

In neither of these cases was there any authority at all, and in the former case the act done was an absolutely illegal act, so that both cases are stronger than the present case. These cases show that the subsequent ratification by the council on the 30th Oct. related back to the resolution of the committee on the 19th Oct., and that the respondent was released as from that date. The original contract was confirmed by the council on the 30th Jan. 1900, and related back to the 22nd Dec. 1899, and, if there is a relation back in one case, there must be a relation back in the other case. The third point is that goods had been sent in by the respondent in Sept. and Oct., but payment was not actually made until the 19th Dec. The relation of debtor and creditor which thus existed was not such an interest as to disqualify under the section. If it were, it would enable the council to keep any person out of the office, as they might order a small quantity of goods, keep the account unpaid, and so keep the person disqualified for any length of time. That clearly is not the law:

Royce v. Birley, 20 L. T. Rep. 786; L. Rep. 4 C. P. 296.

Asquith, K.C. (Ruegg, K.C. and S. H. Day with him), for the petitioners.—The words of sect. 12 are very wide; a person who has "directly or indirectly" a share or interest in any contract is disqualified. These words clearly point to this that the intention of the Legislature was that a person should be disqualified for election if his interest and his duty were likely to come into conflict. The advertisement of the 5th Dec. 1899, which is the initiation of the whole matter, provided that "the lowest or any tender will not necessarily be accepted." Two things appear in that, the desire of the corporation to have tenders sent to them and their statement that no tender will necessarily be accepted. Then the second document is the respondent's offer of the 13th Dec., and that is followed by the resolution of the streets committee on the 22nd Dec. and of their letter on the same day: "I have to inform you that your tender has been accepted." It is said that that constitutes no relation and no contract between the parties, and had no effect, but what would be the use of these tenders at all if the person can at any time withdraw from them? The obligation on the part of the corporation was that if they wanted these goods they were bound to go to the respondent and not to another person. They were not bound to go to him if they did not want the articles, but they could not go elsewhere for them, unless they had tenders with other persons for the same goods, in which case they would be confined to those with whom they had tenders. It is quite clear there was no other tender here, the words being "Oil and Colours, Mr. Newth." The contract was not unilateral,

but was a contract binding on both parties. That appears on the documents and the decisions in the cases do not help us much. In Burton v. Great Northern Railway Company (ubi sup.), there was no breach of contract, and in Great Northern Railway Company v. Witham (ubi sup.), the present point was expressly held open. Keating, J. refers to the point and Brett, J. says. "I agree that this judgment does not decide the question whether the defendant might have absolved himself from the further performance of the contract by giving notice." That case, therefore, merely left the question open and did not decide that a person could withdraw during the currency of the contract. Here both parties regarded themselves as bound; the respondent at least did so, as he asked to be released. The next point is, what was the effect of what was done on the 30th Oct. by the council, and whether it relates back to the 19th Oct. The case of Harford v. Lynskey (80 L. T. Rep. 417; (1899) 1 Q. B. 852) is important on this part of the case. There it was held that a petitioner who at the time of his nomination was interested in a contract was disqualified for nomination none the less because he might by assigning his interest in the contract have got rid of his disqualification before the date of the poll. A person, therefore, who on the day of nomination is disqualified for being elected is also disqualified for nomination, because, as Wright, J. says: "On the nomination day no one could know whether the persons nominated will at the poll be effective candidates or not." In other words you cannot alter the status which the candidates had at the date of nomination. Although ratification, according to the maxim, goes back to the act ratified, yet it is a principle of law which runs through all the cases that the ratification cannot affect prejudicially or otherwise the status or rights of third parties. Here it is a matter in which not only third parties but the public as well are interested. By sect. 22 (1) the acts of every committee are to be ratified and approved by the council. The resolution of this committee on the 19th Oct. does not purport to be anything more than a resolution to be approved by the council, and it cannot be contended that the resolution in itself, so framed, can have any effect in altering the status of parties. By sect. 41 a person who acts without being qualified incurs a penalty; if the respondents' contention were right the council could get rid of that provision by merely passing an ex post facto resolution. In Bird v. Brown (14 L. T. Rep. O. S. 399; 4 Ex. 786) it was held that you could not by ratification affect the rights of third parties. In the considered judgment of the court it is said that for the doctrine of ratification to apply "the act of ratification must take place at a time, and under circumstances, when the ratifying party might himself have lawfully done the act which he ratifies." Applying that here, the ratifying party is the council, and, unless at the time the ratification takes place the council could lawfully have done the Act the ratification has no effect. The ratification may be good as between the two parties either to give a right back or to take one away. That is confined to the two parties and cannot affect the rights of third parties or of the whole of the electors of the constituency. The case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.) is doubted in Fry on Specific Performance, 3rd edit., p. 137, and in note A, and was criticised adversely in a recent case in the Privy Council, where, however, it was not necessary to decide the point. With regard to the third point, the question is whether when a person supplies goods under a contract which is no longer executory on his part, but the payment has not in fact been made—a relation of debtor and creditor existing—and when that is the position of the parties, it is possible to say that such person is not interested in the contract. It is impossible to say that such a person is not interested in the contract, or that he has not an interest which might conflict with his duty, as stated in Royce v. Birley (ubi sup.), which applies to executory contracts. If a councillor has any pecuniary interest in a matter he cannot vote: (sect. 22 (3)). The language of sect. 12 is still wider, and the present case comes directly within the section as, while the debt subsists, the person still has an interest in the contract which may conflict with his duty.

Terrell, K.C. in reply.

DARLING, J.—This case arises out of a municipal election for the city of Gloucester. Mr. Newth was nominated and was elected, and it is objected that he was disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor by reason of sect. 12, sub-sect. (c), of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882. Mr. Newth was a person who dealt in oils, colours, &c., and at the end of the year 1899 an advertisement was put in the papers to the effect that the Streets Committee of the Gloucester Corporation were prepared to receive tenders for the supply of the following articles for the twelve months ending the 31st Dec. 1900. To that advertisement Mr. Newth wrote this answer: "I hereby offer to supply for the twelve months ending the 31st Dec. 1900 the undermentioned goods," &c. Upon that the tenders were considered by the committee who recommended to the council that certain tenders should be accepted at the several prices therein mentioned, and amongst these tenders was one for oils and colours from Mr. Newth. That minute of the committee was approved, adopted, and confirmed at the quarterly meeting of the council on the 30th Jan. 1900; but before that there had been a letter written by the city surveyor to Mr. Newth on the 22nd Dec., that the tender had been accepted. Upon that it is said that Mr. Newth was disqualified for being elected, because he had a share or interest in a contract with the corporation; and if it were a contract then undoubtedly he had such an interest and was disqualified. But it is said on behalf of Mr. Newth that this was not a contract at all, that it was a mere statement that if called upon to supply certain quantities of oils or colours he would supply them at certain prices, but that he was not called upon to supply them unless he was asked to do so, and that the corporation were under no kind of obligation to buy any oils or colours from him. I should agree that there was no obligation on the part of the corporation if that was not a contract at all. If they were not bound to anything on their side, it seems to me that there was no consideration and that it would not amount to a contract. The question is, was that so. I do not think that there is any direct authority upon the point. Several cases have been cited, and the one on which most reliance was placed on behalf of Mr. Newth was Great Northern Railway Company v. Witham (ubi sup.). In that case there had been a tender like the present which had been accepted, but there was something more. An order had been sent, and the question was whether the order which had been sent should be executed and whether the execution of it could have been enforced. I think the judges in deciding that case distinctly left this question open, the question we have to decide. Keating, J. there says: "If before the order was given the defendant had given notice to the company that he would not perform the agreement, it might be that he would have been justified in so doing." Therefore I think that Keating, J. purposely refrained from deciding this point. Brett, J. also says: "I agree that this judgment does not decide the question whether the defendant might have absolved himself from the further performance of the contract by giving notice." Therefore it seems to me that so far as the cases cited to us are concerned we are left without any definite authority on the question before us. We have therefore to look at the documents in the case for ourselves. With regard to the advertisement, I think that that amounts to this: That the streets committee were prepared to receive tenders for all the goods of those specified kinds they would require during the twelve months ending the 31st Dec. The supply of the materials for the twelve months is the definite thing which the streets committee said they wanted to have the tender for. Then Mr. Newth said: "I offer to supply the under-mentioned goods as required." That is to say, he would supply such articles as he dealt in—oils and colours—as were included in the supply for the twelve months, whenever he was required to do so by the corporation, and he would supply them "at the following prices." "As required" means "as intimated to me by order that they are wanted." Upon that comes this letter, written on behalf of the corporation: "I have to inform you that your tender has been accepted." I think that means this: "We accept your offer to supply such articles as we intimate to you are a part of the supply wanted during the twelve months at the price you have stated." I think there was an obligation on the part of the corporation to buy those articles from Mr. Newth. I do not think that the corporation would have been justified in simply treating that tender of Mr. Newth's as a mere price list, and going where they pleased to buy what they wanted. If that is so, then that is a contract. I do not say I feel certain about it, because I cannot see that we have any real authority upon the point, and because the question was expressly reserved and left open by the two judges who decided the case of Great Northern Railway Company v. Witham (ubi sup.). But still, reading the present case for myself, I come to the conclusion that it is a contract. There is an obligation on both sides, and it is clearly a contract in which Mr. Newth has an interest. It is said, however, that the contract was put an end to. Mr. Newth was nominated for the council on the 24th Oct., but on the 19th, he being anxious to stand as a candidate, applied to the finance committee to be relieved from his tender or contract, and the following resolution of that committee was passed: "That subject to this minute being approved by the council, Mr. Newth be released from the estimate or contract referred to as from this date." That would be as from the 19th Oct. 1900. On the 30th Oct. the council resolved that the foregoing minute be approved, adopted, and confirmed. On the one hand, it was argued that there was a contract, and it must be taken, as I have already said, that there was a contract. On the other hand, it was argued that the contract was put an end to on the 30th Oct. as from the 19th Oct., because the ratification by the council on the 30th Oct. of what was done on the 19th related back to the 19th, and that the contract absolutely ceased and determined on the 19th Oct., and that, therefore, when Mr. Newth was nominated on the 24th Oct., he was not interested in any contract, because there was none. A good deal has been said with regard to how far the ratification by one party of what has been done by another will relate back. If Mr. Newth had not been a candidate at all, and if this had been a matter simply between the man who had undertaken to supply oils and the corporation, I am not going to say that that might not have been a perfectly good putting an end to the contract on the 19th Oct. by reason of what was done on the 19th as ratified by what was done on the 30th Oct. I think, however, that there are considerations in this case which make a difference from a mere ratification of something which was done between the parties themselves to the contract. The question is whether there was a contract subsisting on the 24th Oct. so as to produce a disqualification in Mr. Newth on that day. As between the parties themselves—Mr. Newth and the corporation—it might possibly have been put an end to on the 19th Oct. so that neither could sue the other after that date. If one or other had been sued between the 19th and the 30th—that is, before the ratification—I do not think it necessary to attempt to decide what would have been the consequences, but it is clear that difficulties would have arisen. In this case, it seems to me, we are not dealing with a mere contract between two traders; we are dealing with a question which has received judicial interpretation in the case of Harford v. Lynskey (ubi sup.). In that case Wright, J. said that the nomination was, for that purpose, an essential part of the election, and if there were no competitors, it of itself constituted the election by virtue of the express words of sect. 56. Then he went on to say that a different construction might produce much confusion, and he indicated what that might be. On the 24th Oct., when Mr. Newth was nominated, it was entirely uncertain whether that contract was put an end to or not as between the parties. Supposing that on the 30th Oct. the council had said "We do not ratify what has been done by the finance committee" it could not then have been contended that the contract was put an end to, for it would have been an enduring contract, and nobody could have said on the 24th Oct. whether Mr. Newth was or was not a person interested in a contract. That was not decided, even as between him and the corporation, until six days later. I think, therefore that the ratification as between Mr. Newth and the corporation cannot put an end to the contract to this extent; that it cannot affect the rights of third parties, such as are the electors of the city of Gloucester and such as are any other candidates who might be nominated for the seat for which Mr. Newth was a candidate. It might very well be that there was only one other candidate, as in Harford v. Lynskey (ubi sup.), and if Mr. Newth were disqualified the other candidate would be entitled to election at once without a poll. Therefore, it seems to me, we cannot hold that the resolution of the 19th Oct. by the finance committee, and the ratification on the 30th Oct. by the council, put an end to the contract so as to qualify Mr. Newth on the 24th Oct., when, if they had not ratified the resolution as they did on the 30th, Mr. Newth would have been disqualified. It is not necessary to go into the general law as to ratification and consider whether the case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.) is really as good an authority as it has been represented to us, or whether it is not. It seems to me that that point is provided for in the case of Bird v. Brown (ubi sup.), and also is practically provided for in the definition of what ratification can do and how it affects the rights of third parties in certain instances, in the case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.), and in the judgment delivered by Cotton, L.J. There is one other point. Mr. Newth had supplied some oil which was not paid for. It was supplied before the 19th Oct.—that is, before the time when he desired to become a candidate, and up to December it had not been paid for. No doubt there was an existing debt due from the corporation to Mr. Newth, and it is contended that that in itself amounts to such a contract as to be a disqualification within the words of the section. But, in the view I take of the first and second points, it is not necessary to decide the third point which I have just mentioned. I think any judgment on that point ought to be carefully considered, because the difficulties of holding either way are many. Taking the view I have taken on the first and second points, my expressions on the third point would be something like an obiter dictum. I prefer, therefore, not to indicate any opinion as to how the third point should be decided.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion on all three points. As to the first point, whether at any time prior to the supposed determination of it, there was a contract, I confess I entertain no doubt at all. I quite agree that it depends on the words of the documents used in a particular case, and that there might be documents somewhat similar to those now in question, which do not amount to a contract—that there might be what is called a unilateral contract only; or, on the other hand, the documents might simply show that which becomes a contract only as an order is given for particular goods needed. All that might exist in such documents. On the other hand, applying our knowledge of business to what we know is the function of the parties in such a case as this, a very little indeed in such documents is quite sufficient to turn the transaction into a contract. In the present case I think there is quite enough to do so. First there was a proposal by the Corporation of Gloucester for certain things to be sent to them, and there was an offer made in response to that. Then there was an acceptance, which made a contract, subject only to the question of what was the subject-matter of it. It seems to me perfectly clear that the subject-matter of this contract was to continue for the year—to supply for that period at the orders of the corporation their requirements in respect of a particular article. Consequently there was an order or a contract between the parties for the supply for a year of that oil and those colours, which Mr. Newth tendered for. Then the second point is the one which, to my mind, is a very real difficulty in the case, as it depends almost entirely, as it seems to me, upon the case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.). That case was considered recently in the Privy Council in the case of Fleming v. Bank of New Zealand (83 L. T. Rep. 1; (1900) A. C. 577) and in the view the Privy Council ultimately took of the facts of the case it was not necessary to give any decision on the point whether the decision in Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.), is a binding authority. There is, however, quite enough in the judgment to show that a good deal of doubt was entertained about the case. Judgment was delivered by Lord Lindley, who was himself one of the judges in the case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.), and in that judgment, speaking of the case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.), he says: "The decision referred to presents difficulties; and their Lordships reserve their liberty to reconsider it if on some future occasion it should become necessary to do so." It is quite clear, therefore, that the Privy Council were not thoroughly satisfied with the case, and that they saw that it presented great difficulties if it were to be treated as of general application. It seems to me that we, sitting in this court, should be bound by that case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert (ubi sup.), and all I say is that it presents some difficulty, but it seems to me to establish this and this only: that after there has been a ratification, then the rights of the parties to the contract, or the supposed contract, are to be adjusted between those parties as if there had been the prior authority. Consequently, as between these parties, when the question arises after the confirmation everything must be decided then as if there had been the prior authority. That is to say: If in this particular case any question arose between the parties after the 30th Oct., any such question arising between them on the 30th Oct., whether as to acts between the 19th and 30th Oct., or not, must be decided on the footing that the contract was put an end to on the 19th Oct., because it had been in a preliminary way put an end to as from that date, subject to the confirmation. That is as between the parties. But it is quite clear that there are exceptions to the rule. If anybody has acquired rights in the meanwhile, it is apparent from the case of Bolton and Partners Limited v. Lambert, that that is part of the exceptions which are there referred to. Consequently, it seems to me that when as between any other parties than the immediate parties to the contract, or in any question in which anybody else is interested, the question as to the rights of third parties has to be considered and has to be considered prior to the confirmation. It is quite clear then that we must look at the real facts. In the present case the question is whether or not on the 24th Oct. the respondent was qualified or disqualified. At that date there had been a resolution passed—an act done by the committee—which might or might not be confirmed, and, as the case of Harford v. Lynskey (ubi sup.) shows, a man at his nomination must be either qualified or disqualified. At that time it is impossible to say that Mr. Newth was not disqualified. After that particular time he still had in fact—indirectly at all events—a share or interest in the contract, because his rights might or might not be governed by something which was done afterwards. That being so, it seems to me, in any view of the case, the respondent was disqualified by being a party to a contract, which contract was in existence, so far at least as was necessary to preserve a kind of interest, on the 24th Oct., at the time of his nomination. I agree that it is not necessary to decide the third point, and on the whole it is better not to decide it. It does seem to me there is a substantial difference between the words of this Act of Parliament and those of the Act which were considered in Royse v. Birley (ubi sup.). There is a substantial difference, and conclusions might possibly be drawn both ways, and on the whole therefore it is better not to decide it, or say any more about it.

BLAND (pet.) v. BUCHANAN (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

BLAND (pet.) v. BUCHANAN (resp.). (a)

Election petition—Election of mayor—Vote given by councillor afterwards held disqualified—Casting vote given where there is inequality of votes—Mayor continued under provisional order—Right of mayor to give original vote—Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 15, 42 (1), 61 (4), 87 (1) (d), 102.

A vote given for a candidate in the election of mayor under the Municipal Corporations Acts by a councillor who upon petition is afterwards declared by the court to be disqualified for being elected a councillor on the ground that at the time of his nomination he had an interest in a contract with the council is a bad and invalid vote, notwithstanding that such vote is given before the decision of the court declaring him to be disqualified for being elected a councillor.

Nell v. Longbottom (70 L. T. Rep. 499; (1894) 1 Q. B. 767) followed.

The chairman at a meeting of the council for the election of mayor may give a casting vote although there is not actual equality—which means equality of valid votes—in the numbers of the votes as announced, if there is reason to believe that one of the votes may be impeached; and if by the subsequent striking out of an invalid vote there comes to be equality of valid votes, then the casting vote so given will be a good and effective vote, but if there still remains an inequality of valid votes, then the casting vote will be bad.

(a) Reported by W. W. OKE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

By a provisional order the boundaries of a city were extended, and for the purposes of the election of a town council for the enlarged city it was provided that all the councillors and aldermen of the old or existing city should go out of office, but there was no provision that the mayor should go out of office. The order provided that the mayor of the existing city or such other persons as the Local Government Board should appoint should perform the duties of mayor under the Municipal Corporations Acts, and that the mayor should act as returning officer at the election.

The councillors and aldermen having been elected, the mayor of the old city, who had been a councillor, but who had not been re-elected, presided at the election for mayor, and gave an original vote for one of the candidates:

Held, that the original vote so given by the mayor was good, as there was nothing in the provisional order to take away from the mayor the right which, apart from the order, he would have had under the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, as an outgoing mayor to give an original vote in the election of mayor.

ARGUMENT of questions of law reserved by the commissioner to whom was assigned the trial of an election petition.

The petition was a petition under the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) against the return of the respondent (Mr. Albert Buchanan) to the office of mayor of the city of Gloucester, which was tried before Mr. Mansel Jones, the commissioner to whom the trial of the petition was assigned on the 30th and 31st Jan 1901 at Gloucester.

The petition prayed that it might be declared that Albert Buchanan was not duly elected and that his election was null and void, and that the petitioner, Samuel Bland, was duly elected and ought to have been declared elected.

It was proved on the trial that on the 9th Nov. 1900 the petitioner and respondent were candidates for the office of mayor; that William James Newth purported to vote for the respondent, and his vote was counted as being a good vote for the respondent. That Frank Treasure, who had been elected mayor on the 9th Nov. 1899, presided as chairman at the election and purported to vote thereat for the respondent in the first instance, and counted the vote so given as being a good vote for the respondent. That sixteen votes, including those of Newth (as to the validity of whose vote the learned commissioner had already reserved a question in the case of Ford and others v. Newth), Treasure, and the respondent, were purported to have been given for the respondent and fifteen were given for the petitioner; and that Treasure, the chairman, thinking that Newth's vote might be impeached, purported to give a casting vote for the respondent, and counted this casting vote as a good vote.

By the Local Government Board's Provisional Orders Confirmation (No. 14) Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. clxxxiii.) the area of the city of Gloucester was extended.

By art. 9 it is provided that

For the purposes of the election of a town council for the city in pursuance of the Municipal Corporations Acts in the month of November 1900 the following provisions shall apply: (a) The town clerk and the mayor of the existing city, or such other persons as the Local Government Board shall appoint, shall perform the duties devolving upon the town clerk and mayor respectively under the Municipal Corporations Acts, and the mayor of the existing city or such other person as he shall appoint shall be the returning officer at the election for each ward. (b) Thirty councillors of the city shall be elected on the first day of November 1900, and ten aldermen of the city shall be elected on the ninth day of November 1900. (c) Notwithstanding anything in the Municipal Corporations Acts to the contrary, all the councillors of the existing city who shall be in office on the first day of November 1900 shall go out of office on that date, and all the aldermen of the existing city who shall be in office on the eighth day of November 1900 shall go out of office on that date, and all such councillors and aldermen shall be eligible for election as councillors on the first day of November 1900.

Mr. Treasure, who had been a councillor up to the 1st Nov. did not avail himself of that provision, and was not re-elected among the thirty councillors who were elected on the 1st Nov.

At the conclusion of the trial, after hearing the arguments of counsel, the commissioner determined, subject to the opinion of the High Court of Justice on the question of law hereinafter submitted, that Mr. Treasure was entitled to vote as mayor in the first instance, but that the second so-called vote which he gave was bad. He postponed granting a certificate until the questions which he now submitted for the consideration of the High Court had been determined by them.

The questions were: (1) Was Mr. Treasure, as mayor, entitled to vote in the first instance? (2) Was he, under the circumstances above stated, entitled to give a casting vote?

If the court should answer both the above questions in the affirmative, the certificate of the commissioner was to be that the respondent was duly elected and the petition dismissed, whether Newth's vote was good or bad.

If the court should answer the first of the above questions in the affirmative, and the second in the negative, his certificate was to be that the respondent was duly elected, and the petition was to be dismissed if Newth's vote was good, but be allowed if Newth's vote was bad.

If the court should answer both questions in the negative then his certificate was to be that the respondent was not duly elected, and that his election was void, and the petition was to be allowed, whether Newth's vote was good or bad.

If the court should answer the first of the above questions in the negative and the second in the affirmative, his certificate was to be that the respondent was duly elected, and the petition was to be dismissed if Newth's vote was good, but be allowed if Newth's vote was bad.

Newth, who in his office of councillor had voted as a councillor in the mayor's election for the respondent, was afterwards declared by the court to be disqualified for being elected and for being a councillor by reason of his having an interest in a contract with the corporation: (see Ford v. Newth, ante, p. 153). The question of the validity of his vote in the election of mayor, though not in terms left as one of the questions for the court, was considered to have been intended to be so left to them and to be raised. Consequently the validity of Newth's vote for the respondent was the first question now argued.

The Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) provides:

Sect. 10.—(2) The council shall consist of the mayor, aldermen, and councillors.

Sect. 15.—(1) The mayor shall be a fit person elected by the council from among the aldermen or councillors or persons qualified to be such. (3) The term of office of the mayor shall be one year, but he shall continue in office until his successor has accepted office and made and subscribed the required declaration.

Sect. 42.—(1) The acts and proceedings of a person in possession of a corporate office, and acting therein, shall, notwithstanding his disqualification or want of qualification, be as valid and effectual as if he had been qualified.

Sect. 61.—As to the Election of Mayor.—(4) In case of equality of votes, the chairman, although not entitled to vote in the first instance, shall have the casting vote.

Sect. 87.—As to Election Petitions.—(1) A municipal election may be questioned by an election petition on the ground—(c) That the person whose election is questioned was at the time of the election disqualified; or (d) that he was not duly elected by a majority of lawful votes.

Sect. 102. Where a candidate who has been elected to a corporate office is, by a certificate of an election court or a decision of the High Court, declared not to have been duly elected, acts done by him in execution of the office, before the time when the certificate or decision is certified to the town clerk, shall not be invalidated by reason of that declaration.

Henry Terrell, K.C. (L. Coward, K.C. and Dalry with him) for the respondent.—The first question is as to the validity of Newth's vote, and the question is whether Newth's vote is a good vote under sect. 102 of the Act. The matter was considered in Nell v. Longbottom (70 L. T. Rep. 499; (1894) 1 Q. B. 767), and it was there decided under sect. 42 (1) (by Mathew and Cave, J.J., in a considered judgment read by Cave, J.), that on an election petition on the ground that the respondent was not elected by a majority of lawful votes, you might raise the question of the legality of the vote of a person who purported to vote by virtue of holding a corporate office. That decision is based on sect. 42 (1) and sect. 87 (1) (d) of the Act, and although the commissioner would be bound by it, this court would not be bound by it, but can review it. The question in that case arose under sect. 42 (1); the question in this case arises under sect. 102, which is different. Sect. 102, when read with sect. 87 (1) (d), shows that Newth's vote was a lawful vote by virtue of sect. 102, which expressly says that if a person, who has been elected to a corporate office, is afterwards declared by the court not to have been duly elected, his acts done in execution of his office before the decision is certified to the town clerk "shall not be invalidated by reason of that declaration," and by sect. 100 (4) the High Court would have power to stay the proceedings. Sect. 102 in terms applies here, as Newth was elected to the corporate office of councillor, and although he was afterwards declared by the court to be disqualified for being elected, yet before that decision was given or certified he did this act—namely, he gave this vote in the election of the mayor, "in execution of the office" of councillor, and therefore by that section that act—his giving of that vote—was "not invalidated by reason of the declaration" declaring him not to be elected. The section goes much further than sect. 42 (1), which simply provides that if a person who is disqualified is elected and he acts for the corporation, then nobody with whom the corporation has contracted through him, shall suffer. Sect. 15 (1) shows that the election of the mayor by the council is an act done by the councillors in their corporate capacity; and therefore Newth's vote for the mayor in execution of his office was a good vote under sect. 102, notwithstanding that he had at the time a contract on which he was subsequently declared disqualified. It would also be for the same reason a good vote under sect. 42 (1) but for the decision in Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.), as this section renders the acts of Newth in his corporate capacity valid. It was therefore a valid vote under either section, but especially so under sect. 102, and as he held this corporate office at the time, the vote cannot be questioned. There are the two cases, mere disqualification (which would come under sect. 42 (1), and a declaration by the court of such disqualification (which would come under sect. 102), and the effect of the two sections is that, notwithstanding the disqualification in the one case and the declaration of such disqualification in the other, acts done in a corporate capacity in the meantime are valid. Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) is upon this point directly at variance with these provisions of the statute. Sect. 42 (1) provides that the act done "shall be as valid and effectual" as if the person had been qualified; and "valid" here means "lawful," and when sect. 87 speaks of a person not being elected by a majority of lawful votes, it means valid votes. Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) would have been right if it had been confined to the case of a person who was not the holder of a corporate office giving a vote, or of a person giving a vote who was forbidden by the Act to vote—as, for instance, an outgoing alderman voting in the election of alderman, which he is forbidden to do by sect. 60 (3); but if the vote is given by a person who holds a corporate office, and who by virtue of his corporate office is entitled to give and gives that vote, then that vote is a valid and lawful vote by sects. 42 (1) and 102. That case, therefore, ought not to be followed.

BLAND (pet.) v. BUCHANAN (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Aquith, K.C. (Ruegg, K.C. and S. H. Day with him) for the petitioner.—With regard to the validity of Newth's vote, the case is absolutely concluded by Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.), which is a stronger case than the present. In that case, in the election of mayor, one vote was given by a councillor named Griffin who, at the time of his election as councillor and when he gave the vote in question, held an office under, and was interested in a contract with, the council. In a petition against the mayor the court held the vote bad, and yet it was a vote given by a councillor while acting in his corporate office of councillor. That case was all the stronger, as there was no petition against Griffin that he had not been duly elected, and no court had declared him disqualified for being elected a councillor. Here there was a petition against Newth, and he was declared to be disqualified for being a councillor. If Griffin's vote as a councillor was declared bad, although there was no petition against him and no court had declared him disqualified as a councillor, much more ought Newth's vote as a councillor to be declared bad when on a petition against him this court has declared him disqualified for being elected or being a councillor. Sect. 42 (1) carries the matter as far as sect. 102, and in fact much further. There could not be wider words than those in sect. 42, and the well-known object of the section was to protect persons who might have contracts or dealings with persons in the corporation, and to prevent those dealings being invalidated if such members of the corporation were afterwards declared to be disqualified. So far as sect. 42 (1) is concerned, Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) is absolutely conclusive that this vote is bad; and clearly the matter is not affected in the respondent's favour by sect. 102, because that section merely says that the act done shall not be invalidated "by reason of that declaration." This vote is not rendered invalid "by reason of that declaration"—that is, by reason of the declaration whereby Newth was declared to be disqualified. It would have been equally open to question apart from that declaration altogether. Therefore, if Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) is rightly decided, this court must decide as to Newth's vote in the petitioner's favour, and it would be a strong thing for this court not to follow that case. By sect. 7 a municipal election is defined as an election to a corporate office—that is, to every corporate office—and by sect. 87 (1) it may be questioned on the ground (d) that the person was not elected by a majority of lawful votes. If sect. 42 (1) is to be read as validating every act done by a councillor, then no office can be effectually questioned by election petition under this sub-section. Suppose the whole or the major part of the councillors were disqualified by having contracts, then if the argument for the respondent be right, it would be impossible to question the election of the mayor or aldermen whom the councillors had put into office. It is conceded that you could get rid of the councillors if persons voted for them who had no right to vote, but if the argument be right, you could not get rid of the nominees of these councillors. The case of Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) was rightly decided, and there is no sufficient ground for departing from it. [DARLING, J.—We think that Newth's vote was not a valid vote, but we do not propose to give our reasons for that until we give our judgment on the whole case.] The effect of holding Newth's vote bad is to bring into consideration the two votes of the mayor. If both these votes are good the respondent is seated; if both are bad the petitioner is seated, and if one is good and one bad the election is invalid. Both the original and the casting vote of the mayor are bad. First, as to the original vote, if this had not been specifically dealt with by the provisional order it would have been a good vote. Sect. 10 (2) and sect. 15 (3) make this clear. The latter section says that the mayor shall continue in office until his successor has accepted office. I agree that the effect of those two sections would in ordinary cases be to give the outgoing mayor a right to take part in the election and to give an original vote. The sole question is whether that has been altered by the provisional order, and art. 9 is the one on which the whole matter turns. By sub-sect. (c) all councillors—including the mayor in his capacity of councillor—ceased to be councillors on the 1st Nov., so that the mayor had ceased to exist or to hold office as a councillor on the 1st Nov. He was by the order continued as mayor, but only to a limited extent which is defined by the article. He, or the person appointed by the Local Government Board, was to be returning officer for the election of the town council. He remains mayor only as returning officer, unless the Local Government Board appoint some other person to act as returning officer, in which case he does not even remain as returning officer. He is retained as mayor only for this special purpose; but I agree that if it were not for these special provisions he would have remained mayor until his successor was appointed. He was never mayor of the new or extended city, of the entity which came into existence for the first time on the 1st Nov., and we cannot apply to that state of things the provisions of the Act of 1882, which presuppose an existing and continuing thing. He had no statutory right at all, and no right to give this original vote. As to the casting vote, Newth's vote being disallowed, if the original vote of the mayor was bad there would be inequality and the question of the casting vote would not arise. Sect. 61 (4) provides that in the election of mayor "in case of equality of votes" the chairman shall have the casting vote. The casting vote, therefore, is only to be given when there is "equality of votes." When the mayor gave this casting vote there was not an equality of votes, as the voting then was sixteen to fifteen. At common law there is no such thing as a casting vote; it is the creature of statute, and can only be given in the event and subject to the conditions which the statute lays down. In this case it can only be given when, on adding up the votes, there is actual equality of votes. If the votes given are the votes of those who are presumptively entitled to vote, then the chairman has no right to speculate as to whether the votes may afterwards become equal by some being struck out, or to give a contingent or hypothetical casting vote which may be saved up to be used at some future time if and when required. There being an inequality of votes at the time, the casting vote was therefore bad.

BLAND (pet.) v. BUCHANAN (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

Terrell, K.C. (having been previously heard in reply as to Newth's vote).—Art. 9 of the order provides that the mayor of the existing city is to perform the duties of mayor under the Act of 1882. That Act enacts in sect. 15 (3) that an outgoing mayor is to continue in office until his successor is appointed. The Act therefore imposes on the outgoing mayor the duties of mayor until his successor is appointed. Applying the provisions of the provisional order to that state of things, the mayor of the existing city is to perform all the duties of mayor under the Municipal Corporations Acts for the purposes of this election. One of these duties is to vote and take part in the election, and he is mayor for the purposes of the election just as much as if the boundaries had not been extended. It would be an absurd construction of the order to hold that it takes away the original vote which the Act in express terms gives to an outgoing mayor, without putting any other person in the place of the mayor. The original vote was therefore good. As to the casting vote, the equality of votes which in sect. 61 (4) gives the right to the casting vote, means an equality of valid votes and not an equality merely of those who purport to vote. It is a very reasonable thing for the chairman to say, as he and Newth vote the same way, "If Newth's vote is good I need not give my vote, but if it is held to be bad then there would be equality, and I give my casting vote." The casting vote given under such circumstances is good.

DARLING, J.—In this case the first point that was argued for the respondent was that the vote given by Mr. Newth upon the question of the election of the mayor was a good vote. Mr. Newth was upon petition held by the commissioner to be disqualified for being a candidate or for being elected as a councillor; and upon appeal we have held that Mr. Newth was so disqualified because he had a contract with the corporation of Gloucester; and therefore, one would suppose, that Mr. Newth was a person who would not be in a position to elect somebody else. But it is said for the respondent that Mr. Newth's vote cannot be questioned, and that that is so by reason of sect. 42 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882. That section has been the subject of a decision which was cited to us—namely, the decision in the case of Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.)—and, if that decision is right, it appears to us that the argument for the respondent entirely fails, and I think counsel for the respondent admits that himself. But he contends that Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) was wrongly decided, and that it is not binding upon us. It may be, strictly speaking, that it is not binding upon us, and I do not put my judgment upon the ground that it is. I think, however, that it was rightly decided, and for that reason I think that Mr. Newth's vote can be questioned, and, having been questioned, it can be held to be bad—not only that his election can be held to be bad as we have held, but that the vote which he gave upon the question of who should be mayor can be held to be bad. Therefore I am of opinion that Mr. Newth's vote should be disallowed in counting the votes as to whether there were fifteen or sixteen. The next point arises in this way: There being a question in the election of the new mayor of the enlarged city of Gloucester, the person who had been mayor of the old city of Gloucester, which was smaller than the present one, voted, and it was contended for the respondent that he had a right to vote, and that his original vote was good. Counsel for the petitioner, on the other hand, says that his original vote was bad, but admits that, if it depended on the statute alone, by sects. 10 and 15, sub-sect. (3) the original vote of the mayor would be a good vote; but he says it is bad, and for this reason, that the general law under which it would be good has been reversed in that respect by the provisional order which was made last year, and the object of which was this: The boundaries of Gloucester were being enlarged and a corporation was to be given to the enlarged city, and for that purpose it was necessary that the corporation of the old and smaller city of Gloucester should come to an end, and the provisional order provided that that should be done. It provided that the old councillors should cease to exist on a given day, and that the old aldermen should cease to exist on a given day. It did not say in so many words that the mayor should cease to exist, but it provided for the matter in art. 9. [His Lordship read art. 9.] That article did not take away from the mayor the title of mayor, and he remained mayor by title at all events; but counsel for the petitioner says that, notwithstanding that, it destroyed all his functions as mayor, and that he was preserved in order to be a returning officer, and in order to be nothing else. Let us see what he was to do. The mayor was to act "for the purposes of the election of a town council," and he was to "perform the duties devolving upon the mayor under the Municipal Corporations Acts." One of the duties devolving upon the mayor under the Municipal Corporations Acts was to sit and preside at the election of the new aldermen and to vote for the new mayor. He was, under those Acts, to be not merely the returning officer for the return of the town council. If that had been so, no doubt he could not have given his original vote at all; but he had something else to do as "duties devolving upon the mayor under the Municipal Corporations Acts"—that is, by reason of the sections applying to the election of mayor and aldermen, which have been cited to us. It is quite true that apparently the Local Government Board could have appointed somebody to perform these duties, and, if they had actually done so, I think a very much graver question than arises now would have arisen. If they had appointed some person to perform these duties for him, it would have been arguable that the mayor would have been entirely deprived of some or all his duties under the Municipal Corporations Acts. It may be that he would only have been deprived of such duties as fell upon the mayor as returning officer upon the election of a town council; or it may be that he would have been deprived of all the duties in electing a town council under the Municipal Corporations Acts. However that may be, the question does not arise before us here, as the Local Government Board did not appoint anybody, and the mayor was left to perform the duties. In what capacity was he left? He was still mayor by title; he was the returning officer at the election of town councillors, and the only question is, Was he to perform the duties devolving upon the mayor for the purposes of the election of a town council under the Municipal Corporations Acts? It is not only a person who is called a town councillor who is part of the town council; the mayor himself is part of the town council, and the first thing he was engaged in was the election of mayor. It seems to me that these words do put upon him the doing of something not only as returning officer, but as mayor, and that when he took part in the election of the new mayor, although he was the mayor of the old corporation, which had power in the restricted district and which had gone, this provisional order did not deprive him, and was not intended to deprive him, of the power which he would have had under the Municipal Corporations Acts of giving a vote in the election of mayor. I therefore think his original vote was a good vote. The next question is as to his casting vote. If his original vote was a good vote, as things turned out, it made an equality of votes for the mayor—that is, if Newth's vote was held to be bad and was struck off. If Mr. Newth's vote was held to be good, then there was not an equality of valid votes. Mr. Newth had voted, and there appeared not to be an equality, but it was perfectly well known that Mr. Newth's vote was challenged and that there was a petition against it; and the minute which has been read to us shows that it was considered at the time whether Mr. Newth's vote was a good vote or not, so that there would or would not be an equality of votes according as Mr. Newth's vote was held to be bad or good. Thereupon the mayor said he would give a casting vote. That was equivalent to his saying: "I will give a casting vote if there is an equality of votes; if there is not an equality of votes, there can be no casting vote, because it only arises when there is equality." But, as it turned out, Mr. Newth's vote being struck out there was equality; but then, it is said that the chairman could not give a casting vote of a contingent character, and that he could only give a casting vote if there is equality upon the counting of the number of the voters who have voted, supposing they are equally divided on one side and the other. I do not think that is the meaning of the provision which says that when the number of votes is equal on each side a casting vote may be given. I think that means that a casting vote may be given when the number of valid votes is equal, and I think that a casting vote may be given to take effect if the number of valid votes is equal, but not to be a vote of any kind if the number of valid votes is not equal. Therefore it seems to me that Mr. Newth's vote was bad, that the mayor's original vote was good, and that resulting in equality, his casting vote was good, and therefore that the person for whom he voted was elected by a majority of one. That will amount to a judgment for the respondent on this petition. Then the only other matter is as to whether there should be an appeal. As I have said, I think the case of Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) was rightly decided; but it is a grave question, and I think there should be leave to appeal in this case upon all three points as to the validity of Newth's vote and the ex-mayor's original and casting votes. This leave is given upon the assumption that the appeal will be proceeded with at once, because, as this is a case where a number of persons are elected for a short time only, obviously, unless the appeal is proceeded with at once, and unless the appellant could get the Court of Appeal to expedite the appeal, it would be perfectly useless to have it decided a year hence. Therefore, it is allowed on the assumption that notice of appeal will be given at once, and the Court of Appeal asked to fix a day for the hearing of it.

CHANNELL, J.—I have very little to add, as I agree with my brother's judgment upon all the points. The only thing I wish to add is this: That I think it right for us to follow this case of Nell v. Longbottom (ubi sup.) quite apart from whether in one sense it is strictly binding upon us. I think that in a matter where two judges on an election petition have given a judgment which is directly in point, whether or not it is technically binding upon us, it would be very wrong for us to decide that that was bad, unless, of course, there had been some other cases decided since or something to throw doubt upon the case. That being so, I have not thought it necessary to consider whether or not that case is in my opinion right; and in what I say I certainly do not wish it to be understood that I have formed any opinion that it is wrong. I do think, however, that the reasoning upon which it went is inconclusive. It seems to me that the reasoning upon which it went is entirely this: That, first of all, sect. 42, sub-sect. 1, says that "the acts and proceedings of a person in possession of a corporate office, and acting therein, shall, notwithstanding his disqualification or want of qualification, be as valid and effectual as if he had been qualified"; and then it is pointed out in the judgment that a subsequent section—sect. 87, sub-sect. 1 (d)—provides that "A municipal election may be questioned by an election petition on the ground that the person whose election is questioned was not elected by a majority of lawful votes." The court seem to think that the provision in this latter section shows that sect. 42 does not prevent the vote in such a case as this from being questioned on an election petition. If those two provisions covered the same ground, the reasoning would be conclusive; but there are a great many cases that can be suggested other than those coming under sect. 42, sub-sect. 1, in which a municipal election petition might be presented on the ground that the person elected had not a majority of lawful votes—for instance, the case of the election of a town councillor by the burgesses at large, where, of course, there is no question of any disqualified person acting in fact in a corporate office and his acts being made good, or the case where somebody had voted who had been prohibited from voting as by having a pecuniary interest; therefore there are many cases which will account for the provision in sect. 87 that an election petition may be presented on the ground there specified other than those cases which would come under sect. 42, sub-sect. 1, according to the operation of that section contended for by the respondent. It seems to me therefore that the reasoning of that case is inconclusive. I do not pretend to say that the decision is not in fact well founded, but there is that criticism to be made upon it, and consequently as this matter is one of very general importance, I concur in giving leave to appeal if there is anybody who wants to appeal. Then upon the other point as to the original vote of the mayor, I have little to add. It seems to me that the general policy of the Municipal Corporations Acts is to keep the mayor in office until his successor has been appointed. There are special provisions in this provisional order which do not seem to me to indicate any intention to interfere with the general policy of the Act in that respect. Consequently the original vote of the ex-mayor stands. Then with regard to the last point—namely, the casting vote of the ex-mayor who presided, there seems to be no authority for that, but it is really a very practical and business-like view to take, I venture to think, to say that a person who has got a casting vote in some events and not in others may say in order to prevent any question hereafter, "I do not know whether I have got a casting vote or not, but, if I have, I declare it is given for so-and-so." If in that event it is decided that he had got a casting vote, then it is a good vote; but if he has not a casting vote then it is a bad vote. It seems to me upon general principles that the casting vote may be allowed in such cases. It is very convenient that it should be allowed, and I see nothing in the provision in the statute about equality of votes to prevent its being done. Consequently, it seems to me that that casting vote ought to be held good. The judgment therefore is for the respondent upon this petition.

Poor law—Settlement—Addition to parish of part of another parish—Settlement not lost.

Settlements acquired in a parish are not destroyed by the subsequent addition to such parish of a part or the whole of another parish by an order made under the Divided Parishes Act 1876, as amended by the Poor Law Act 1879.

In 1852 H. had acquired by birth a settlement in the parish of W. H. In 1886 the Local Government Board, by an order made under the Divided Parishes Act 1876, as amended by the Poor Law Act 1879, ordered that a certain portion of the parish of W. should cease to be part of the parish of W. and should be amalgamated with the parish of W. H. Afterwards H. was found in the county of L., and was sent as a pauper lunatic to an asylum belonging to such county.

Held, that H. was removable to the parish of W. H., as her settlement there had not been destroyed by the amalgamation of the part of the parish of W. with the parish of W. H.

Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton (3 Q. B. 215) and St. Saviour's Union v. Dorking Union (78 L. T. Rep. 29; (1898) 1 Q. B. 594) distinguished.

APPEAL from the decision of the Court of Quarter Sessions for the County of London (north side of the Thames) quashing an order made by two justices for the county of London at petty sessions whereby it was adjudged that the place of the last legal settlement of one Elizabeth Heritage, a lunatic pauper then confined in the Claybury Lunatic Asylum of the respondents at Woodford, in the county of Essex, was in the parish of West Ham, in the appellant's union, and whereby the appellants were ordered to pay to the treasurer of the respondents the sum of 25*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* in respect of the past maintenance of the lunatic pauper, and to pay to the treasurer of the asylum weekly the sum of 9*s.* 11*d.* for her future maintenance.

Elizabeth Heritage (hereinafter referred to as the pauper lunatic) was born in Stephenson-street, Canning Town, in the parish of West Ham, in the West Ham Union, on or about the 11th Feb. 1852, and resided at Nos. 3 and 5, Widdicombe-terrace (afterwards and now known as Nos. 40 and 42, Barking-road), in the said parish, for about seventeen years until the month of Aug. 1888.

The pauper lunatic resided at the address aforesaid in such manner and under such circumstances during the whole of the period of seventeen years and in each of such years as to render her irremovable from the parish in which such residence took place.

By an order of the Local Government Board dated the 24th Aug. 1886, and made under The Divided Parishes and Poor Law Amendment Act 1876 (39 & 40 Vict. c. 61) as amended and extended by the Poor Law Act 1879 (42 & 43 Vict. c. 54), it was ordered that a certain part of the parish of Wanstead should cease to be part of that parish, and should be amalgamated with the parish of West Ham. A copy of the order, which took effect on the 24th March 1887, was made part of the case.

The address at which the pauper lunatic so resided was situate in the parish of West Ham, as constituted previously to the date of the order, and not in any part of the parish of Wanstead.

The pauper lunatic left the parish of West Ham in the month of Aug. 1888, and did not thereafter acquire a settlement in any parish.

The pauper lunatic was afterwards found in the hamlet of Ratcliffe in the Stepney Union in the County of London, and was sent therefrom to the Claybury Lunatic Asylum of the respondents.

By an order of two of the justices of the peace acting in and for the County of London dated the 14th Feb. 1900, the pauper lunatic was, under sect. 290 of the Lunacy Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 5), adjudged to be chargeable to the County of London.

On the 15th May 1900 the respondents procured from two of the justices of the peace acting in and for the County of London the said order of that date, whereby amongst other things the pauper lunatic was adjudged to be settled in the appellants' union (West Ham Union).

On the above facts the court of quarter sessions held that they were bound to follow the reasoning of the decisions in Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton (3 Q. B. 215) and St. Saviour's Union v. Dorking Union (77 L. T. Rep. 466; 78 L. T. Rep. 20; (1898) 1 Q. B. 594), and that such reasoning applied not only to a district where the parish is divided, but also where a district is destroyed by reason of amalgamation. They therefore allowed the appeal.

Daddy for the appellants.—The court of quarter sessions misunderstood Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton (sup.). The principle of that decision is this: A pauper acquires a settlement in the whole parish, not in any particular part of it. Accordingly when a parish is divided up, you cannot say he has a settlement in this part or in that part. The parish in which he had a settlement is gone, but the addition to an existing parish of the whole or a part of a neighbouring parish does not destroy that parish. That has been held in the case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin's, New Sarum (9 Q. B. 241). There is no reason why the addition of part of a parish to another should destroy the latter if the addition of a whole parish to it does not destroy it. He also referred to Bristol Guardians v. Guardians of Burton Regis Union (66 L. T. Rep. 190).

Earle for the respondents.—I quite agree that the principle of Reg. v. Inhabitants of Tipton (sup.) is that settlements are acquired in the whole parish. I would go further and say and in nothing but the parish. The pauper here never acquired any settlement in that part of the parish of Wanstead which is now amalgamated with the old parish of West Ham. If you hold she has a settlement in the new parish of West Ham, you impose on this part of it a liability which it never before was subject to. The settlement therefore is gone, and as the pauper was found in London County, London County must maintain her until it can show that some other parish or union is liable. The case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin's, New Sarum (sup.) was decided on a special Act, which declared that the two parishes were to be one parish for all save ecclesiastical purposes. He also referred to St. Saviour's Union v. Dorking Union (sup.).

DARLING, J.—I think in this case our judgment must be for the appellants, the London County Council. What happened appears to have been this: that by virtue of the Acts of Parliament which have been cited to us, and of the order of the Local Government Board, a part of the parish of Wanstead was added to the parish of West Ham, and was, in the words of the statute, amalgamated with it, so that they were amalgamated with one another—it was not a mere question of joining one to the other, but they were amalgamated in the sense that you could knead two malleable things together, so that they became one. The parish of West Ham from that moment exists with its old overseers, the only difference being then that the authorities of West Ham—the overseers and so on—have authority over the area of what was their old parish and over the portion joined to it and amalgamated with it, which was part of Wanstead. The pauper in question in this case had a birth settlement in West Ham, and it is said that that settlement is lost and gone by reason of the amalgamation with West Ham of this part of Wanstead, and for that proposition the Tipton case (sup.) is cited. What happened in the Tipton case (sup.) was this: It is stated exactly by the then Master of the Rolls, Lindley, in his judgment in the Dorking case, where he says: "As I understand the law, it seems now to be established that a settlement gained by birth is a settlement gained in the parish and not in any particular part of that parish, and if that parish is subdivided, the old parish ceases to exist and the settlement goes with it. No settlement in the portion made into a new parish can be implied in favour of a person who had acquired a birth settlement in the old parish which has passed away." Now, the Tipton case (sup.) has been followed, with a good deal of reluctance, by judges who have had to deal with and decide other cases; I do not myself in the least wish to say anything which would suggest that in my opinion it was not properly decided, but I think that this case does not come within the Tipton case at all. The reason why the pauper in the Tipton case lost his birth settlement was because he had been born in a parish which had passed away. This pauper was born in West Ham, and West Ham has not passed away in my opinion. West Ham has been amalgamated with a small portion of another parish which has been joined on to it and amalgamated with it; but West Ham, in my judgment, still remains, and the parish in which the pauper was settled still remains, although the boundaries of it have been enlarged. Now, what happened in the other case seems to me to be immaterial. The case of Reg. v. Inhabitants of St. Martin's, New

REX v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

[K.B. Div.]

Sarum (sup.) is this: the pauper gained a settlement in parish J., and afterwards, by Act of Parliament, that parish was united for all but ecclesiastical purposes with parish B., by the title of the united parishes of J. and B., and it was held that the pauper was settled in the united parishes. That would have been an authority, it seems to me, for this: that if all West Ham and all Wanstead parishes had been joined together with the title of the united parishes of West Ham and Wanstead, the paupers of both would have kept their settlements in the united parishes. But what has happened here is, that a portion has been taken off Wanstead and amalgamated with West Ham. Has that destroyed West Ham so as to bring it within the Tipton case? I do not think so. It may have destroyed Wanstead, and I do not say that it has not. It may have destroyed the old parish of Wanstead, and by reason of the Tipton case the paupers situate in Wanstead may have lost their settlements; but although one may think that that is so, I do not see that that forces us to extend the doctrine (which was reluctantly accepted by the judges in many cases) which is laid down in the Tipton case to say that a parish is destroyed, or has ceased to exist, when you take a part of something else and add that part to it. It is quite enough to say that the Tipton case settled that if you took away something from the parish that you destroyed that parish, but no one yet says that adding something to a parish equally destroys it. Then there is the authority of Reg. v. New Sarum (sup.) for saying that adding something to a parish does not destroy either of them. It seems to me, therefore, that this case is not brought within the rule which has been laid down in the Tipton case, and unless it comes within that rule the pauper is not deprived of her settlement, and for that reason I think the London County Council succeed as against the parish of West Ham, where the pauper still remains, in my judgment, settled.

CHANNELL, J.—I am of the same opinion. It seems to me to come to this, that where settlements have been acquired in a parish and that parish is destroyed, then the settlements are gone unless the authority which has destroyed them has made some provision for the settlements, which ought of course to be done. When it is not done, it is because it has been overlooked; but there is a provision which I think meets the case under this Divided Parishes Act, and which, as far as I can see, is acted upon now because the point has turned up in the courts and is foreseen. But where the settlements are not in fact provided for by the authority, the statute, or whatever it is which destroys the parish, then the settlements are gone. In that case the question which one has to consider is, what is a destruction for the purpose of producing that result. Now, you have it decided in the New Sarum case that the adding to one parish the entirety of another parish does not destroy, for this purpose, the parish to which the entirety of another parish is added. What we have to say is, whether adding to one parish not the entirety of another parish but a portion of another parish, destroys the first parish; and inasmuch as the adding of the entire portion would not destroy it I do not see why it should be said that the adding of a part does so. Consequently we are not bound by that doctrine, and we may follow the New Sarum case and say that it is more applicable to this case than the other one. Upon that ground we are able to decide that the settlements are not gone. Then there is a little addition to the argument, namely, with regard to the use of the word amalgamation, which my learned brother has already dealt with, and I agree with what he has said. I think that, for all purposes, taking a little bit from Wanstead and incorporating it with West Ham has not the effect of destroying West Ham.

Appeal allowed.

REX v. NORTH-EASTERN RAILWAY COMPANY. (a)

Criminal law—Verdict—Misdirection—Staying entry of judgment—Judgment not determining rights.

After verdict on an indictment where the proceedings though in form criminal are in substance for the asserting of civil rights of the parties (even when the verdict is due to a misdirection by the judge on a point of law) the court will not stay entry of judgment unless the judgment would alter the rights of the parties by operating as an estoppel to a second trial of the matters in issue.

The N.E. Railway Company were indicted for obstruction of a highway. At the trial the judge directed the jury to acquit them on one of the counts on the ground that they were justified under their special Act in doing what was alleged in such count to be an obstruction. The jury found a verdict for the defendants. The prosecutors obtained a rule nisi to stay entry of judgment for the defendants on the ground that such direction was wrong in law.

Held, that such rule must be discharged, since, whether the direction was wrong or not, the entry of the judgment would not prevent the prosecutors from bringing a second indictment for the continuance of the alleged obstruction, and therefore their rights would not be altered by it.

RULE nisi calling upon the defendants to an indictment to show cause why the entry of judgment given on the verdict should not be stayed until the court should further order.

The facts, as far as they were of importance in connection with the point before the court, were as follows:—

Under a certain lease granted by the Bishop of Durham to the defendants' predecessors in title the defendants were entitled to use for the purposes of their railway a tract of land fourteen yards in width over what was formerly a common, and across a highway over that common. At first only one line of rails was laid on this tract, but in 1874 another line was laid within it.

The district council in whose district the before-mentioned highway lay indicted the defendants for an obstruction of the highway. There were seven counts in the indictment, the first of which was in reference to laying this second line of rails. The judge (Ridley, J.) at the trial directed the jury that, on the construction of the special Act under which the railway had been made, there was no case as far as the first count of the indictment was concerned, and directed them to acquit on it. The jury did so, and on the evidence acquitted them also on the other six counts. The prosecutors thereupon obtained the rule nisi.

Scott Fox, K.C. (Manisty, K.C. with him) now showed cause.—The verdict in this case was merely to the effect that, on the evidence presented, the defendants were not obstructing the highway. If the alleged obstructions were continued for a single day it would not in any way prevent the prosecutors laying a fresh information. Their offence—if they are guilty of any offence—is a continuing offence, and on a second indictment for it the judgment in this case could not be pleaded in bar. The rule now asked for has never been made except where the judgment would operate as an estoppel to any further proceedings—i.e., where it finally decided the rights of the parties.

Reg. v. Southampton County, 57 L. T. Rep. 261;

19 Q. B. Div. 590;

Rex v. Wandsworth, 1 B. & Ald. 63;

Reg. v. Russell, 3 El. & Bl. 943;

Reg. v. Johnson, 2 El. & El. 613;

Reg. v. Duncan, 44 L. T. Rep. 521; 7 Q. B. Div. 198;

Reg. v. Chorley, 12 Q. B. 515.

Here it is said that the judge was wrong in directing the jury that, on the construction of the special Act, the second line of rails could not be an obstruction. I do not admit that this was a misdirection, but, assuming that it was, a misdirection could not possibly operate as an estoppel to a second indictment.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C. (R. Glen and Bethune with him) in support of the rule.—I do not dispute that the entry of judgment in this case could not operate as an estoppel to a second indictment. I contend it is not necessary to obtain the rule to show that the entry would absolutely preclude a second trial. It is sufficient if it can be shown that at a second trial we should be greatly prejudiced by the result of this trial. That is the effect of Lord Ellenborough's remark in Rex v. Wandsworth (sup.), at p. 66, that to allow judgment to be entered under such circumstances would be to send "the parties to a second trial with a millstone about their neck, the weight of which it would be impossible to resist." Here I submit the result of this trial, while it does not absolutely preclude a second trial, renders such a trial hopeless, because the error here arises, not from a mistaken view of the facts, but from a direction wrong in law of the judge. He has here construed, and wrongly construed, an Act of Parliament. If we bring a second indictment, the ruling of the judge in this trial will be cited by the defendants, and I submit the judge who tries the second indictment will be bound by this ruling, which we contend is wrong. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Is there any case where entry of the judgment has been stayed merely on a misdirection?] In the Southampton case, at p. 599, the court said that there was no misdirection, but, if there had been, it would have stayed entry of the judgment. But, even saying there is no express authority on the point, why should the entry of the judgment be stayed when it is due to misdirection? [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Because, as a matter of fact, the direction of the judge at one trial does not bind the judge at another trial. My difficulty is that the principle of the cases seems to be that the court will interfere only when the judgment would alter rights.]

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case a rule has been moved calling upon the defendants to the indictment to show cause why the entry of judgment given on the verdict should not be stayed until the court should further order. The effect or object of that rule is to obtain a decision from this court that upon an indictment for obstruction to a highway the proceedings on the indictment may be stayed upon the ground that there has been some misdirection on the part of the learned judge in the way that he has left the question to the jury. The case has been very fairly and clearly argued by Mr. Tindal Atkinson, and he is obliged to admit that the case is novel in so far as he asks us to extend a practice such as was laid down by Lord Ellenborough in Rex v. Wandsworth (sup.) to the case of an indictment for obstructing a highway. Now, of course, if we could see that the same principle ought to apply, we should not hesitate to lay down the rule, but, as I have ventured to point out in the course of the argument, it seems to me that there is a broad distinction of principle to show that the same considerations do not apply. In Rex v. Wandsworth (sup.) Lord Ellenborough appears to have laid down the rule that under special circumstances, where rights would have been affected by previous proceedings, he stayed proceedings suspending the effect of the former verdict, because great injustice would arise from precluding further discussion; and it is important to observe that he referred to the previous case in which he had so acted—a very peculiar case—of Rex v. Middlessex, reported in the note at page 65 of the same volume, showing that it was because in law the rights of parties would be affected in subsequent proceedings that he had taken the step of interfering so as to prevent the proceedings taking their ordinary course. Now, there have been a long series of decisions—Reg. v. Russell (sup.), Reg. v. Johnson (sup.), and Reg. v. Duncan (sup.)—which were, I think, all of them applications for a new trial, in which the court has uniformly refused to grant a new trial; but it is important to point out that even in those cases the court had thought it right to take the same action as Lord Ellenborough took in Rex v. Wandsworth (sup.). As Lord Coleridge, C.J. pointed out in Reg. v. Southampton County (sup.), they of course could have done so, as the rule moved in one form would not have precluded them from giving a remedy. I now come to consider whether on principle we ought to apply the same rule and extend the rule to cases of obstruction, and I would point out that the reasoning which has been used by the learned judges in more than one of those cases would seem to afford a conclusive argument against our extending or the granting of the indulgence to such a case. It was pointed out in the case in 3 El. & Bl. of Reg. v. Russell (sup.) that—the verdict determining no special right—the day afterwards an indictment might have been preferred to which the present acquittal would have been no bar; and I need not refer to the other cases where the same law is laid down, because it has been most fairly admitted by Mr. Atkinson that, in the event of an indictment being preferred in respect of the same obstruction being continued, the present acquittal could not be used as any answer by the defendant to those proceedings. Therefore, as I point out, it is attempted to induce us to extend the rule which is applied in cases where rights would be affected to cases in which the rights would not be affected. The main ground on which this has been urged is that the difficulty in which the prosecutors would find themselves—the difficulty which in the Wandsworth case arose from a different state of circumstances altogether, from the fact of there having been a previous trial—ought to induce us to extend the rule, because it is said the learned judge in this case misdirected the jury, and to a certain extent withdrew even a part of the case from their consideration. Speaking for myself, of course I express not the slightest opinion as to whether there was a misdirection. We have not heard either side upon that at length, and for the purposes of my judgment I told Mr. Atkinson to assume that he could establish that there had been a misdirection. In my opinion the fact that the judge had misdirected would not be sufficient to justify the court in staying the proceedings in a previous indictment, nor remove the so-called difficulty in the way of future proceedings. Misdirection is the direction of the judge upon the evidence before him, and applying the law to the facts that are before him. It is not a case in which the learned judge has given a judgment which will finally determine the rights of the parties. The learned judge has upon the facts before him directed the jury with reference to what his view was of the legal rights applicable to those facts. Mr. Atkinson says any other judge who tries another indictment will feel himself bound to adopt exactly the same view of the law which Ridley, J. expressed. All I can say is that I do not think any judge would feel himself so bound. He would endeavour to apply to the facts then before him his view of the law, and it would certainly be a very startling rule if it were to be supposed that we were to sit here, there being a verdict of acquittal, to consider whether or not the parties would be prejudiced because there may be some expression of a learned judge which may amount to misdirection when the case comes to be further examined. I would point out that in Reg. v. Duncan it is true the application was for a new trial, but still that application was refused although it was based upon misdirection, and, as I have pointed out, the Lord Chief Justice, in the Southampton case, indicated that of course in a proper case the court, although the application was for a new trial, would have adopted the course which Lord Ellenborough adopted and which they approved, and have stayed the proceedings. Of course, we are not expressing any opinion that there was a misdirection, but, even assuming there was, in my opinion, inasmuch as the prosecutors can tomorrow take proceedings in respect of the obstruction, it would be a very wrong thing to extend the rule of arresting the entry of judgment to a case in which no rights had been finally determined, but the only question has been the question of whether the jury thought there was obstruction or not. I will only add that there seems to be a further broad distinction of principle, because, as has been pointed out in the course of the argument, the parties can, by informing the Attorney-General, obtain the use of the Attorney-General's name, and then proceedings can be taken in respect of that obstruction which can be carried to the Superior Courts and to the House of Lords if necessary, so that any rule of the learned judge can be finally determined on the question. In my judgment we should do wrong if we were to make this rule absolute, and therefore I think the rule ought to be discharged.

STIFF (app.) v. BILLINGTON (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

STIFF (app.) v. BILLINGTON (resp.). (a)

Game—"Search or pursuit"—Game Act 1831 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, s. 30.

In order to support a conviction under sect. 30 of the Game Act 1831 for trespassing in the daytime in search or pursuit of game, it is not necessary to prove that the searching and pursuing was with the intention to kill at the time.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant under sect. 30 of 1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32, charging him with trespassing by unlawfully being in the daytime upon certain land in search of game.

The respondent was in the employment of one Barford, who was the owner of the sporting rights over certain land at Sundon.

The appellant was a keeper in the employment of one Sievier, who was the tenant of and had the right of sporting over the adjoining land.

The appellant was seen to come from Sievier's land on to Barford's, having with him a retriever dog. The appellant beat the hedge on Barford's land, and the dog searched the whole length of the land.

The appellant said he was acting under his master's orders, and he believed that his master wanted him to be caught.

Barford bred pheasants for the purpose of his shooting, and though no nests had been seen on the land in question, this season pheasants and game were on the land.

The land comprised about sixty acres, divided into four plots. It was a detached portion of Barford's shooting, and was surrounded on three sides by Sievier's shooting and on the other side by a railway, beyond which Barford had other shooting.

One portion of this land, containing about four acres, was sown with mustard, but it was so sown by the farmer who was the tenant of the land, and not by Barford, who had the sporting rights.

The appellant gave evidence, admitting that he went upon the land in question, and stated that he acted upon instructions. He had a retriever dog with him, but denied that he beat the hedge or that his dog hunted.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that there was no evidence that the appellant was in search of game; that it was necessary to prove that he was searching for game for the purpose of killing or taking it; that the appellant had gone on the land for the purpose of raising the question whether the respondent's employer was entitled to plant the land with mustard for the purpose of attracting pheasants from the adjoining land.

No evidence was given by the appellant in support of this last contention.

The justices found as facts (1) that the appellant trespassed upon the land; and that there was game on the land; (2) that he trespassed in search of game; (3) that there was no evidence of a bona fide claim of right; and (4) that if it was material he acted under the instructions of his employer.

They thereupon convicted the appellant.

By the Game Act 1831 (1 & 2 Will. 4, c. 32), s. 30:

And whereas, after the commencement of this Act game will become an article which may be legally bought and sold, and it is therefore just and reasonable to provide some more summary means than now by law exists for protecting the same from trespassers; be it therefore enacted that if any person whatsoever shall commit any trespass by entering or being, in the day-time, upon any land in search or pursuit of game . . . such person shall, on conviction thereof before a justice of the peace, forfeit, &c.

Sturges for the appellant.

Stimson for the respondent.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case the justices have found that the appellant trespassed on the land, that there was game on the land, and that the appellant trespassed in search of game. We are asked to say that the words "search" and "pursuit" in the section are limited to searching and pursuing with an intention to kill at the time, and that there was no evidence of that. I think it would be very dangerous to lay down any such rule as to the meaning of those words. I am clearly of opinion that we cannot say the magistrates were wrong in finding as they have done.

CHARTER v. CHARTER. (a)

Appeal—Married woman—Desertion—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), s. 4—Costs of appeal.

If a wife leaves her husband in consequence of a mere expression on his part that she can go where she likes and do what she likes, and then refuses to return home at his request, the husband is not guilty of desertion.

To constitute desertion, although it is not actually necessary that the husband should drive his wife away from him, there must be an intention on his part to break off matrimonial relations.

THIS was an appeal of the husband, George William Charter, from a conviction dated the 21st Jan. 1901, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895, by the metropolitan magistrate sitting at Clerkenwell.

The appellant was summoned on the 7th Jan. by his wife, under sect. 4 of the Act, for persistent cruelty to her and wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance for her, whereby she had been caused to leave and live separately and apart from him.

The magistrate was not satisfied as to the charge of cruelty, and amended it to one of desertion.

In her evidence at the police-court Mrs. Charter said:

On the morning of the 30th Sept. we had some words. He said I had deceived him, and had he known of it I should not have occupied his room. That afternoon he abused me and said he was resolved to have a separation, and that I should not occupy his room that night. He said I could go where I liked and do what I liked. He threw my things out of the room, and next morning I left him. I took him at his word when he said he would have a separation and that I could go where I liked. Because of what he said and what had happened previously I left him—not on account of his having neglected to maintain me. Had he not said I might go I should not have gone. After I left he tried to get me back, but I refused to return.

The appellant in person.—There was not the slightest evidence given in support of the charge of desertion. He had been married for twenty-nine years, and his wife left him after a slight quarrel last year. He offered to take her back, but she declined to return home. He received a letter from her on the 31st Oct. in which she said, "It is stated that you wish to induce me to rejoin you. Since the night of September 30, when you refused me my room and told me I could go where I liked and you would maintain me, I had no alternative but to leave you. As you have not accepted my offer to abrogate our marital rights by private agreement, the matter is now in the hands of my solicitors." The learned magistrate came to the conclusion that his wife did not wish to live with him, and thereupon convicted him of desertion.

H. T. Kemp for the respondent.—The order of the learned magistrate was right. There was evidence of persistent cruelty extending over a number of years, although there was not evidence before him that it was the cruelty and neglect of the husband which had caused her to leave and live separately and apart, as required by sect. 4 of the Act of 1895. He came to the conclusion that there was no evidence of desertion and amended the summons. The appellant had every opportunity of meeting the fresh charge, as the magistrate granted an adjournment.

The PRESIDENT.—From the wife's evidence at the police-court it seems to me that there was a separation by consent. There is the wife's own admission. "He tried to get me back, but I refused." I cannot understand on what ground the magistrate found desertion.

(a) Reported by J. A. SLATER, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

REG. v. KANE.

[CR. CAS. RES.]

H. T. Kemp referred to the following cases on the question of desertion :

Graves v. Graves, 10 L. T. Rep. 273; 3 Sw. & Tr. 350;
Dickinson v. Dickinson, 62 L. T. Rep. 830;
Bradshaw v. Bradshaw, 75 L. T. Rep. 391; (1897) P. 24;
Pizzala v. Pizzala, 12 Times L. Rep. 451;
Koch v. Koch, 81 L. T. Rep. 61; (1899) P. 221;
Sickert v. Sickert, 81 L. T. Rep. 495; (1899) P. 278.

The PRESIDENT.—It appears to me that in this case there was not the slightest evidence of desertion. The learned magistrate was perfectly right in coming to the conclusion that the wife did not leave and live separately and apart from her husband in consequence of his cruelty and neglect; but when he came to consider the question of desertion, he seems to have gone back on his former decision and to have formed the opinion that the wife was perfectly justified in refusing to return home. It is clear law that desertion by a husband does not necessarily mean that he has actually turned his wife out of doors. It is sufficient to constitute desertion if his conduct is such as to compel her to leave his house. The principle which underlies the cases is the intention of the husband to break off matrimonial relations. In the present case there was a quarrel, and the husband said: "Go where you like; do what you like." The wife "took him at his word," to use her own phrase, and when he asks her to return home she refuses to do so. It is obvious that the wife went away of her own free will, and not because she was compelled to do so. The separation was not contrary to the wishes of the wife, but was really at the time a separation by mutual consent. The appeal must therefore be allowed.

BARNES, J. agreed.

On the authority of Medway v. Medway (19 Mag. Cas. 595; 82 L. T. Rep. 627; (1900) P. 141) the husband, although successful, was ordered to pay the costs of the appeal.

REG. v. KANE. (a)

Criminal law—Agent—Larceny by agent—"Banker, merchant, broker, or attorney"—Direction in writing—Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 75.

The Larceny Act (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96), s. 75, enacts that "whosoever having been intrusted, either solely or jointly with any other person, as a banker, merchant, broker, attorney, or other agent with any money or security for the payment of money, with any direction in writing to apply, pay, or deliver such money or security" for any purpose or to any person specified in such direction, shall convert it to his own use or benefit, shall be guilty of a misdemeanour.

(a) Reported by A. A. BETHUNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

The section applies only to persons of the occupations named therein, and the words "or other agent" refers to occupations ejusdem generis. Reg. v. Portugal (16 Q. B. Div. 487) approved. Quære: Whether a document in the form of a receipt signed by the person charged is a direction in writing within the meaning of the section.

THIS case, stated by Ridley, J., was, so far as is material, as follows:

The prisoner Lewis Kane was indicted at the Central Criminal Court on an indictment containing four counts, charging him in the first count for that he, having been entrusted as an agent by Elizabeth Mary Williamson with a certain security for the payment of money—to wit, for an order of payment of the sum of 60*l.*, with a certain direction in writing to apply such security to a certain purpose specified in such direction, to wit, for the application of sixty shares in the Baker-street and Waterloo Railway—unlawfully, in violation of good faith and contrary to the terms of such direction, did convert such security to his own use and benefit contrary to the provisions of the first branch of sect. 75 of the Larceny Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 96).

The other three counts of the indictment varied the charge by describing the thing converted to be "the proceeds of such security," and the conversion to be "to the use and benefit of a person other than the said Elizabeth Mary Williamson."

The prisoner was stated to be a conjurer and a thought-reader, and in Nov. 1900 made the acquaintance of the prosecutrix at an hotel where they were both staying. On the 13th Nov. he called her attention to an advertisement relating to the Baker-street and Waterloo Railway Company, in which he said he was himself going to invest, and that it was a safe thing and would pay good interest. He further said that he was going to apply for sixty shares for himself, and advised the prosecutrix to make an application for a similar number.

The prosecutrix in the prisoner's presence wrote out a cheque for 60*l.*, which ran as follows:

14, High-street, W., London, Nov. 13th, 1900.—No. B. 192,064.—Parr's Bank Limited, Notting Hill Branch.—Pay L. Kane or order sixty pounds only—60*l.* 0*s.* 0*d.*—E. M. Williamson, Head Office, Bartholomew-lane, London, E.C.—(Reverse side) LUDWIG KANE.

Whilst the prosecutrix was writing the cheque the prisoner asked her not to cross it, as he said the application list closed that afternoon, and it was necessary to pay cash with the application in order to secure the shares.

Upon these representations the prosecutrix handed the cheque to the prisoner, and on the same afternoon asked him for a receipt for the 60*l.* represented by the cheque when the prisoner wrote out a receipt in the following words:

Received of Mrs. Williamson 60*l.* for the application of sixty shares in the Baker-street and Waterloo Railway, to be returned if those shares are not obtainable.—Professor L. KANE, 13th Nov. 1900.

On this document was a receipt stamp cancelled by the figures 13/11/00 being written by the prisoner upon it.

The prisoner made no application for the shares in the company, but himself cashed the cheque, and used the proceeds for purposes of his own.

CR. CAS. RES.] REX v. HAMILTON—REX v. COCKERTON; Ex parte HAMILTON & OTHERS. [APP.]

The substantial question raised at the trial was whether the document signed by the prisoner when taken together with the cheque given to him by the prosecutrix was such a direction in writing as to bring the offence of the prisoner within the first part of the 75th section of the Larceny Act.

The jury convicted the prisoner, and the learned judge reserved the question whether the cheque and the receipt given by the defendant constituted a direction in writing within the meaning of the section.

C. W. Mathews for the Crown.—The conviction cannot be supported; it has already been decided in Reg. v. Portugal (16 Q. B. Div. 487) a case which was not cited at the trial, that sect. 75 of the Larceny Act only applies to persons who carry on business as bankers, merchants, brokers, or attorneys, or businesses ejusdem generis.

Travers Humphreys, for the defendant, did not argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Although the decision in Reg. v. Portugal is not binding upon us, we should follow it, and the conviction must therefore be quashed. But the point reserved by the case is one on which a decision is necessary, and should be brought before us on another occasion.

REX v. HAMILTON. (a)

Criminal law—Forgery—Common law misdemeanour—Imprisonment with hard labour—Jurisdiction to inflict—14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29.

The jurisdiction to inflict the sentence of imprisonment with hard labour depends upon statute. The common law misdemeanour of forgery is therefore not so punishable, because it is not one of the offences specified in 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29. A forgery committed with the intention of concealing the misappropriation of property is not the commission of a cheat or fraud within the meaning of that section.

THE facts in this case, which was stated by the Common Serjeant for the City of London, were as follows:—

The prisoner Hamilton had been employed by one Cobb to collect subscriptions. He collected and fraudulently misappropriated a number of sums of money contributed by various donors. Being ordered in a County Court action to render an account, he delivered to Cobb a document which he represented as a list of the subscriptions he had received, but which was in fact a list of the names of the donors with amounts set out smaller than those they had actually contributed. In some cases Hamilton had altered the names of the donors, his object being to conceal his misappropriations. He was convicted on an indictment which charged the common law misdemeanour of forging and altering certain writings with intent to defraud, but did not charge any of the offences specified in 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100, s. 29.

The Common Serjeant postponed judgment, and stated the case for the opinion of the court on the question whether he had power to pass a sentence of imprisonment with hard labour.

No counsel having been instructed, Herman Cohen, as amicus curiæ, referred the court to

Russell on Crimes, 6th edit., vol. 2, p. 467;

Hawkins' P. C. Bk. 1, c. 70 (11) and c. 71 (4);

2 East's P. C. 819, 824;

R. v. Minister and Churchwardens of St. Botolph, Bishopsgate, 1 Wm. Bl. 442.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We are obliged to Mr. Cohen, who, having appeared for the prosecution in the court below, has assisted us by citing the authorities to us. In my opinion, however, the prisoner cannot be punished with hard labour. He was indicted for forgery at common law; if he had been indicted for a cheat or fraud he might have been so punished because of the provisions of sect. 29 of 14 & 15 Vict. c. 100. But the question is whether, having been convicted of forgery on this indictment, he can be punished with hard labour. The indictment does not allege that he obtained the property by a cheat or fraud, which is an offence provided for by sect. 29. I think, therefore, that the Common Serjeant would have been wrong if he had punished this man with hard labour.

MATHEW, J.—The statute applies to cheating at common law. Cheating seems to me to mean obtaining property by deceitful means, and the definition of "forgery" in Hawkins' Pleas of the Crown appears to me to be too wide. The particular crime to be punished under this indictment was the prisoner's concealing by forgery the fact that he had obtained property by a cheat or fraud.

REX v. COCKERTON; Ex parte HAMILTON AND OTHERS. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION.

Education—School board—Elementary education—Science and art classes—Day schools—Evening continuation schools—Payment of expenses out of rates and school fund—Legality—Elementary Education Acts 1870 to 1891—Technical Instruction Acts 1889 to 1891—Education Code (1890) Act 1890.

A school board, as a statutory corporation, has no power to provide science and art schools or classes for teaching the education prescribed by the directory of the Science and Art Department, either in day schools or in evening continuation schools, and to pay the expenses thereof out of the school board rate or school fund.

[CT. OF APP.]

REX v. COCKBURN; Ex parte HAMILTON AND OTHERS.

[CT. OF APP.]

THIS was an appeal by the applicants from the order of a divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) discharging a rule nisi for a certiorari to bring up and quash certain certificates of disallowances and surcharges made by the auditor of the accounts of the London School Board.

The applicants for the certiorari were three members of the London School Board upon whom the surcharges in question were made.

The total expenditure of the board for the half year ending the 29th Sept. 1898 amounted to the sum of 1,582,504*l.* 18*s.* 3*d.*, out of which a considerable sum represented expenditure incurred by the board in connection with day and evening science and art schools and classes and schools of science maintained and registered under the Science and Art Department.

The auditor held his audit during the months of Feb., March, April, May, and June 1899, and heard the representatives of certain schools and ratepayers, and after taking time to consider his decision disallowed seven separate sums selected as representative or test items, and entered and charged in the accounts of the board for the half year, as being payments illegally made out of the funds of the board, and surcharged the sums upon members of the board.

Three of the sums selected by the board for the purposes of this case were surcharged upon the applicants respectively.

The three sums, and the auditor's reasons for disallowing them, appear in the auditor's certificates.

On the 5th Dec. 1899 an order nisi was made by a divisional court calling upon the auditor to show cause against the issue of a writ of certiorari to remove into the Queen's Bench Division the three aforesaid disallowances and surcharges made by the auditor as against the applicants.

On the 31st Jan. 1900 an order was made by the court that the corporation of the city of London should be at liberty to show cause against the writ of certiorari, and that the facts should be stated in the form of a special case for the decision of the court, and on the 24th May 1900 an order was made by the court that the Camden School of Art and Science Corporation should be heard in the argument.

All the above-mentioned three sums, the payment of which had been disallowed by the auditor, had been paid out of the school fund of the board referred to in sect. 53 of the Elementary Education Act 1870.

The three sums were more particularly expended in maintaining and keeping efficient science and art schools and classes which were held in buildings provided and maintained by the board, the first being the sum of 32*l.* 6*s.* 10*d.* paid to Mr. Langman for salary as drawing instructor. He was appointed by a resolution of the board, dated the 28th March 1889, and it was provided that he should give his whole time to the work at a salary of 300*l.* per annum, rising by annual increases of 5*l.* to a maximum of 350*l.* per annum together with travelling expenses.

At Lady Day 1898 Mr. Langman had under his supervision the instruction in drawing in 491 departments of schools (namely, 225 boys' departments, 224 girls' departments, and forty-two mixed departments), containing altogether 190,268 scholars under instruction in drawing, and also six pupil teachers' schools containing 1422 pupil teachers.

The principal part of Mr. Langman's time was given to the supervision of drawing, in accordance with the code of regulations for day schools under the Education Department. Among the classes and schools so supervised by him were art schools and classes under the Science and Art Department of the Committee of Council of Education.

A directory published by the Science and Art Department, containing the provisions under which science and art schools and classes were carried on under the department during the half-year ending Michaelmas 1898 was referred to as forming part of the case.

The second of the three sums was the sum of 4*l.* paid to Mr. Crick for special instruction in chemistry at the science class No. 7229, held at the Medburn-street evening continuation school. Mr. Crick was appointed by a resolution of the board, dated the 21st Oct. 1897. Under that resolution Mr. Crick taught theoretical and practical chemistry in evening schools under the Science and Art Department. A large part of Mr. Crick's duty was to supervise the science classes held in day schools and evening continuation schools. From a certificate sent in to the Science and Art Department on behalf of the board, containing the arrangements for the session 1897-8, it appeared that forty-four students attended the science class No. 7229, and paid a fee of 4*s.* each for instruction in science.

The third of the three sums was the sum of 58*l.* paid to the Polytechnic for Science and Art Examination Papers (R. Mitchell, local secretary). Mr. Mitchell was nominated and appointed local secretary in Feb. 1898 under clause 23 of the directory. This sum of 58*l.* was a payment made to the polytechnic as remuneration for Mr. Mitchell's services as local secretary, and for the services of his assistants and superintendents in conducting the science and art examinations held in accordance with the directory at several schools in May 1898, and consisted of a charge of 6*d.* for each student presenting himself or herself for examination.

Until the 1st April 1900, when the Board of Education Act 1899 came into force, the Education Department, which was controlled by the Lords of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, comprised two establishments or departments, one of which (called "the Education Department at Whitehall") administered the annual Parliamentary grant made for public education (including education at public elementary schools), and the other (called "the Science and Art Department at South Kensington") administered the grant from the Parliamentary vote made for instruction in science and art. The Science and Art Department at South Kensington was incorporated by Royal Charter. Both of these establishments were controlled by the president and the vice-president of the Committee of the Privy Council on Education, but the administrative staff were entirely separate, and had no members in common. The grant for public education was administered by the Education Department at Whitehall in accordance with the code of regulations for day schools (called "the code") and the code of regulations for evening continuation schools (called "the evening school code"), both of which codes were published.

annually by the Education Department at Whitehall. The grant from the Parliamentary vote for instruction in science and art was administered by the Science and Art Department at South Kensington in accordance with the science and art directory, which was published annually by the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. Each establishment or department accounted separately to Parliament.

All scholars in day schools or in evening continuation schools maintained by the board, or in classes under the Science and Art Department at South Kensington held either in the daytime or the evening, were registered either under the Education Department at Whitehall or under the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. All of those scholars in day schools who were under instruction in the seven standards referred to in the code were registered under the Education Department at Whitehall in accordance with the code. Of the scholars in day schools who were under instruction outside the standards, some (called "ex-standard scholars") were registered under the Education Department at Whitehall, and the rest (called "science and art students") were registered under the Science and Art Department at South Kensington. In the practice of the board the principal teacher of each school decided under which of these departments scholars who were being instructed outside the standards should be registered. In many of the day schools maintained by the board there were both ex-standard scholars and science and art students. In some cases ex-standard scholars were taught in the same classes with science and art scholars. In some cases scholars in the standards were also taught in the same classes. Grants were obtained by the board in respect of ex-standard scholars under art. 101 of the code.

At Lady Day 1898 there were in London, provided and maintained by the board, 485 day schools containing altogether 547,106 scholars and 280 evening continuation schools attended by about 29,153 scholars. The number of individual students under instruction in science and art schools and classes in the day schools of the board in the session 1897-8 was about 2644 in science and about 2615 in art. The number of individual students under instruction in science and art schools and classes held in the evening continuation schools of the board in the session 1897-8 was in science about 1768 and in art about 2069. Grants were obtained by the board in respect of the students in the schools, other than the students under instruction in science and art schools and classes, from the Education Department at Whitehall. Grants were made by the Science and Art Department at South Kensington to the board, as managers under the department, in respect of the students in the schools under instruction in science and art schools and classes.

The great majority of scholars in science and art schools and classes in day schools maintained by the board were over thirteen and below fifteen years of age. All of these scholars before entering science and art schools and classes had passed through the standards in the day schools, except a few who were allowed, by virtue of clause 57 of the directory, to enter a school of science on having received instruction up to and including the work of standard 6. In evening continuation schools, under art. 8 of the evening school code, no scholar under fourteen years of age was admitted unless he was exempt from the legal obligation to attend school. There was no superior limit of age in evening continuation schools and a great number of the scholars were adults.

The subjects of instruction for scholars in the seven standards in day schools for which grants were obtained from the Education Department at Whitehall are set out in arts. 15 to 17 of the code of 1898 and in the schedules to the code. Sched. 1 comprises the standard subjects, sched. 2 the class subjects, sched. 4 the specific subjects, sched. 3 (a) drawing, sched. 3 (b) needlework, and sched. M. manual instruction. The subjects of instruction for students in evening continuation schools for which grants were made by the Education Department at Whitehall are set out in arts. 2 and 3 of the evening school code 1897 and in the schedule to that code.

In the Medburn-street Board School, which is a fair sample of the day schools under the board which contain science and art schools and classes, the following were the numbers of scholars under instruction in the standards, under the code, and of scholars under instruction outside the standards in a science and art school or class during the school sessions ending in 1897, 1898, and 1899 respectively:—In the standards: 1897, 513; 1898, 535; 1899, 658. Outside the standards (including registered science and art students): 1897, 108; 1898, 96; 1899, 89.

In the practice of the board, which was in force during the half year to which this case relates, every science and art school or class provided by the board is carried on in the building or group of buildings in which a public elementary school is carried on, except that in a few cases a room in the neighbourhood of the school buildings is used for the science and art schools or class. In the practice of the board the science and art schools and classes are, so far as possible, carried on in separate rooms from the classes under the code, but rooms are not set apart exclusively for particular classes. In each case the science and art school or class is under the control of the principal teacher of the public elementary school. Further, in the practice of the board the principal teacher is in fact, for purposes of organisation and supervision, as much the principal teacher of a science and art school or class as he is of any class in the standards. This practice the parties other than the board allege to be contrary to the provisions of art. 85 (e) of the code. An assistant teacher under the board is appointed to a school and not to any class in a school, and the allocation of an assistant teacher to a class in the standards or to a science and art class is in the discretion of the principal teacher, but it is contended by the parties (other than the board) that such an allocation to a science and art school or class is illegal. An assistant teacher in a school, who is allocated by a principal teacher to a science and art class, may be also required and frequently is required by the principal teacher to take any class in the standards, but the parties (other than the board) deny the legality of the practice unless such assistant teacher is on the Whitehall time table as well as on the South Kensington time table. There are separate time tables for schools under South Kensington and for those under Whitehall.

The students in science and art schools and classes were inspected by inspectors under the Science and Art Department in accordance with clause 38 of the directory, and registered under the Science and Art Department in accordance with clauses 15-18 of the directory. The scholars under the board, other than such above-mentioned students, were inspected by inspectors under the Education Department, and registered under the Education Department in accordance with arts. 8, 12, and 85 (d) of the code. With the exception of the cases mentioned in clause 18 of the directory a scholar might not during the half year to which this case relates, be registered both under the Science and Art Department and under the Education Department.

The separate registration of scholars, as arranged during the half year in question, was intended to prevent the possibility of a double grant being obtained in respect of the same scholar, both from the Science and Art Department of South Kensington, and from the Education Department at Whitehall. In the directory for 1895 it was provided that "No pupil in an elementary school receiving aid from the English or Scotch Education Department may be presented for examination by the Department of Science and Art, or registered in any subject of science unless he has on or before the 1st Nov. preceding the examinations been placed altogether in standard 7 of the English code, or has passed standard 6 of the Scotch code."

In the directory for 1896 a new regulation was made (clause 6) that "No attendance can be registered both for a grant under the code of the Education Department and for a grant from the Department of Science and Art." The result of this last regulation was that a scholar might be entered both on the Education Department register and on the Science and Art Department register, but that he could not be entered for the same attendance on both registers. In 1897 this regulation was rescinded, and the regulations contained in clause 18 of the present directory were first established.

Some science schools are officially described as schools of science. This name is applied to schools in which certain conditions laid down in clauses 56 to 73 of the directory are fulfilled, but, except as provided by the said eighteen clauses, there is and was no distinction between schools of science and science classes to which this case relates.

The Department of Science and Art, when allowing science and art schools and classes under its control to be formed in connection with school boards, required that such schools and classes should be under the control of a committee of management. The school board, or a committee appointed by the school board, may act as the committee of management. A committee appointed by the school board need not necessarily consist of or only of members of the school board, but outsiders might be members of the committee. The School Board for London was accepted in 1890 by the Science and Art Department as a committee of management for science and art schools and classes in accordance with a resolution of the board, by which it delegated its duties of supervision and management to a sub-committee. A revised list of members of the board has since been forwarded to the Science and Art Department triennially (after the elections), and any changes which may have occurred in the interval have been notified by letter to the Education Department.

The board, having been regarded as acting under clause 7B, has not been required to send in each session the ordinary renewal form No. 168. The Science and Art Department states that the board has been regarded by them as a committee of managers supervising classes under clause 7B of the Science and Art Directory.

Evening continuation schools are and were regulated by the evening continuation school code and not by the day school code, except so far as certain articles in the latter are applied to evening continuation schools by art. 1 of the evening school code. The objects contemplated in the evening school code are stated in the explanatory memorandum. The subjects of instruction in respect of which a grant may be earned from the Education Department appear in arts. 2 and 3, and, in the schedule, art. 4 provides that instruction may be given in other subjects, but no grant was made by the Education Department in respect of it. Art. 11 contains the conditions on which a grant may be obtained. Art. 14 contains provisions for preventing in general the registration of scholars both under the Education Department and under the Science and Art Department, but expressly sanctions such double registration in certain specified cases.

The board have always obtained grants from the Education Department in respect of all their schools. Grants from the Science and Art Department have been made to them in respect of all science and art schools or classes maintained by them. Grants received from the Education Department and grants received from the Science and Art Department have in point of fact always been carried to the school fund. The board have charged no fees for instruction in science and art classes provided by them, so far as day schools are concerned, since Aug. 1891, and so far as evening continuation schools are concerned, since the 1st Sept. 1898.

The expenses incurred by the board in respect of science and art schools and classes under the Science and Art Department have always considerably exceeded the grants obtained from the Science and Art Department, and the deficiency has always been made good by the board out of the school fund and the rates levied under the Public Elementary Education Acts.

The auditor's reasons, as stated in his certificate, for disallowing the first sum of 32l. 6s. 10d. were as follows:

(1) Because Mr. Langman was employed wholly or partly in or about the instruction of classes registered under the Science and Art Department; (2) because the said sum was not wholly paid for the performance of duties which the board had power to assign to him, within the meaning of sect. 35 of the Elementary Education Act 1870; (3) because the board have no authority in law to pay the salary of a drawing instructor in a day school where the principal part of the instruction with regard to each child is not elementary; (4) because the board is not a "local authority" within the meaning of the Technical Instruction Acts 1889 and 1891.

The reasons for disallowing the second sum of 4*l.* were as follows:

(1) Because the said sum was not paid to Mr. Crick for the performance of duties which the board had power to assign to him, within the meaning of sect. 35 (3) of the Act of 1870; (2) because the said sum was paid to the teacher for the instruction of classes registered under the Science and Art Department; (3) because school boards have no power to use, expend, or apply any part of the school fund in the instruction of classes registered under the Science and Art Department; (4) because the said sum was paid or expended wholly or partly for services rendered in teaching subjects not allowed, provided for, or recognised by the Education Code; (5) because the said sum was not paid for services rendered as a teacher in an "elementary school" within the meaning of the Education Acts; (6) because the said teacher is not a necessary officer or teacher required by any school provided by the board, within the meaning of sect. 35 of the Act of 1870; (7) because a school board is not a "local authority" within the meaning of the Technical Instruction Acts 1889 and 1891.

The reasons for disallowing the third sum of 5*l.* were as follows:

(1) Because school boards have not any legal authority to use, expend, or apply any portion of the school fund in or about the instruction or examination of day schools or classes in science and art and organised day science schools registered under the Science and Art Department; (2) because the said sum was not expended in maintaining or keeping efficient any public elementary school within the meaning of the Elementary Education Acts; (3) because the said sum was not paid for or in respect of the expenses of an "entrance examination," within the meaning of sect. 2 of the Technical Instruction Act 1889; (4) because a school board is not a "local authority" within the meaning of the Technical Instruction Acts; (5) because the board have no authority in law to incur expenditure in the instruction of children who are not entitled to be placed on the register of a public elementary school owing to the fact that they are already registered under the Science and Art Department.

The questions for the decision of the Court were: (1) Whether it was within the power of the board as a statutory corporation to provide science and art schools or classes either in day schools or in evening continuation schools? (2) Whether it was lawful for them to pay the expenses of maintaining these schools or classes out of the school board rate or school fund? (3) Whether the rule nisi should be made absolute with regard to any and which of the disallowances and surcharges.

The Divisional Court (Wills and Kennedy, JJ.) held that all the disallowances and surcharges were rightly made, and that the rule nisi ought to be discharged (20 Mag. Cas. 38; 83 L. T. Rep. 595).

The applicants appealed.

Asquith, K.C. and Llewellyn Davies for the appellants.—The decision of the Divisional Court was wrong. It will be admitted that the school board can teach whatever can be taught under the code, and can pay the expenses of that teaching out of the rates. This case chiefly turns upon the Elementary Education Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75). Sect. 3 of that Act provides that "The term 'elementary school' means a school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given, and does not include any school or department of a school at which the ordinary payments in respect of the instruction, from each scholar, exceed ninepence a week." It appears from that definition that a part of the education in an elementary school need not be elementary education. There is no definition in this or any subsequent Act of elementary education. What may be considered to be elementary education may change and vary from time to time. There is no definition of "child" or "scholar" though a definition with a limit of age might easily have been provided if the Legislature had intended to limit the age of a "scholar." The power of saying what is elementary education rests with the Education Department, and whatever is authorised by the code may be taught as elementary education. So long as the principal part of the education is elementary as provided by the code, the rest of the education may be in any subjects whatever. The Technical Instruction Act 1889 recognised that a school board might provide technical instruction as elementary education. Instruction in subjects which are not elementary may be given by a school board both in day schools and in evening continuation schools. The Education Code Act 1890, by sect. 1 provides that: "It shall not be required as a condition of a Parliamentary grant to an evening school that elementary education shall be the principal part of the education there given, and so much of the definition of the term 'elementary school' in sect. 3 of the Elementary Education Act 1870 as requires that elementary education shall be the principal part of the education given in an elementary school shall not apply to evening schools." That clearly recognises that higher education may be given by a school board in evening schools. The Elementary Education Act 1891 provided for the free education of children between the ages of three and fifteen, and required elementary schools to find free accommodation for them. Sect. 8 of that Act shows that a school board may educate scholars above the age of fifteen. There is no definition in any of the Acts of "elementary" education or of a "child." The expression "scholar" is frequently used in the Acts, and there is nothing to indicate any limit of age beyond which a school board may not provide education out of the rates. Schools provided by a school board must be "elementary" schools, but the education which may be given at those schools at the expense of the ratepayers is not limited to elementary education. The obligation to attend school and the right to receive education is limited to "children," but a school board may provide education for "scholars"; "scholars" must be distinguished from "children," and the use of the expression "scholars" shows that education may be given to others besides children.

H. Sutton (Sir Robert Finlay, A.-G., K.C., with him) for the auditor.—The school board seek to charge the rates with certain expenses, and they must show that power to charge the rates with those expenses is given by some statute, either expressly or by necessary implication. Upon a consideration of all the Acts it is clear that a school board has no power to provide out of the rates any education except "elementary" education; the duty of a school board is to provide elementary education only. School boards are brought into existence to supply in any school district any deficiency in the elementary education of the children in the district, under sect. 5 of the Act of 1870. The expressions "child" and "scholar" are used indiscriminately in the Acts, and no distinction is to be drawn between them. Whatever may be "elementary" education, it must be quite clear that the teaching in the science and art classes of science and art in accordance with the South Kensington Directory cannot be providing "elementary" education; that teaching is all more advanced than anything to be found in the code.

Danckwerts, K.C. and Loehnis for the corporation of London.—Before the Elementary Education Act 1870 there were two distinct votes of money by Parliament, one for the Education Department and the other for the Science and Art Department, in order to enable both those bodies to make grants for education. Those two bodies were entirely separate and distinct. The Act of 1870 was passed in order to provide for any deficiency in the supply of elementary education. The Education Department was established as the authority for creating school boards and for distributing all grants for elementary education to school boards. School boards were empowered to establish and carry on schools under the control of the Education Department, and not schools under the Science and Art Department. The business for which school boards were created was the business of providing "elementary" education, and whatever elementary education may be, it is clear that it cannot include the science and art teaching under the Science and Art Department. Sect. 13 of the Act of 1873, which Act is to be read as one with the Act of 1870, provides that "nothing in this section shall authorise the school board to expend any money out of the local rate for any purpose other than elementary education." That shows clearly that the intention of the Legislature was that nothing but elementary education should be provided out of the rates. The Technical Instruction Act 1889 does not show that a school board may give technical instruction at the expense of the ratepayers. The decision of the auditor and of the Divisional Court was right, because the instruction given at the science and art classes was not "elementary" education, because that instruction was not under the code and in accordance with the Education Acts, and because, even if the school board could provide that education, it could only do so subject to the condition imposed by sect. 13 of the Act of 1873 that they could not expend thereon any money out of the local rate.

Lord Robert Cecil, K.C. and M. M. Macnaghten for the Camden School of Science and Art.—A school board can provide only "elementary education," and this science and art teaching was not "elementary" education. A school board is bound to conform to the Education Code, and these science and art classes were not under the Education Code. These science and art classes were themselves a "department," and it is clear that the principal part of the education in that department was not elementary as required by sect. 3 of the Act of 1870; no part of the education given in that department was elementary.

Asquith, K.C. in reply.—In the Education Act there is no distinction as to the character of the education which may be given in voluntary schools and in board schools; there is no limitation applicable to board schools which is not also applicable to voluntary schools. The definition of an "elementary school" as a school in which the principal part of the education is elementary applies equally to board schools and to voluntary schools. Sect. 13 of the Act of 1873 deals with the case of a school board acquiring an educational endowment which may be of very great value, and the condition at the end of the section says only that nothing "in this section," not "in the Act," shall authorise expenditure out of the rates upon education other than elementary.

Cur. adv. vult.

April 1.—The judgment of the court was read by

SMITH, M.B. as follows: This is an important case, for it affects the education of a large portion of the population in this country; and although the excellent arguments which have been addressed to us have ranged over a considerable area of ground, this has been occasioned not so much by reason of the magnitude of the real point in the case but because of the discussion of the numerous codes, directories, and Acts of Parliament relating to education which have come into existence since the passing of Mr. Forster's Act of 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 75), intitled "An Act to provide for public elementary education in England and Wales." The title is a good clue to what will hereafter be found in the Act. If the arguments had taken place shortly after its passing, in my opinion the case would be comparatively short; and even now, notwithstanding all that has happened during the thirty years since 1870, the same question still remains, which is the great question in the case—viz., What was the true construction of the Act when it received the Royal Assent upon the 9th Aug. in that year? My brothers Wills and Kennedy in the Queen's Bench Division have upheld certain disallowances and surcharges made by an auditor upon the accounts of the School Board of London in respect of payments made by that board out of moneys obtained from ratepayers towards the cost of certain education. The learned judges have held that no Act has authorised these payments, and the School Board of London appeals. Before I come to the Act itself I must point out the condition of things in relation to two institutions which were then, and had been for some years, in operation in this country in and prior to the year 1870, for these institutions play an important part in the consideration of this case. Then there existed at South Kensington a body corporate under the name of the Department of Science and Art, which corporation was for the furtherance of science and art and generally to do any act or thing that might be conducive to the attainment of the objects for which the department was formed. Its funds were obtained by means of a Parliamentary grant, for which a distinct and separate vote was taken in Parliament. It issued periodically minutes of the matters to be taught in its schools. These minutes became known as the South Kensington Directory. There also existed a branch of the Privy Council called the Education Department. This was unincorporated, and carried on its work at Whitehall. Its funds were obtained by means of a Parliamentary grant for which a distinct and separate vote was also taken in Parliament. It issued periodically minutes of matters to be taught in the schools to which it made grants, and these minutes became known as the Whitehall Code. The system of education prescribed by the directory and the code respectively is radically different. Although there are some few matters in the code and directory which somewhat overlap, no objection in this case is taken to the teaching by the school board with ratepayers' money of those matters which appear in the code. It is the teaching of the education prescribed by the directory with the ratepayers' money which is objected to. After the elaborate and exhaustive judgment of Wills, J. it is wholly unnecessary, and would be mere waste of time, to again narrate in detail that which the learned judge has so clearly and adequately done as regards the essential difference between the Department of Science and Art at South Kensington with its directory and the Education Department at Whitehall with its code. It is now sufficient for me to say that the South Kensington Department and the Whitehall Department have always been, and are, separate and distinct institutions. They have a different registration of scholars, different examiners, different grants, and different inspectors; and the South Kensington Department deals by means of its directory with a high and very advanced system of education, while the Whitehall Department, by means of its code, deals with an education of a lower and of a much less pretentious character. I may say without going through the details of the South Kensington Directory that no effort of imagination can describe the system of education therein set forth as elementary education; and for the purposes of this case, but only for this case, it is to be taken by admission of the Attorney-General that the education prescribed by the Whitehall Code is elementary education within the meaning of the Act of 1870; and I am not asked in this case to say whether the code embraces more than elementary education, but I may say it appears to me to embrace elementary education up to its high-water mark. The concrete question now raised is, Can the School Board of London lawfully pay the expenses of schools and classes for teaching the education prescribed by the South Kensington directory out of moneys of the ratepayers of London? Prior to the passing of Mr. Forster's Act in 1870 no ratepayer quâ ratepayer was under any obligation whatever to contribute towards the expenses of any kind of education. No rates were applicable thereto. The moneys which the South Kensington department and the Whitehall department respectively received from Parliament, and which were respectively dealt with by them, were moneys obtained from the taxpayers by means of Imperial taxes and not from ratepayers by means of local rates. The Act of 1870 for the first time set up school districts and school boards therein, and for the first time made the education of children between the ages of five and thirteen compulsory, and it, for the first time, enacted that rates should be levied in order to contribute to the expense of education. It is beyond dispute that, if the School Board of London, or, indeed, any other school board (they are all corporations created by statute), is to justify the payment of the expense of education out of the money of the ratepayers, this must be done by producing some Act of Parliament, or Order in Council having the force of an Act of Parliament, which enacts that the ratepayers' money shall be levied and applied for that purpose. Neither a code nor a directory has any such force. Now, what was the scheme which was brought into being by Mr. Forster's Act of 1870 and whereby rates were to be applied to the cost of education? And what were the requirements of the State which then called forth the Act? Was it a scheme whereby the ratepayers should be called upon to contribute to the expenses of the elementary education of the children in their districts, or was it a scheme that they should be called upon to contribute to the expenses of a high and advanced system of education such as that to be found in the directory of the Science and Art Department at South Kensington, and were persons other than children to be educated at the expense of the ratepayers? What the State then required and what the consequent scheme of the Act was, can only be found by a study of the Act itself, and to the true construction of this Act I now come. In my opinion, if it were not for the definition given in sect. 3 of the term "elementary school"—not, it will be noticed, of the term "public elementary school" which definition Mr. Asquith for the school board very happily described as his sheet anchor, and to which if he could not ride he frankly owned that he must go to the bottom (and with this I agree), there would, in my opinion, for the reasons which will appear, have been but little to argue about. To clearly understand the object and scope of this definition, which, in my opinion, has been entirely misapprehended, I will first go through the Act without the definition to see whether in any part of the Act without the definition it can be said that the Act applies to anything else than the elementary education of children; for it is to the education which is to be found in the Act that the ratepayer is called upon to contribute, and to no other. In the first place, as before stated, the Act is intitled "An Act to Provide for Public Elementary Education in England and Wales." This title is to be read as part of the Act itself: (Fielding v. Corporation of Morley, 79 L. T. Rep. 231; (1899) 1 Ch. 1, per Sir Nathaniel Lindley and Chitty and Collins, L.J.J.) It will be noticed it is not an Act to provide for public education in general, but for public elementary education in England and Wales, which is clearly something less than education in general. By sect. 1 it is enacted that the Act may be cited as the Elementary Education Act 1870. By sect. 3 "parent" includes guardian and any person who is liable to maintain, or has the actual custody of, any child. By sect. 5 it is enacted that "there shall be provided for every school district a sufficient amount of accommodation in public elementary schools . . . available for all the children resident in such district for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision is not otherwise made, and where there is an insufficient amount of such accommodation, in this Act referred to as 'public school accommodation,' the deficiency shall be supplied in manner provided by this Act." It will be seen that this accommodation, whatever the word may mean, is to be provided for children for whose elementary education efficient and suitable provision is not otherwise made. Mark the words "children" and "elementary education." By sect. 7, every elementary school which is conducted in accordance with the following regulations shall be a public elementary school within the meaning of this Act, and every public elementary school shall be conducted in accordance with the following regulations: (1) It shall not be required, as a condition of any child being admitted into or continuing in the school that he shall attend or abstain from attending any Sunday school, and that any scholar may be withdrawn by his parent from religious observances. This is the section by which an elementary school becomes and is called a public elementary school—that is, a board school. A point was made on behalf of the school board that, as the word "scholar" was used, the education in a board school was not confined to children. I do not agree; for the word "scholar" and the word "child" will be found indiscriminately used both in the Education Acts and in the codes. By way of example, I would refer to sect. 7 of the Act of 1870, to sect. 8 of the Free Education Act of 1891, and to sect. 17 of the Act of 1870, which two last sections must be read together, and to the code of 1898, p. 18, in which infants are described as scholars. By sect. 8 of the Act of 1870, the Education Department—i.e., Whitehall—is to cause returns to be made, and then to take into consideration every school, whether public elementary or not, and whether actually in the district or not, which in their opinion gives, or will when completed give, efficient elementary education to the children of the district. Again, we find the words "elementary education to children," and the department to ascertain this is Whitehall and not South Kensington. By sect. 17 every child attending a school provided by any school board shall pay such weekly fee as may be prescribed by the school board with the consent of the Education Department—here again Whitehall—with power to the school board from time to time to remit the whole or any part of such fee in the case of any child when they are of opinion that the parent of such child is unable from poverty to pay the same. This section applies to a child and no one else except its parent. Sect. 30 provides for the formation of school boards, and they are by this section made bodies corporate. Sect. 37 deals with school boards in the metropolis, and I find no distinction in the Act upon the point I am now inquiring into between the school board of London and the other school boards in the kingdom. Sects 53 and 54 enact how the expenses of a school board are to be paid. Sect. 53 is as follows: "The expenses of the school board under this Act shall be paid out of a fund called the school fund. There shall be carried to the school fund all moneys received as fees from scholars"—this means the fees the board is entitled to receive under sect 17 from every child attending school (note the words scholar and child used indiscriminately)—"or out of moneys provided by Parliament or raised by way of loan or in any manner whatever received by the school board, and any deficiency shall be raised by the school board as provided by this Act." And by sect. 54 it is provided that "any sum required to meet any deficiency in the school fund whether for satisfying past or future liabilities shall be paid by the rating authority out of local rates." Here is to be found for the first time in the history of education in this country an enactment applying rates towards defraying the expenses of education. By sect. 67 the local authority once a year are to send to the Education Department, Whitehall, a return containing particulars with respect to elementary schools and children requiring elementary education in their district. By sect. 74, which is under the heading of "Attendance at School," it is enacted that every school board with the approval of the Education Department, Whitehall, may make bye-laws for, amongst others, the following purposes: Requiring the parents of children of such age not less than five years nor more than thirteen years, as may be fixed by the bye-laws, to cause such children (unless there is some reasonable excuse) to attend school; and by a proviso to this section it is enacted that as regards a child between ten and thirteen years of age, such child need not attend school if one of His Majesty's inspectors—that is, from Whitehall—certifies that such child has reached a standard of education specified in the bye-law. Having now gone through the Act apart from the definition of the term "elementary school" in sect. 3, can it be said with any regard to truth that this Act deals with any education other than the elementary education of children? I think certainly not. In addition to what is set forth above, it should not be lost sight of that the Act of 1870 over and over again refers to the Education Department—that is, Whitehall—which for the purpose of this case is admitted to be the authority as to elementary education, and to elementary education alone, and it is admitted that from first to last the Act of 1870 makes no reference whatever to the Department of Science and Art at South Kensington with its high and advanced system of education. That the recipients of the education mentioned in the Act are children, and children only, cannot be denied, for I would ask who else can be found pointed at throughout the Act to receive the education the Act prescribes other than children. I now take the definition in sect. 3 of the Act of 1870 of the term "elementary school." It is as follows: "In this Act the term 'elementary school' means a school or department of a school at which elementary education is the principal part of the education there given, and does not include any school or department of a school at which the ordinary payments in respect of the instruction from each scholar exceed 9d. a week." It is argued for the school board that this definition constitutes a statutory enactment whereby a board school or a department of a board school is empowered to give the highest and most advanced education of the South Kensington Directory at the ratepayers' expense, if the principal part of the education given in such school or department of such school is elementary. As to this contention the first observation to be made is that this definition of the term "elementary school" is not an enactment providing for the giving of any education at all, and much less an enactment that a school board in a public elementary school is thereby empowered to give the education prescribed by the Directory of South Kensington at the expense of the ratepayers. This seems to me to be an answer to the school board's contention. But, if the contention really be that it is a statutory enactment such as the board contends for, what is the meaning of the last part of the definition—"and does not include any school or department of a school at which the ordinary payments in respect of the instruction from each scholar exceed 9d. a week"? I heard no reason given as to this by the learned counsel for the school board. It is common knowledge that prior to the Act of 1870 there was in this country a vast amount of education of all descriptions, elementary and non-elementary, carried on by schools supported by voluntary contributions, and, indeed, at the present day there still exists a considerable amount of such education. These schools have come to be known as voluntary schools. It was not the object of Mr. Forster's Act to destroy these voluntary schools and thus cast upon the rates their enormous cost, which was being provided for by voluntary contributions. What Mr. Forster's Act enacted was that the school board should supply and the ratepayer should pay for the elementary education of children if, taking into consideration every school, whether public elementary or not, and whether situated in the school district or not (sect. 8), the elementary education which was then being provided was not sufficient. The object and meaning of the definition clause in my judgment is that, inasmuch as all kinds of education were then being taught in these voluntary schools, those outside schools only should come within the Act and derive the benefits by way of grants and otherwise conferred by the Act at which elementary education was the principal part of the education therein given; and, in addition, that not only those outside voluntary schools should come within the Act if they were schools at which the ordinary payments therein in respect of the instruction from each scholar did not exceed 9d. a week apiece. That voluntary schools are referred to in the Act of 1870 as "elementary schools" in my opinion is apparent from, amongst others, sect. 23, sect. 12, sub-sect. 2, sect. 9, sub-sect. 2, and sect. 7. The object, meaning, and scope of the definition was to select out of these voluntary schools those which had these two attributes—viz., if the principal part of its education was elementary, and also was a school in which the scholars paid no more than 9d. apiece a week. If there was not this definition, I do not see why all voluntary schools could not have claimed the benefit of the Act, no matter what was their teaching, if they conformed to the requirements of the Act as regards religious teaching and otherwise. This definition, in my judgment, instead of being a statutory enactment that the highest education prescribed by the directory should be taught by a board school at the expense of the ratepayers, is a definition whereby a limit is placed as to those voluntary schools which should become public elementary schools within the Act of 1870 and obtain its benefits; and, in my opinion, this definition has no such effect as that contended for on behalf of the school board. What I have above said as to the true construction of the Act of 1870 I will not repeat, for what I have already said upon the Act equally applies whether the definition in sect. 3 is taken or not. I now come to the next Education Act which was passed—namely, the Elementary Education Act 1873, by sect. 2 of which it is enacted that: "This Act shall be construed as one with the principal Act" (that is, of 1870), "and the expression 'this Act' in the principal Act shall be construed to include this Act." In other words, the Act of 1873 is made part and parcel of the Act of 1870, which Act is to be read as if the Act of 1873 had been contained therein. Now, what do we find in this Act of 1873? Sect. 13, in my opinion, is decidedly of importance. It enacts: "A school board shall be able and be deemed always to have been able to be constituted trustees for any educational endowment or charity for purposes connected with education . . . and to have and always to have had power to accept any real or personal property given to them as an educational endowment or upon trust for any purposes connected with education; provided that (1) nothing in this section shall enable a school board to be trustees for or accept any educational endowment, charity, or trust the purposes of which are inconsistent with the principles on which the school board are required by sect. 14 of the principal Act to conduct schools provided by them." (This is the section relating to the non-teaching of religion distinctive of any particular denomination.) "And (2) every school connected with such endowment, charity, or trust shall be deemed to be a school provided by the school board, except that nothing in this section shall authorise the school board to expend any money out of the local rate for any purpose other than elementary education." Here in this section, as it seems to me, is an emphatic declaration by the Legislature, which, be it remembered, forms part and parcel of the Act of 1870, that the school board is not to expend any money out of a local rate for any purpose other than elementary education. In fact, it enacts in short and positive terms that which is the whole tenor of the Act of 1870, as I have above endeavoured to show. In my opinion, the many Acts which were subsequently passed down to and including the year 1891 have no real bearing on the point I have to decide, except that they show that the Legislature was throughout dealing with the elementary education of children and nothing else. I will very shortly go through them, for they have been referred to. In 1876 an Act was passed as to the employment and education of children. In the same year another Act was passed, called the Elementary Education Act 1876. By sect. 4 it enacted that it was the duty of the parents of every child to cause such child to receive sufficient elementary instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and that in default he should be liable to a penalty. By sect. 48 "a child in this Act means a child between the ages of five and fourteen years." In 1879 an Act was passed relating to the powers of school boards in relation to industrial schools. In 1880 an Act was passed to make further provision as to by-laws respecting the attendance of children at school under the Elementary Education Acts. In 1885 an Education Act was passed foreign to this case. In 1890 an Act was passed for the purpose of making operative certain articles in the code of 1890. This Act, by sect. 1, enacted that, "it shall not be required as a condition of a Parliamentary grant to an evening school that elementary education shall be the principal part of the education there given, and so much of the definition of the term 'elementary school' in sect. 3 of the Elementary Education Act 1870 as requires that elementary education shall be the principal part of the education given in an elementary school shall not apply to evening schools." So that, although an evening school need not have elementary education as the principal part of its education to thereafter get a Parliamentary grant (this has nothing to do with rates and moneys therefrom), yet, if the school was one at which the ordinary payment in respect of instruction for each scholar exceeded 9d. a week, an evening school, it would seem, is still left with that fetter, and will not get a Parliamentary grant. This is the first Act to which my attention has been called in which an evening school is mentioned. By sect. 3, subsect. 2 of the Act of 1890, the Elementary Education Acts 1870 to 1876, and the Elementary Education Act 1880, and this Act may be cited collectively as the Elementary Education Acts 1870 to 1890. In 1891 an Act was passed to make further provision for assisting education in public elementary schools in England and Wales. By sect. 1 a grant called a free grant was passed by Parliament in aid of the cost of elementary education in England and Wales at the rate of 10s. a year for each child of the number of children over three and under fifteen in average attendance at any public elementary schools in England and Wales not being an evening school; and by sect. 13 (1) the Act might be construed as one with the Elementary Acts 1870 to 1890, and (2) the Acts may be cited collectively as the Elementary Acts 1870 to 1891. So much for the Acts ranging from 1870 to 1891; and I can find no indication in any of them that education other than that embraced in the Act of 1870 was to be taught by a school board at the expense of the ratepayers; and the education which a school board is by statute authorised to teach at that expense, in my judgment, is the same whether it be taught in the daytime or the evening. There is one other Act to which I must make reference, for it was much relied upon by the school board. It was not one of the Elementary Education Acts of 1870 to 1891, which form a code of themselves, but is one of the Technical Education Acts, 1887 to 1891, which form a distinct code of themselves. The Act is called the Technical Instruction Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 76). It is an Act to facilitate the provision of technical instruction. It is said that this Act contains a legislative recognition that the higher education of South Kensington, and not merely the elementary education provided by the code, can be taught by school boards and be paid for out of rates. This Act, by sect. 1, enacts that a local authority (this is not a school board, but a town or county council) may out of a local rate (this is not an education rate) supply or aid technical or manual instruction, but shall not out of the local rate supply the same to scholars receiving instruction at an elementary school in the obligatory or standard subjects prescribed by the minutes of the Education Department, Whitehall. The reason for this seems pretty obvious, because to the scholars in those standards the Education Department might well give elementary technical or manual instruction, and that the local and school board authorities were not to clash. Then comes a provision about making a local rate, by a local authority, which has nothing to do with a school board. It is there provided (sect. 1) that the rate to be raised in any one year by a local authority is not to exceed 1d. in the pound, and yet, according to the argument of the school board, it may levy for technical and manual instruction a rate to any amount it may require. Sect. 1 (3) enacts—nothing in this Act shall be construed so as to interfere with any existing powers of school boards with respect to the provision of technical and manual instruction. As before stated, it seems to me that there may well be technical and manual instruction of an elementary kind which the school board may well teach as being elementary education. Then comes this—the conditions on which Parliamentary grants may be made in aid of technical and manual instruction—i.e., to the local authority—shall be those contained in the minutes of the Department of Science and Art—the department, as before shown, with which the Elementary Education Act of 1870 has nothing to do. I have gone far enough in this Act to show that it has nothing to do with the true construction of Mr. Forster's Act of 1870, and with just referring to the novelty of the attempt to interpret one Act by another Act passed nineteen years afterwards, upon another and different subject-matter, I will conclude by saying that the Act of 1889 is not a legislative recognition of the right of the school board to teach the directory education and make the ratepayers pay for it. I now answer the questions put to me, but I will answer (1) and (2) together. (1 and 2) I say it was not within the powers of a board as a statutory corporation to provide science and art schools or classes of the kind referred to in this case, either in the day schools or in evening continuation schools, out of the school board rate or school fund. (3) That the rule nisi should not be made absolute in regard to any of the disallowances and surcharges, for in my judgment, for the reasons above given, they were correctly made by the auditor. I may add that, if the school board is to have the powers it seeks, these must be obtained by legislation, for the powers it desires to have do not exist in any statute or its equivalent already passed. This appeal must be dismissed.

to an ancient highway. The owners of the adjoining land sought to restrain the highway authority from depositing rubbish or materials on the strip. Willows and grass had been cut by the owner of the adjoining land and her tenants, and gipsies warned off and cattle turned away. The strip was swampy, and there was no evidence that any vehicle ever went along it, but occasionally foot passengers walked along the margin instead of the high road.

Held, that there was no presumption that all the space between the hedges had been dedicated to the public, and that, even if there was such a presumption, it was rebutted by the circumstances.

This was an action brought by the Countess of Belmore and her tenant claiming a declaration that an uninclosed strip of land at Otford, in the county of Kent, between the main road and inclosed land, known as Barham Farm, was the property of the plaintiff, and for a declaration that the defendants were not entitled to use the strip of land as a place of permanent and general deposit of materials, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from using or placing on or permitting to remain on the said strip rubbish or materials.

The land in question was separated by a piece of swampy ground from the metalled part of the highway for some 300 yards, and was 50 yards wide at the broadest part, narrowing down to a point at either end. Willows and rough grass grew on the land, and had been cut by the tenant, who had put cattle there to graze, and warned off gipsies. Strangers, however, had cut grass in small quantities and carried it away.

There had been an uninclosed strip on the opposite side of the road, upon which a footpath had been constructed by the highway authority, and the adjoining owner had then inclosed up to the newly constructed footpath.

Eve, K.C. and Wace for the plaintiff.—There is no presumption of dedication to the public up to the fence of the plaintiff's land, and, even if there were any presumption, it is rebutted by the evidence in this case.

Vernon Smith, K.C. and Church for the defendants.—There is a presumption of dedication to the public of all land up to the old fence, and the dedication is not limited to the metalled portion of the road.

Cur. adv. vult.

March 18.—COZENS-HARDY, J.—The question in this action is whether the public have any, and if so what, rights over an uninclosed strip of land adjacent to the metalled road leading from Sevenoaks to Otford. This road was not laid out under any Inclosure Act. It seems to be an ancient highway, which was kept in repair under a turnpike trust from the middle of last century until a few years ago, when the trust expired. It is now a main road under the control and management of the Kent County Council. The defendants have begun to deposit rubbish and to lay a drain along the strip, for the purpose of rendering it suitable for public use. The strip lies on the west side of the road. It is about 300 yards long, and 50 feet wide at the broadest part, tapering off to nothing at each end. The strip is not part of the waste of the manor. The land adjoining the strip on the west is a farm, of which the plaintiff, the Countess of Belmore, is tenant for life in possession, the co-plaintiff Kipping being her tenant. The farmhouse and farm buildings lie a short distance to the west of the strip. Pawley, who occupied the farm from 1865 till 1870, constructed a cartway from the high road across the strip. This cartway was raised some 3ft. or 4ft. and a drain was placed under it to carry off the water from the upper part into a ditch which was dug along the strip. In 1893 the plaintiff Kipping made another similar cartway to the north of Pawley's cartway. There is an old hedge between the fields and the strip. This hedge is at the top of a small bank. The land slopes down from the hedge eastwards and from the high road westwards, and until Pawley's drain and ditch were made the bottom of the strip was a very swampy place, and even now it is soft and wet except in summer weather. Willows and rough grass grow on the strip. These willows were from time to time cut and carried away by the tenants of the farm. The rough grass was occasionally cut by the tenants. There is no evidence that any vehicle ever went along the strip, and, indeed, within living memory this would not have been possible. Nor is there any evidence that any man on horseback ever went along it, except occasionally on the margin next the high road. There is no defined track or footpath on this margin, but occasionally foot passengers walk on this margin instead of on the high road. This was not done frequently, but the margin was trodden by foot passengers more often than by men on horseback. On the opposite, or eastern, side of the high road was a somewhat similar strip, which has recently been inclosed with the consent of the Kent County Council. There is now a formed footpath on the east side of the high road, and I gather that foot passengers have at all times been in the habit of walking on the grass margin on the east side rather than on the west side, probably because the surface was more level and even on the east than on the west. Thus far I have dealt with facts which are either admitted or not substantially controverted. But there are other facts in dispute, and upon these issues I must state my findings. Thomas Fishenden, son of an old tenant of the farm, and who followed his father as tenant, speaks from 1848 till 1865. He gave his evidence in a manner which completely satisfied me. He swore that his father's cattle used to be turned into the strip to graze, and that his father used to put hurdles all round the boggy places to keep the cattle from getting in, which hurdles were only taken away in the summer. I accept this evidence. There is a good deal of evidence by other tenants or their labourers that horses and cattle from the farm used to be turned out to graze on the strip. There is no doubt that horses or cattle passing along the road sometimes strayed into or were turned into the strip. The principal person who did this was a cattle dealer named Young, and he admitted that he had been ordered off by the tenants, who would not let the cattle stop. It is clear that gipsies occasionally stopped there, but they were ordered off by the tenants, and not by the road authorities. Mr. Morgan, who was road surveyor up to about 1878, seeing some cattle straying on the strip, ordered them off, saying that they had no right there without leave of the owner. On the other hand, some cows were occasionally taken there to graze by occupiers of land in the neighbourhood, though this was not proved to be with the knowledge of the tenants. Grass was occasionally cut by passing strangers and carried away in carts, but such acts were wrongful, whether the strip was or was not part of the highway. The result of the evidence as a whole is this—as far as living memory goes the plaintiffs or their predecessors in title have used and enjoyed this strip in such a manner and to such an extent as the nature of the strip permitted, and have exercised acts of ownership inconsistent with public rights. I refer especially to the hurdles, to the roadways to the ditch, and, though I do not attach great importance to it, to the cutting of the willows. I do not find a single act done on the strip by the road authorities until the acts complained of in this action. I cannot regard the occasional placing of a heap of stones or road scrapings on the west side of the highroad instead of on the east side, where they were usually placed, as of any real importance. There is a conflict of evidence as to the fact, but, assuming it to be proved that a heap of stones or scrapings was placed there for a short time, I should hesitate to regard it as an act which the occupier of the strip was bound to protest against. The proper inference would be that it was permissive. Upon the whole, I think the evidence is insufficient for the purpose of proving dedication of the strip as a highway by user. There is not a single exercise of highway rights over the strip except at the narrow margin next the highroad—a margin varying from two to four feet in width, and to some extent obstructed by shrubs. The defendants, however, assert that there is a presumption of dedication to the public quite up to the ancient fence, and that there is no justification for limiting the dedication to that portion of the highroad which is metalled, even though highway rights have not been exercised beyond the metalled highway. On this point I have derived assistance from the judgments of Channell, J. and of the Court of Appeal in Neeld v. Hendon Urban District Council (81 L. T. Rep. 405). Lord Russell of Killowen says at p. 409: "It seems to me very difficult to give assent to such a general proposition as this—that, under all conditions where you find a metalled road bordered by unmetalled margins and beyond the margins by hedges, there is an invariable presumption that all the space between the hedges is highway. The question whether such a space is all highway would depend to a great extent, I think, on many other circumstances—such, for instance, as the nature of the district through which the road passes, the width of the margins, the regularity of the line of the hedges, and the levels of the land adjoining the road. These are all circumstances which should be taken into account before any presumption of law can arise as to the width of the highway. It seems to me that it is not safe to say, as a general proposition, without knowing the conditions of each particular case, that in such a case as I have mentioned all the space between the hedges is part of the highway. . . . It is often impossible to discover the exact circumstances under which a fence has been erected upon any particular spot. The fence may have been put there because there was already a sort of natural boundary, or it may be in some cases that the person who made the enclosure wished to leave a margin of ground for the use of the public if at any time the road should become foundrous. But even in the latter case I doubt whether it would be right to say that a margin left by the landowner outside a fence for that purpose is necessarily dedicated by him as a highway for all time." Now, applying the principles laid down by the late Lord Chief Justice, I think there is no presumption of dedication up to the old fence, or that, if there is any such presumption, it is rebutted by the surrounding circumstances and by the evidence. The only difficulty I have felt is as to the margin. But upon reflection I do not see my way to hold that it is part of the highway unless every highway passing through an uninclosed country must, as matter of law, be deemed to include a certain space on each side of the metalled road. I am satisfied that the margin has been used only occasionally and by a few persons, and only to such an extent and in such a manner as was inevitable by reason of the absence of any fence or other obstacle. Such user is too indefinite to form the foundation of a public right, or to establish a dedication as part of the highway. I may add that, even if the public have rights over the margin, but not beyond, the acts of the defendants cannot be justified. I must therefore make a declaration and grant an injunction in terms of paragraphs 1 and 3 of the claim, and the defendants must pay the costs of the action.

HEDLEY v. WEBB. (a)

Local government—Sewer—Drain—Laying sewer in land of another—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 13.

In Nov. 1899 W., the owner of a plot of land on which he had erected two semi-detached houses, laid down two sets of pipes connecting the water-closets of the houses with a sewer vested in the local authority. This connection was made partly under a road which had been conveyed to the plaintiff who claimed a declaration that W. was not entitled to drain his premises through the plaintiff's land. W. submitted that his two houses were two buildings within the Public Health Act 1875, and that from the point of junction of the pipes to the sewer was a sewer within the Act.

Held, that the erection was only one building, although it consisted of two semi-detached houses. Held, also, that a man by making a culvert wrongfully on another man's land without his consent could not make the culvert a sewer and divert the property from the owner of the land.

This was an action for a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to drain his premises through the plaintiff's premises, for an injunction to restrain him from permitting the connection to remain, and for an order for the removal of such connection.

The defendant, the owner of a plot of land and of half the road in front of it, in Nov. 1899 erected two semi-detached houses on his land, and laid down two sets of pipes from the water-closets of the houses which joined and connected with the sewer vested in the local authority in that part of the road which did not belong to the defendant.

On the 17th Jan. 1901 Marchant conveyed two plots and the half of the road in which the conduit connected with the sewer to the plaintiff.

Mickleth, K.C. and E. Clayton for the plaintiff. — The two semi-detached houses are only one building, and the culvert is not a sewer. The plaintiff cannot by wrongfully making a culvert on another man's land divert the property from the owner of the land :

Meader v. West Cowes Local Board, 67 L. T. Rep. 454; (1892) 3 Ch. 18.

Evie, K.C. and Buckmaster for the defendant. — The two houses are two buildings within the meaning of the Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 13. From the point of junction the culvert was a sewer and not a drain :

Kershaw v. Taylor, 73 L. T. Rep. 274; (1895) 2 Q. B. 471;

The owner of the land acquiesced in the making of the connection through his land.

COZENS-HARDY, J.—What the defendant had done was prima facie a trespass, but it was said to be justified in several ways. First it was said that Marchant, the plaintiff's predecessor in title, had acquiesced in the making of the connection through his land, but there was no evidence of that. Then it was said that the culvert from the pair of detached houses was not a drain, but a "sewer" within the meaning of the Public Health Act, and was vested in the local authority, and that the plaintiff had no right to interfere. The Act defined "drain" and "sewer" as follows: "Drain" means any drain of and used for the drainage of one building only, or premises within the same curtilage, and made merely for the purpose of communicating therefrom with a cess-pool or other like receptacle for drainage, or with a sewer into which the drainage of two or more buildings or premises occupied by different persons is conveyed." "Sewer" includes sewers and drains of every description, except drains to which the word 'drain' interpreted as aforesaid applies, and except drains vested in or under the control of any authority having the management of roads and not being a local authority under this Act." Apart from authority, I would have thought that this was the case of the drainage of one building only. A structure might be one building whether it was occupied by one or more person or persons, and whether in flats or not. The term "one building" was not equivalent to the term "one house." A pair of semi-detached houses might be one building only. In Kershaw v. Taylor (ubi sup.), a Divisional Court held that from the point of junction the culvert was a sewer and not a drain within the Metropolitan Local Management Act 1855, but there the drainage came from two separate pairs of semi-detached houses. In Travis v. Utiley (ubi sup.), it was held that a pipe receiving the drainage of more than one "building" was a sewer within the meaning of the Public Health Act; but in the present case the erection was only one building, although it consisted of two semi-detached houses, and this culvert, so far as it ran through the plaintiff's land, was not a sewer. But even if it was a sewer there would be a further difficulty, as to which, as at present advised, his Lordship was against the defendant. Could a man by making a culvert wrongfully on another man's land without his consent make it a sewer so as to vest it in the local authority and divert the property from the owner of the land? The observations of Chitty, J. and the Court of Appeal in Meader v. West Cowes Local Board (ubi sup.) were against the defendant on this point. Webb could not by a trespass on the plaintiff's own land make something a sewer so as to prejudice the plaintiff. I must make a declaration that the defendant was not entitled to drain through the plaintiff's premises, and order the defendant to take up and remove the drain complained of.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

April 1 and 3, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL (on the relation of the Bromley Rural District Council) AND THE BROMLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. COPELAND. (a)

Highways—Highway authority—Pipe through bank to carry off rain waters from highway—Right to pass the waters through pipe on to adjoining land—“Drain”—Prescription—Highway Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), s. 67.

A pipe through a bank separating a public highway from adjoining land, through which the rain waters collecting on the highway are passed from the highway on to the surface of the adjoining land and not to any proper outlet, is not a “drain” within sect. 67 of the Highway Act 1835, and therefore the highway authority have no power under that section, as against the owner of the adjoining land, to maintain such a pipe and thereby discharge the waters collecting on the highway on to the surface of his land.

The right which a highway authority have over an ancient highway is not such a dominant tenement as would give them a common law right by prescription to maintain this pipe through the bank and to pass the waters from the highway through the same on to the surface of the adjoining land; and therefore the highway authority can acquire no such right or easement by prescription even though they have for more than the statutory period exercised the right of passing the water through the pipe on to the adjoining land.

FURTHER CONSIDERATION before Lord Alverstone, C.J. in an action tried by him without a jury.

The plaintiffs were the Attorney-General on the relation of the Bromley Rural District Council and the Bromley Rural District Council, and they claimed an injunction to restrain the defendant from stopping up or obstructing an ancient watercourse or flow of water passing from the public highway leading from West Wickham to Beckenham, in the county of Kent, over land of the defendant lying between such highway and West Wickham station, in the parish of West Wickham, and from causing obstruction to the highway; and they also claimed damages for the obstruction of and injury to the highway.

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B.] ATTORNEY-GENERAL AND BROMLEY RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL v. COPELAND. [K.B.]

The Bromley Rural District Council is the highway authority for the parish of West Wickham, and the road in question was the public highway in the parish leading from West Wickham to Beckenham, and was under the highway jurisdiction of the council.

The defendant was the owner of certain land in the parish adjacent to the road, and separated therefrom by a bank and hedge. The defendant bought this land about two years before the date of the action and he had built houses thereon, and such houses were occupied by his tenants. The road was an ancient highway, and there was a fall or dip in the road opposite the defendant's land. At the point in the road at which the question in the case arose there were, prior to the year 1868, two old catch-pits, one on either side of the road, connected by a pipe or culvert under the road. This point was the lowest point of the road, there being a falling gradient on one side and a rising gradient on the other, and the land on the side opposite to the defendant's land also sloped downwards towards the road.

Prior to the year 1868 the rain and storm waters collecting on the road and running down the road in both directions towards the lowest point would there collect and pass into the catch-pits, and the water from one catch-pit would then pass through the pipe under the road into the catch-pit on the defendant's side, and thence from this catch-pit to an old cut in the bank.

In the year 1868 the catch-pits were enlarged and were connected by an iron pipe under the road, and from the catch-pit on the defendant's side a pipe was put through the bank under the hedge which divided the road from the defendant's land, and through this pipe the rain and storm waters collecting at this point of the road were passed from the catch-pits on to the defendant's land and over the surface of the same.

The learned judge was of opinion that there was sufficient evidence to show the existence of an easement for passing the water through the pipe on to and over the defendant's land, assuming that the plaintiffs were entitled to claim such an easement. It was not denied that the defendant had obstructed the flow of the water.

The plaintiffs alleged that the Bromley Rural District Council and their predecessors in title had made and maintained for many years past this pipe through the bank, and that the rain and storm waters collecting on the road had passed through such pipe on to and across the defendant's land for many years prior to the purchase of the land by the defendant and had continued so to pass at the time of such purchase, and that such waters had so flowed from the road through the pipe on to the defendant's land from time immemorial, and that there was always an ancient watercourse and natural outlet for such waters from the road over the defendant's land; and that the defendant had unlawfully obstructed the channel and pipe and had interfered with and prevented the flow of the water from the road over his land.

The defendant alleged that there never was or had been an ancient watercourse or natural outlet for the rain waters from the road over his land, and he submitted that neither the Bromley Rural District Council nor their predecessors in title had acquired any right to a watercourse or to the flow of the water from the road on to or over the defendant's land.

Sect. 67 of the Highway Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50) provides:

And be it further enacted, that the said surveyor, district surveyor, or assistant surveyor, shall have power to make, scour, cleanse and keep open all ditches, gutters, drains, or watercourses, and also to make and lay such trunks, tunnels, flats or bridges, as he shall deem necessary, in and through any lands or grounds adjoining or lying near to any highway, upon paying the owner or occupier of such lands or grounds, provided they are not waste or common, for the damages which he shall sustain thereby, to be settled and paid in such manner as the damages for getting materials in inclosed lands or grounds are herein directed to be settled and paid.

Bray, K.C. and Clarke Williams for the plaintiffs.—The question is whether there can be a legal origin for this easement in favour of the plaintiffs. We contend that there is a legal statutory origin and a legal common law origin. For the legal statutory origin we rely on sect. 67 of the Highway Act 1835, which gives the highway authority power to acquire an easement, to make and maintain a drain, and to pour water through that drain on to the adjoining land. If there had been a ditch at the other side of this hedge and the defendant's predecessors had allowed this water to run down that ditch, then undoubtedly the plaintiffs would have had an easement to put a pipe through the bank into that ditch. In that case the pipe would have been a "drain" within sect. 67. It makes no difference whether there is a ditch or not, except as to the amount of compensation to be paid under the section to the owner; otherwise where there is no ditch the authority could not exercise their powers at all, and the road would remain flooded and the object of this section be defeated. We therefore have the right to make a drain through this bank and let the water pass through, and we contend that this pipe is a "drain" within sect. 67. The only case we can find on the point is Croft v. Rickmansworth Highway Board (60 L. T. Rep. 34; 39 Ch. Div. 272), where it was held that a well into which waste water flowed through a pipe and thence percolated into the soil was not a "drain or watercourse" within sect. 67. That case only shows that if we were merely seeking to make or cleanse a pond, or if we were draining into a pond or ditch, we should have no right to clean out that pond or ditch except in so far as this section gives us power to do it. A clear distinction is there drawn between the drain by which the water was conveyed to this pit and the pit itself; and all the case decides is that the pit for receiving the water from the drain was not a "drain." That case therefore is no authority against the plaintiffs. The plaintiffs have therefore a statutory right under this section to acquire this right against the defendant, and to put this pipe through the bank. That is the statutory origin of the plaintiffs' rights. Then with regard to the common law origin, where a thing like this has been going on for a great many years—and we do not know when this began—a legal origin ought to be presumed; and in dealing with the common law right we have to deal with the two halves of the road differently, because presumably the half of the road on the defendant's side belongs to the defendant, and the other half to the owner of the land on the other side. Clearly the owner of the land on the other side could claim an easement—if he proved it—to go through the defendant's land under the road and so on through the bank to the land on the other side of the bank. He may acquire that right either by virtue of his own acts, or by the acts of his tenants and occupiers, as an occupier may acquire rights for the owner, in which case both owner and occupier would be entitled:

Ivimey v. Stocker, 14 L. T. Rep. 427; L. Rep. 1 Ch. 396.

There would be nothing to prevent the owner and his occupier from acquiring the right to take the water from his side of the road over the defendant's land, and the highway authorities are in the position of occupiers of the roadway for certain purposes: (per Lord Cairns in Rangeley v. Midland Railway Company, 18 L. T. Rep. 69, at p. 70; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 306, at p. 311). With regard to the half of the road on the defendant's side, although an ordinary tenant cannot acquire as against his landlord, who is the owner of the adjoining land, an easement over that adjoining land, and although if the highway authority were an ordinary tenant there might be a difficulty in saying that the highway authority could acquire an easement by occupying land belonging to the owner of the servient tenement, yet this is not the case of an ordinary tenant, but a case where the highway authority have a qualified but permanent occupation which is sufficient to found an easement. Upon both grounds the plaintiffs are entitled to succeed.

G. B. Rashleigh (Dickens, K.C. with him) for the defendant.—The defendant was lawfully entitled to do what he did. We submit these four propositions: First, the Prescription Act 1832 does not apply to rights in gross:

Shuttleworth v. Le Fleming, 19 C. B. N. S. 687; 11 Jur. N. S. 840.

Secondly, an owner of land has a right to protect himself from flood water not brought there by his own act, although by so doing he injures someone else:

Nield v. London and North-Western Railway Company, L. Rep. 10 Ex. 4.

The defendant has done an act on his own land; he has stopped up this pipe, and by so doing it may be said that he has injured the highway, but he was entitled to do so to protect himself. Thirdly, a highway authority may not make use of their rights over the road in such a way as to deprive the adjoining owner of the reasonable use of his land:

Vestry of St. Mary, Newington v. Jacobs, 25 L. T. Rep. 800; L. Rep. 7 Q. B. 47.

Fourthly, the only statutory right which this highway authority have under sect. 67 of the

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XX.

Highway Act 1835 is the right to carry the water by a proper drain off the road through the land, but not in such a way as to do the defendant an injury. The statute could never have intended to give the plaintiffs a right to make a drain through this bank and let the water run on to the defendant's land without making any provision for the proper disposal of the water. It is assumed that under the operation of this section the surveyor of highways at some distant time made these drains and has a right to keep them open, but there is no record whatever to show that any such thing ever took place, and there is no authority to show that such a right can be claimed under the statute by prescription. The plaintiffs are obliged to call in aid the Prescription Act 1832 in order that they may claim the benefit of sect. 67; but I assume that the highway authority are not "occupiers of a tenement," so as to bring them within sect. 5 of the Prescription Act; and if they are not occupiers of a tenement, they do not come under the Prescription Act at all. The plaintiffs are a statutory body and can have no rights except those given by the statute, and unless such a right as is here claimed is expressly given them by the statute, they do not possess it:

Croft v. Rickmansworth Highway Board (ubi sup.)

There is nothing in the statute which gives them the right to drain the water off the road on to the defendant's land and leave it there; and the principle of that case is strongly in the defendant's favour, as it shows that the highway authority had no right to interfere with the enjoyment of the defendant's land. This pipe is not a "drain" within the meaning of the section, and therefore there cannot be a legal origin for the right claimed. The pipe was there when the district council came into possession, but unless the statute gave them the right to put it there, no prescription can give them the right. Again, the plaintiffs have no such right in the road as would enable them to acquire an easement by common law independent of statute. The public have no hereditament, no property, and no rights in the road which can be passed from one to another, and therefore they cannot acquire any easement of the kind here claimed, and the only thing in Rangeley v. Midland Railway Company (ubi sup.) to support such a right is the use by Lord Cairns of the word "occupation." With regard to the Acts of Parliament under which the district council claim their title, it is useful to refer to the judgment of Thesiger, L.J. in Rolls v. Vestry of St. George-the-Martyr, Southwark (43 L. T. Rep. 140, at p. 143; 14 Oh. Div. 785, at pp. 800-1), where he deals with the rights of the surveyor over the roads, and shows that under the Highway Act 1835 the surveyor had no rights beyond mere rights of control and management. Then under sect. 11 of the Highway Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 61), all the property, including all easements, which belonged to the surveyor of highways passed to, and became vested in, the highway board of the then formed highway districts. Then under sect. 4 of the Highways and Locomotives (Amendment) Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 77), power was given to the rural sanitary authority of a district coincident with a highway board to become a highway board and to exercise all the powers thereof, and, under sect. 5, all the property, including "easements"—as in the previous Act—of the highway board or any surveyor of the parish passed to, and became vested in, the rural sanitary authority, so that if there were any "easements" in the original surveyor they passed to the rural sanitary authority. Then, lastly, under sect. 25 of the Local Government Act 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), all the powers, duties, and liabilities of the rural sanitary authority in the district and of any highway authority were transferred to the rural district council. The easement claimed is not an easement which the surveyor of highways could have acquired, and therefore not an easement which became vested in the plaintiffs. He also referred to

Cur. adv. vult.

April 3.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. read the following judgment:—In this case the Attorney-General, acting on the relation of the Bromley Rural District Council, and the Bromley Rural District Council, have brought an action against the defendant in respect of the interference with the flow of water through a certain pipe which had been put through the bank of the defendant's land, and it was not denied that the defendant had obstructed the flow of the water. The only question for my determination is whether the Attorney-General on the relation of the plaintiff board or the plaintiff board themselves are entitled to an injunction to restrain the defendant from interfering with the flow of water through the pipe in question. The point of law raised is somewhat novel. It will be convenient in the first instance that I should state the facts which gave rise to it. There is in the district of the Bromley Rural District Council a road which passes from the Swan inn at West Wickham north-west in the direction of Beckenham. It is not disputed that the road was an ancient highway. The road near the point as to which the question arises passes to the south-west of West Wickham station, and runs approximately parallel to the railway, which is in a cutting some little distance to the east. I find upon the evidence before me that prior to the year 1868 there were at the point E on the Ordnance plan which was produced in evidence in this case two old catch-pits, one on either side of the road, connected by an old pipe or culvert under the road. There is a falling gradient from the south for a distance of upwards of one-quarter of a mile to the point E, about one in twenty-five, and a rising gradient from the point E towards the north-west having a fall of about one in 400. The point E is in consequence the lowest point in the road at that point, having gradients rising from it in each direction. In addition, the natural lie of some part of the land on the west is towards the road. Prior to the year 1868 the water collecting on the road and running down each gradient in both directions and collecting at the point E would find its way into the two old catch-pits, and from the western catch-pit by means of the pipe under the road to the eastern end, and then to an old cut in the bank. In the year 1868 the old catch-pit on the west was enlarged, a new catch-pit put on the east side, and the catch-pits were connected by an iron pipe, and from the eastern catch-pit stone pipes of 12in. diameter were put in through the bank. Under these circumstances I come to the conclusion that there was sufficient evidence before me to show the existence of an easement for the passing of water through the pipe on to the land of the defendant, assuming that the plaintiffs are entitled to claim such an easement. I have now to consider whether the Bromley Rural District Council, or the Attorney-General on their relation, can enforce against the defendant the right to continue the flow of water through the pipe in question. It is urged by the plaintiffs that, inasmuch as under the 67th section of the Highway Act 1835 a surveyor of highways could make drains through adjoining grounds upon payment of compensation to the owners, this pipe through the bank was in fact a drain, and that I must assume after the uninterrupted usage of so many years there had been some arrangement between the adjoining owner and the relators or their predecessors under that section. This section formed the subject of discussion in the Court of Appeal in the case of Croft v. Bickmansworth Highway Board (60 L. T. Rep. 34; 39 Ch. Div. 272). That case is not decisive of the point raised before me, inasmuch as no question of principle there arose, but I think that the judgments of the Court of Appeal do show that the only rights which could be lawfully acquired by a surveyor of highways are rights which come within the words of the section. I am of opinion that this pipe through the hedge is not a drain within the meaning of that section. It is true it may be said to drain the water off from the road, but, on the other hand, it is only a means whereby water is passed from the road on to the surface of the adjoining land, and in my opinion it is not a drain such as is contemplated by that section, which I understand to be a drain or watercourse for the conveyance of water to some proper outlet. In addition to claiming by virtue of this section, the plaintiffs also base their claim upon common law prescription, on the ground that the public, as the occupiers of the road, had for more than the statutory period enjoyed the privilege of passing out the water from the pipe, and in support of their case they cited a passage from the judgment of Lord Cairns in the case of Rangleley v. Midland Railway Company (18 L. T. Rep. at p. 70; L. Rep. 3 Ch. 310-11) as supporting the view that a right of way is not an easement, and therefore the surface of the road was in occupation of the persons using the road. In my opinion this contention of the plaintiffs cannot be supported. In order to found a claim to an easement of this character there must be a dominant tenement to which the easement can be attached. I can find no authority for the suggestion that a right of way can be considered to be such a dominant tenement for the purpose of having such a right attached to it, and there seem to me to be great difficulties in coming to that conclusion. I think that the relators have not on either ground acquired a legal right to have this particular pipe maintained and thereby to discharge the water upon the defendant's land, and for these reasons I am of opinion that the action fails.

Weights and measures—Fees for verification and stamping—Power of county council to remit—Weights and Measures Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), s. 47—Weights and Measures Act 1889 (52 & 53 Vict. c. 21), s. 13.

A county council has no power to direct an inspector of weights and measures not to take fees in respect of the verification and stamping of weights and measures. No such power is conferred by reason of sect. 13 of the Weights and Measures Act 1889.

CAUSE shown against a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to remove to the King's Bench Division a certain surcharge of 1*l.* 1*l.* 4*d.* made by the auditor appointed by the Local Government Board to audit the accounts of the county councils in the Eastern Counties Audit District upon the audit held by him upon the accounts of Thomas Kyle, an inspector of weights and measures for the county of Bucks.

At a meeting held on the 10th Nov. 1899, the Bucks County Council duly passed a resolution that the fees for verification and stamping of weights and measures and weighing instruments charged under sect. 13 of the 1st schedule of the Weights and Measures Act 1889 should cease to be taken on and after the 1st Jan. 1899, but that traders should continue to pay the cost of cartage and lifting of standards for the verification of weighing instruments of above 56*lb.* in weight.

In consequence of this resolution, and acting upon the instructions of the county council, the inspector of weights and measures ceased to take any fees for the verification and stamping of weights, measures, and other instruments under sect. 13 and the 1st schedule of the Weights and Measures Act 1889.

Upon the audit of the accounts for the year ended the 31st March 1900, the district auditor surcharged the inspector of weights and measures with the sum of 1*l.* 1*l.* 4*d.*, representing fees which he should have collected but for the resolution of the council and the consequent instructions given to him by the county council, but which he in fact never collected or received.

The surcharge had not been paid by the inspector, and it was submitted that it was improper and illegal as, under sect. 13 of the Weights and Measures Act 1889, there was no obligation upon him to collect any such fees or upon the county council to insist upon their being paid.

The grounds upon which the writ was sought were (1) that, under the Weights and Measures Act 1889, s. 13, there was no legal obligation on the inspector to take fees; (2) that the order of the county council directing him not to take fees was legal and binding upon him; and (3) that in any event he was wrongly surcharged in respect of fees which he had not in fact received.

By the Weights and Measures Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 49), s. 47:

An inspector under this Act may take in respect of the verification and stamping of weights and measures such fees, not exceeding those specified in the 5th schedule to this Act, as the authority appointing him from time to time fix, and shall at such times, not less often than once a quarter, as the said authority direct, account for and pay over to the treasurer of the local rate, or such person as the said authority direct, all fees taken by him.

By the Weights and Measures Act 1889, s. 13 (1):

An inspector of weights and measures may take in respect of the verification and stamping of weights, measures, and weighing instruments the fees specified in the 1st schedule to this Act, and no others, and no discount shall be allowed, and such inspector shall at such times, not less than once a quarter, as the local authority direct, account for and pay over to the local authority, or as they direct, all fees so taken.

In the 1st schedule to the Act there is a list of fees headed:

Fees to be taken on the verification and stamping of weights, measures, and weighing machines by inspectors of local authorities.

C. A. Russell, K.C. showed cause.—There is no power in any of the statutes which enables the county council to pass a resolution of this kind. The section now in force is sect. 13 of the Weights and Measures Act 1889. It is not contended that the inspector can take anything but the fees in the schedule; but the other side say that he need not take anything at all. Sect. 47 of the Weights and Measures Act 1878 is repealed together with the 5th schedule of that statute by the Act of 1889. I submit that the auditor was quite right to surcharge this amount, and the rule should be discharged.

Macmorran, K.C. (McIntyre with him) in support.—Under sect. 43 of the Weights and Measures Act 1878 the inspector is appointed by the local authority, that is now the county council. It was found that under sect. 47 there was no uniformity, and so the Act of 1889 was passed, simply to give that uniformity. The law was not altered, and I submit is the same as under sect. 47. By sect. 13 of the Act of 1889 the inspector acts as the agent of the local authority, and as such is accountable to them. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Then what was the object of repealing the first part of sect. 47?] All the Act of 1889 did was to fix the fee, and not to fix the minimum. The section is in reality only permissive and not imperative.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—We have nothing to do with the policy pursued by the county council in this case. It may be a wise and prudent matter not to insist on payment of fees for the stamping of weights and measures, but our only duty is to construe the Act of Parliament and see whether the county council has power to remit these fees by instructing their inspector not to take them. In this case it appears that under the resolution of the county council the inspector took no fees for verifying the weights and measures. Then came the audit, and the auditor found no amounts entered as having been received on account of such fees. If the inspector had not paid over money received by him, he would certainly be surcharged, but, as a matter of fact, no fees having been collected, the auditor surcharged the inspector with the amount that he ought to have collected. The important question is, Has the county council, under the Weights be clearly distinguishable from the colour or nature of the ground whereon such figures are painted or marked. He shall cause the first of such plates to be fixed on the outside and the second of such plates on the inside of such carriage in such a position and manner that the number thereon shall be at all times distinctly and plainly visible and legible. He shall not wilfully or negligently cause or suffer any such plate to be in any manner or by any means concealed from public view or to be inverted at any time while such carriage may stand, ply, or be driven for hire.

The following are the sections of the Towns Police Clauses Act 1847 which chiefly apply to this case:

37. The commissioners may from time to time licence to ply for hire . . . within five miles from the General Post Office of the City . . . such number of hackney coaches or carriages of any kind or description adapted to the carriage of persons as they think fit.

38. Every wheeled carriage, whatever may be its form or construction, used in standing or plying for hire in any street within the prescribed distance, and every carriage standing upon any street within the prescribed distance, having thereon any numbered plate required by this Act to be fixed upon a hackney carriage, or having thereon any plate resembling or intended to resemble any such plate as aforesaid, shall be deemed to be a hackney carriage within the meaning of this Act; and in all proceedings at law or otherwise, the term "hackney carriage" shall be sufficient to describe any such carriage: Provided always that no stage coach used for the purpose of standing or plying for passengers to be carried for hire at separate fares, and duly licensed for that purpose, and having thereon the proper numbered plates required by law to be placed on such stage coaches, shall be deemed to be a hackney carriage within the meaning of this Act.

68. The commissioners may from time to time (subject to the restrictions of this Act) make bye-laws for all or any of the purposes following—that is to say For regulating the conduct of the proprietors and drivers of hackney carriages, plying within the prescribed distance in their several employments, and determining whether such drivers shall wear any, and what, badges, and for regulating the hours within which they may exercise their calling; for regulating the manner in which the number of each carriage corresponding with the number of its licence shall be displayed; for regulating the number of persons to be carried by such hackney carriages, and in what manner such number is to be shown on such carriage, and what number of horses or other animals is to draw the same, and the placing of check strings to the carriages and the holding of the same by the driver, and how such hackney carriages are to be furnished or provided; for fixing the stands of such hackney carriages, and the distance to which they may be compelled to take passengers, not exceeding the prescribed distance; for fixing the rates or fares, as well for time as distance, to be paid for such hackney carriages within the prescribed distance, and for securing the due publication of such fares; for securing the safe custody and redelivery of any property accidentally left in hackney carriages and fixing the charges to be made in respect thereof.

William Wills (A. A. Bethune with him) for the appellant.—This vehicle was not a hackney carriage within sect. 38 of the Towns Police Clauses Act 1847. At the time alleged the vehicle was not being used "in standing or plying for hire in a street." A construction put on the Act and bye-law such as the respondent seeks to place upon them is altogether unreasonable. In Case v. Storey (20 L. T. Rep. 618; L. Rep. 4 Ex. 319) it was held that a hackney carriage whilst on the premises of a railway company by their leave, for the accommodation of passengers arriving by their trains, was not plying for hire in any street or place within the meaning of the Hackney Carriage Acts. They also referred to

Clarke v. Stanford, 24 L. T. Rep. 389; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 357.

Hugo Young, K.C. (Berkeley with him) for the respondent.—A hackney carriage is a vehicle that is used from time to time in plying for hire, and it does not cease to be a hackney carriage merely by reason of it not actually being at the time plying for hire. The reason for licensing is to enable the authorities to keep control, and, if the contention of the appellant is correct, there could be no control exercised except when the vehicle was actually being used for hire. That construction of the section of the Act would reduce the provisions to a nullity and is absurd.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The point in this case is a new one, and requires some consideration. I must say I was at first struck by the difficulty which was raised in the argument for the respondent that a hackney carriage must always be used as a hackney carriage, and that the proprietor of such carriage when he gets an order for the hire of a carriage, as in the present case, is not entitled to cover up the number. The object and purpose of the bye-law is to protect the public and to provide proper carriages and drivers, and also to provide for inspection of carriages. If a man elects to take advantage of the Act, he elects at the same time to devote his carriage to definite purposes indicated by the bye-law. In my opinion, the words used in sect. 38 of the Towns Police Clauses Act 1847, "used in standing or plying for hire," indicate the period of time during which a carriage is to be deemed a hackney carriage. I cannot construe these words in the way that is contended for in the argument for the appellants, that it is only while the carriage is actually standing or plying for hire that it is to be deemed to be a hackney carriage. The justices have, I think, taken the right view of the case. Every wheeled carriage which is in fact used from time to time for the purpose of standing or plying for hire is a hackney carriage within the section, and the words "standing or plying for hire" are not confined to the actual period of time during which such carriage may be engaged in standing or plying for hire. The appellant therefore contravened the bye-law by covering up the plate under the circumstances of this case. The appeal must be dismissed.

Adjournment of meeting to October—Legality—Alehouse Act 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61), s. 3.Where through misadventure the proper notice has not been given of intention to apply for an ale-house licence, under the Alehouse Act 1828, the justices have no power to adjourn the adjourned general licensing meeting to a day in October to enable the proper notice to be given.Rivals in trade who own neighbouring licensed houses have sufficient interest to enable them to apply for a certiorari.*

CAUSE shown against a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to remove into the King's Bench Division to be quashed an order made at a meeting of the justices for the borough of Harwich for the purpose of confirming licences in that borough, on the 6th Nov. 1900, confirming a provisional licence granted to one White on the 23rd Oct. 1900, authorising him to apply for and hold any of the excise licences that may be held by a publican for the sale by retail of intoxicating liquor at a certain house to be constructed.

The ground upon which such writ was sought was that the licence was granted by the justices on the 23rd Oct. 1900 without jurisdiction.

The facts were as follows:—

On the 25th Sept. 1900 the adjourned general licensing meeting for the borough of Harwich was held.

An application was made on behalf of one White for a provisional full licence. When such application was called on, evidence was adduced to prove the due and proper service of the notices required, and it was found that the notice had been served two days too late upon the superintendent of police owing to the sudden illness of the person deputed to serve the notice. Thereupon the justices adjourned the meeting until the 23rd Oct. 1900 in order to give the applicant time to serve fresh notices.

Objection was taken to this course on behalf of certain brewers who appeared to oppose the granting of the licence.

On the 23rd Oct. 1900, at the adjournment of the adjourned general annual licensing meeting, the same objectors opposed the grant of the application, due notice of which had in the meantime been given. The objection taken was that the justices had no power to adjourn the meeting into October or to sit as licensing justices in that month, as such a course was in contravention of the provisions of sect. 3 of the Alehouse Act 1828.

The justices overruled this objection, relying upon sect. 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1870, and they then heard and granted the application for a provisional full licence.

On the 6th Nov. 1900 the confirming licensing authority for the borough sat, when the confirmation of the above grant was opposed by the same objectors on the same grounds. The confirming authority, however, overruled these objections and confirmed the grant of the provisional full licence.

C. E. Jones showed cause against the rule.—This writ is not granted as of right, and I contend that under the circumstances of the present case it should be refused. He referred to the judgment of Williams, J. in Reg. v. Nicholson (81 L. T. Rep. 257; (1899) 2 Q. B. 455). The magistrates had jurisdiction. The licence was granted under the Alehouse Act 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61). It is true that sect. 3 of that statute gives a limitation as to the times of the meetings and adjourned meetings, but I submit that they have power to adjourn the meeting into October or to any time before the confirming committee meets. That power is also given by sect. 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 29). In Paterson's Licensing Acts, 12th edit., at p. 330, it is stated: "This section must be taken to extend and alter the provisions of the Alehouse Act 1828 (9 Geo. 4, c. 61) so far as respects applications for certificates. . . . This section enables the justices to adjourn an adjourned meeting as well as the general annual meeting, and they may do so to a day beyond the respective months of March in Middlesex and Surrey, and of August and September in other counties, if the applicant has through inadvertence or misadventure failed to comply with the Act." That is a correct statement of the law as it now exists, and the facts disclosed show that the failure to comply with the Act was due to misadventure—namely, sudden illness. In Reg. v. Denbigh Justices (59 J. P. 708) Lord Russell, C.J. and Grantham, J. held in a case where the objection was only made at the meeting, that the provision that the adjournment must be held within the time mentioned in the section was directory merely, and that the justices might therefore hold the adjournment out of the statutory time. The case of Webber v. Birkenhead Justices (61 J. P. 664) may be said to be against me, as Ridley, J. held that, where written notice of objection had been served, the provisions as to the time of the adjournment were imperative. But in this last case there was no question of inadvertence or misadventure. Hawkins J. in Reg. v. Anglesea Justices; Ex parte Williams (59 J. P. 744) stated that, an objection being taken, the justices may adjourn "to a future day," not necessarily comprised in an adjournment of the general annual meeting. This rule should be discharged.

Rawlinson, K.C. and E. E. Wild in support.—Sect. 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1870 does not apply to this class of case at all. The application in this case is for an alehouse licence, and the Act of 1870 only applies to licences for wine and beer houses. No part of that Act, with the exception of the provisions as to notices, applies to a full licence in an alehouse. As to the decision of Lord Russell, C.J. and Grantham, J. in Reg. v. Denbigh Justices, that case can be explained, for by mandamus the Court of King's Bench can always compel a licensing court to sit out of its proper time. But where the sitting is the voluntary act of the licensing authority, there is no power to sit out of the times laid down in sect. 3 of the Alehouse Act 1828. There is no section dealing with inadvertence or misadventure in the case of an alehouse. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—It seems that if sect. 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1870 applies, you are out of court. But if sect. 3 of the Alehouse

Act 1828 is imperative, that accounts for Reg. v. West Biding Justices; Drake's case (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 33; 34 J. P. 4.) In the note to sect. 11 of the Act of 1870 in Whiteley's Licensing Laws we submit that the law is correctly stated. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I cannot see why Reg. v. Denbigh Justices (sup.) was decided as it was if you are right.] Webber v. Birkenhead Justices (sup.) is a more recent case, and is in my favour. On the question as to whether we are persons aggrieved, we submit that we are. They referred to

Reg. v. Nicholson, 81 L. T. Rep. 257; (1899) 2 Q. B. 455.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—It is with great regret that I come to the conclusion that this rule must be made absolute. If I could have seen my way to decide against the applicants for the rule, who are merely rivals in trade of the applicants for the licence and who had taken a highly technical objection, I should have done so. But I feel bound, with much regret, to come to the conclusion that the rule must be made absolute. If we were to decide otherwise our decision would be taken to be a decision that an adjourned meeting to receive original notices could be held in October. I think that would be going too far. The Act of 1828, by sect. 3, contemplates that the general annual meeting and every adjourned meeting shall be held in August or September. Therefore prima facie there is a direction that the work is to be got through by the end of September. It is contended that there was power to adjourn an adjourned meeting, apart from the section dealing with inadvertence. But if it had been competent for the justices to sit in October, it would not have been necessary to give the specific injunctions that were given in Reg. v. West Biding Justices; Drake's case (L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 33; 34 J. P. 4), where it was laid down that the notice might be given twenty-one days before, and the application made at an adjourned meeting. Therefore, apart from any other section, I come to the conclusion that an adjourned meeting to receive new notices could not be held in October. But there is sect. 11 of the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1870, which allows an adjournment in the case of a failure to comply with preliminary requirements through inadvertence or misadventure. If I could have seen my way to hold that that section was attracted to the Act of 1828, I should have felt inclined to have acted under it. But if that section had been intended to apply to every licence we should have found proper words, and the words "the grant or renewal of a certificate" would not have been used. With regard to the case of Reg. v. Denbigh Justices (59 J. P. 708), there is, in the first place, a doubt whether the case was within sect. 42 (1) of the Licensing Act 1872; and, secondly, the fact that the proceeding was by mandamus might have made a difference. That seems to have been the view of Ridley, J. in Webber v. Birkenhead Justices (61 J. P. 664). On the question whether the applicants were persons aggrieved, there is no doubt that no real grievance arose from the omission to serve the notice; but the question is whether the applicants had an interest in the decision. A person who is an aggrieved person so as to enable him to ask for a certiorari is a person who had an interest in the decision given. It would be too strong to say that such an interest did not exist in the present case.

SQUIRE (app.) v. STANLEY BROTHERS (resps.). (a) Factory—Making and finishing of bricks—Girl under age of sixteen—Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), s. 38, sched. 1.

Bricks after being baked were taken to dipping sheds, and after being placed in a preparing solution were dipped in glass and scraped and knifed. They were then stacked, and ultimately baked with a view to setting the glaze. They were then polished, and stacked until wanted for sale.

Held, that this constituted the "finishing of bricks" within the Act.

CASE stated upon an information preferred by the appellant against the respondents charging them with unlawfully employing in a factory in which there was carried on the making and finishing of bricks two girls under the age of sixteen.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:—

The respondents made at the factory in question plain and glazed or enamelled bricks, and also (inter alia) impressed glazed bricks.

Two girls, who were under the age of sixteen on the 16th July 1900, had for some time previous to that date been employed by the respondents in the factory.

In one part of the factory the dust out of which the bricks, whether plain or glazed, were made was pressed and moulded by steam into ordinary brick shape, and then taken to dust kilns to be baked, but neither of the girls were employed in any of these processes, which were all carried out by men.

The following additional processes were, however, necessary and were carried out in the premises of the factory when the respondents were glazing or enamelling the bricks: The rough or plain bricks made as above were carried from the dust kilns wherein they were baked to sheds, called dipping sheds, which were separate erections from the dust kilns, but were near them and not separated from them by any barrier or inclosure. The face of each brick was first dipped in a preparing solution or (to use the technical term) bodied. Then the prepared bricks were dried and stacked in the sheds, and the face prepared as above was afterwards dipped in glaze and scraped or knifed. The bricks so glazed and scraped were stacked, and they were ultimately carried from the sheds to ovens near the sheds and baked with the view of setting the glaze. They were then polished and finally carried to stacking sheds, where they remained until required by the respondents for the purpose of sale or otherwise.

On the 16th July 1900, and during the period of their employment, the girls were employed in carrying four or five or a less number of bricks from the dust kilns to the dipping sheds, where they were stacked and glazed by the dippers, also in carrying the bricks after they had been glazed from the dippers in the sheds to another place in the same sheds, where they were knifed or scraped, in carrying them from the sheds to the ovens, where the glazed bricks were baked and polished, and occasionally, but not often, in carrying the baked and polished bricks to the final stacking sheds.

One of the girls was on the day in question and for a week at a time during the period of her employment also employed in actually dipping the face of the bricks in the glaze.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that by the combined effect of sect. 38 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 and the 1st schedule thereto there was an absolute prohibition against the employment in any place within the close or curtilage of a factory where bricks were made or finished of girls under the age of sixteen years, and further that the processes performed upon the rough bricks constituted a finishing of bricks within the meaning of the 1st schedule of the Act.

On the part of the respondents it was contended that there was no absolute prohibition as alleged, but only a prohibition to employ girls under sixteen in the processes of making and finishing of bricks, and that the above processes did not constitute a finishing of bricks.

The justices were of opinion that the contention of the respondents was correct and dismissed the information.

Parfitt for the appellant.

Hugo Young, K.C. and Dorsett for the respondents.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I do not wish to decide more than is necessary for this case. I do not want to express any opinion one way or the other as to there being an absolute prohibition against any employment at all in a brick factory of a girl under the age of sixteen. There is a great deal to be said in favour of the view. On the other hand, one does not wish to decide an abstract question, and I think it better not to express an opinion unless it is thought I am expressing one against the decision already expressed. I am clearly of opinion that this was a factory where these girls were undoubtedly employed from time to time carrying the bricks from place to place, and that this was a finishing of bricks within the meaning of the schedule. It would be impossible, to my mind, when a brick has assumed a shape to say because it can be used as a rough brick for foundations, or for insides, or a brick for some commercial purpose, that if it afterwards goes through processes whereby it is to be made into the commercial article, which is intended to be sold, that that is not finishing a brick. All that happens here is that the body of the brick having been produced by the kiln work is taken to another part of the factory to be finished into the commercial brick, and, looking at the processes referred to, I think they are just as likely to be injurious to young people as the earlier part of the manufacture; but, be that as may, I am quite satisfied that what is described in the case as additional processes was the finishing of bricks within the meaning of the statute.

MAG. CAS.—VOL. XX.

Under these circumstances the justices clearly ought to have convicted, and the case must go back to them.

MIDLAND RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. PONTEFRAC T UNION (resps.). (a)

Rating—Running lines—Junction with another company's system—Signal box—Assessment of.

A signal box, at the junction of one line of railway with the line of another company, is properly assessed separately from the railway line itself, although the levers and signals are included in the assessment of the railway line.

CASE stated by quarter sessions for the West Riding of York upon an appeal by the Midland Railway Company against an assessment to the poor rate made by the overseers of the township of Methley.

The Midland Railway Company (hereinafter called the appellants) are the owners of a railway running through the township and parish of Methley, made under the authority of the North Midland Railway Act 1836, and was afterwards consolidated with other railways and became known as the "Midland Railway" by the Midland Railway Act 1844.

The property of the appellants in the township consists of 3828 yards of a double line of railway, a small roadside station known as Methley station, with the usual offices, sidings, signal boxes, and other hereditaments, and a signal box situate at a distance of 1320 yards south of the station, at a junction known as Methley junction, where trains of the North-Eastern Railway and the Lancashire and Yorkshire Railway (which companies have running powers over the lines of the Midland Railway) leave the lines and proceed upon the proper lines of the respective companies.

On the 9th April 1900 the respondents, the overseers of the poor, laid a rate for the relief of the poor of the township, whereby the appellants were assessed in respect of their property herein as follows:

	Rateable value.
1. 3828 yards railway	5201	0	0
2. Station sidings and land	117	0	0
3. Signal boxes (Methley)	1	10	0
Signal boxes (Methley) siding	2	10	0
4. Gasworks	17	0	0
5. Pumping station	36	0	0
6. Signal box (Brigg's sidings)	1	10	0
7. Station house	10	0	0
8. Signal box Methley junction	4	10	0

A due demand for such rate was made on the appellants.

In making the assessment of the 3828 yards of railway the respondents estimated the rateable value of a line of railway within the township by ascertaining the gross receipts of the appellants in respect of so much of the line as runs through the township and deducting therefrom (inter alia) a sum amounting to 5*l.* 10*s.* per cent. of the gross receipts in respect of stations and buildings (including signal boxes) separately assessable in the several parishes in which they are respectively situate, all of which, together with all the property of the appellants within the township, were separately assessed as hereinbefore mentioned.

The appellants duly gave notice to the respondents that they objected to the rate in respect only of the assessment upon the signal box at Methley junction, numbered 8 on the foregoing list (hereinafter referred to as the signal box), and upon the 11th April 1900 they attended upon the assessment committee of the union of Pontefract to urge their objection, but failed to obtain any relief in respect thereof.

They thereupon duly appealed to the Court of Quarter Sessions for the Riding against the rate, on the following grounds—viz.: (1) That the company were by the rate or assessment erroneously rated in respect of the signal box at Methley junction which forms part of the railway in the parish or township of Methley; (2) that the company were rated in respect of the signal box which is not separately rateable from the railway in the township or parish.

The signal box is a wooden erection 22ft. in length, 11ft. 6in. in breadth, 16ft. in height, and contains lower and upper floors, and is affixed to the soil by a framework consisting of six upright wooden piles 9in. square. It is covered by slates, and is warmed by means of an iron stove and lighted by gas. It contains upon the upper floor twenty-four levers for working the signals and points controlling the passing of the trains of the North-Eastern and Lancashire and Yorkshire Railways respectively on to and off the appellants' line, together with the telegraphic and other instruments necessary thereto, and the only purposes the erection serves are to protect the servants of the appellants engaged in working the same from the weather. The signal box is only rendered necessary in its present situation by reason of the junction of the appellants' line with the lines of the other companies hereinbefore mentioned.

Upon the hearing of the appeal it was contended on the part of the appellants that the levers within the box were physically connected with the signals and points upon the running line, that these signals and points could be worked without the instruments in the box, that the wooden erection was essential to the proper working of the levers and instruments, that therefore the signal box and its contents formed a necessary part of the running line of railway, which had already been assessed at 520*l.*, and that if the rate appealed against in respect of the signal box were to stand it would, in effect, be rated twice over. The levers and instruments themselves were, it was contended, clearly not rateable separately from the railway, and the wooden structure protecting them, having no letting value, was also not separately rateable. The justices were referred to the following cases: London and North-Western Railway Company v. Llandudno Improvement Commissioners (75 L. T. Rep. 659; (1897) 1 Q. B. 287); Great Eastern Railway Com- pany v. Overseers of Fletton Union, decided in the Queen's Bench Division on the 6th Nov. 1882, and reported in Boyle on Rating, 2nd edit., p. 1063; South Wales Railway Company v. Swansea Local Board (4 El. & Bl. 189; 24 L. J. 30, M. C.).

On the part of the respondents it was conceded that the levers and signals within the box were not taken into account in the assessment in question, and they had included them in the assessment of 520*l.* in respect of the railway line, the assessment in respect of the signal box being limited to the estimated annual value of the structure alone, apart from the levers and signals. They contended that the structure was a building and was separately rateable within the parish where it was situated according to the parochial principle of rating, and that it was not a part of the running line, but in the nature of property which was convenient though not essential for the proper and efficient working of the railway within the township, and should therefore be separately assessed. It was further contended that, not being directly productive of profit to the appellants any more than station buildings and other conveniences provided by them, all of which were maintained out of the gross receipts of the appellants from the line, a deduction was made from the gross receipts in respect of these non-directly productive properties before fixing the net rateable value of the running line, such deductions being 5*l.* 10*s.* per cent. on the gross receipts; that such was a fair and reasonable deduction, and if it were held that the appellants, having had the benefit thereof, were also to escape from a separate assessment of the signal box, the result would be a loss to the parish of the benefit of the hereditaments. Evidence was given by expert witnesses called before the court on behalf of the respondents that signal boxes have been hitherto separately rated, and that the 5½ per cent. on the gross receipts was deducted in respect of stations and buildings, including signal boxes.

The appellants admitted that they had never at quarter sessions or any other appeal raised the question which is now raised.

The quarter sessions dismissed the appeal.

Balfour Browne, K.C. and Compston for the appellants.

Macmorran, K.C. and Scholefield for the respondents.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The argument in this case is, I think, out of date. The confusion arises from attempting to say that the case of London and North-Western Railway Company v. Llandudno Improvement Commissioners (75 L. T. Rep. 659; (1897) 1 Q. B. 287) is in any way applicable to the circumstances of the present case. In that case the question was what is meant by "railway," and it was decided that the word included not only the rails and the land upon which they rest, but also those things without which the railway could not be used as a highway. We are not called upon to decide here what is and what is not part of the railway. The question for the rating authorities in this case is at how much they are going to assess the rateable subject-matter. Now, a signal box is a rateable subject-matter. It must be remembered that you do not assess a railway by finding what a hypothetical tenant would give for it from year to year like other things. You start with the gross earnings, and then break it up by making a deduction in respect of property not remunerative or separately assessed elsewhere. That deduction, I now believe, is 5½ per cent. It is argued that you cannot work a line without signal boxes, but in this respect there is no difference between water tanks, turntables, &c., and such like matters which are equally necessary to the working of the line, and which are equally the subject of rating. In my opinion, the quarter sessions acted upon well-known principles of law which ought not to be upset. I only refer to the question of the levers as it is argued that if they are not rated neither should the signal box, which acts as a mere cover for the instruments, be rated. But the answer is that the levers are calculated in the 5½ per cent. deduction, which, as I have already said, comes off the gross earnings. This appeal must be dismissed.

WINTER v. BANCKS AND ANOTHER. (a)

Stolen goods—In possession of police—Acquittal of person charged—Demand by true owner—Delivery by police to other than true owner.

When a subordinate police officer having the possession of stolen goods, after a demand by the true owner for their delivery to him, delivers the same to a person other than the true owner, he is liable in trover although he acted upon the orders of a superior officer.

A. bought a gig. It was stolen from him, and afterwards found by the police in the possession of B. B. was indicted for larceny of the gig and acquitted. B. on his acquittal wrote to the police officer in possession of the gig demanding delivery of it to him, and A. afterwards by letter and personally applied for its delivery over to him. The police officer, acting on the instruction of his superior officer, after giving notice to A. of his intention to do so, delivered the gig to B. as the person from whom it had been taken by the police.

Held, that the police officer so delivering it was liable in trover to A., who was found to be the true owner of the gig.

Hollins v. Fowler (33 L. T. Rep. 73; L. Rep. 7 H. of L. 757) and Stephens v. Elwall (4 M. & Sel. 259) followed.

APPEAL from a County Court.

The facts appear sufficiently from the above headnote and the judgment.

E. Sutton for the appellants.—Previous to the Police (Property) Act 1897 there was no statutory provision as to what was to be done with stolen property in the possession of the police when the person charged with the larceny of it was acquitted. But it was decided very long ago that as long as the police retained possession of it the true owner had no right to compel them to give delivery of it to him; such right only arose when it came into the possession of someone not entitled to retain it. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The point is here whether, admitting the police cannot be sued as long as they hold their hand, they are not liable when they take upon themselves, after demand of the true owner for possession, to deliver the stolen goods to a person who is not the true owner.] All that the police did here was to deliver the stolen goods to the person from whom they had taken them. This could not put the true owner in any worse position than he was before the police took possession of the goods. Moreover, it did not amount to a conversion: (see per Collins, J. in Consolidated Company v. Curtis and Son (1892) 1 Q. B. 495, at p. 498). And the defendants in this case did nothing except act on the lawful instructions of their superior officer.

Trevor Lloyd for the respondents.—The defendants here did not merely hold their hand. As far as they could do so, they disposed of the stolen goods after demand for possession by the true owner. This renders them liable in trover, and the fact that they acted merely as subordinates is no defence:

Hollins v. Fowler, 33 L. T. Rep. 73; L. Rep. 7 H. of L. 757;

Stephens v. Elwall, 4 M. & Sel. 259.

E. Sutton in reply.

April 25.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. read the following judgment of the court:—This is an appeal on the part of the defendant from the judgment of his Honour Judge Gwynne James, who gave judgment for the plaintiff with 4l. damages. The action was brought in trover by Mr. Winter to recover the value of a gig alleged to have been converted by the defendants—Bancks and Lings. Judgment was given for the defendant Bancks, but judgment for 4l. damages was given against the defendant Lings. It was contended on behalf of the plaintiff that the judge had rightly found that the defendant Lings had been guilty of conversion in having refused to deliver the gig to the plaintiff, and in having subsequently delivered it to a man named Broderick. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that he had not been guilty of any act which rendered him liable in the action. The material facts appear to be as follows: On the 17th May the plaintiff bought a gig at Newton fair. Subsequently to the purchase the gig disappeared, and was afterwards found in the possession of Broderick. Broderick was prosecuted for the larceny at Liverpool Quarter Sessions, and on the 17th July was acquitted. On the same day Broderick's solicitor wrote to the police officer in charge at Newton-le-Willows police-station, and to all others whom it may concern, a letter demanding possession and return of the gig. On the 18th July, the next day, the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to the sergeant in charge at Newton-le-Willows police-station claiming that the gig was still the plaintiff's property, and asking that it should not be given up to any other person than the plaintiff. On the 20th Mr. Grundy, the acting superintendent, wrote to the plaintiff's solicitor stating that it had been decided to return the gig to Broderick at twelve on Saturday, the 21st. On the 31st July the plaintiff's solicitor wrote to Sergeant Bennett, the sergeant in charge at the police-station, giving him notice of his intention to commence an action on behalf of the plaintiff for the recovery of the gig. The only other material facts proved before the learned judge were that on the 18th July the plaintiff asked the defendant Bancks for the gig and he refused to give it up, and that upon the 21st the plaintiff again asked Bancks and the defendant Sergeant Lings, who was Bancks' superior officer, to deliver to him the gig, and that one of them replied, "No, I am going to give it to Broderick," and that on the same day Bancks by Lings' instructions handed the gig to Broderick. Lings had not been made a defendant when the action was commenced, but he was added as a defendant by consent at the trial as he was Bancks' superior officer. Lings further stated at the trial that in handing the gig over to Broderick he acted under instructions received by telephone from his superior officer, Inspector Grundy. Under these circumstances the learned judge found that after demand by Winter and refusal to comply with it by defendant Lings he (the defendant Lings) handed over the gig to Broderick. No application was made under the 1st section of the Police (Property) Act 1897, either by the plaintiff or the police, for an order of a court of summary jurisdiction as to the custody of the gig. The case is undoubtedly near the line. It was contended on behalf of the defendant that there was no conversion by the defendant Lings, that he acted in doing what he did under the instructions of his superior officer, Inspector Grundy, that he did not intend to deprive the plaintiff of the property in the gig, but was simply handing it back to the person from whom it had been taken prior to the hearing of the charge at the quarter sessions. The learned judge found that the gig was in fact the property of the plaintiff, and that as the defendant Lings had taken upon himself to hand the property over, after demand and refusal, he was liable in trover. After careful consideration we have come to the conclusion that the judgment was right. We think it must be taken upon the findings to which we have referred that the defendant Lings was responsible for the custody of the gig and did, in fact, hand it over at a time when it was the plaintiff's property and after the plaintiff had demanded possession. We think the case falls within the principle laid down in the cases of Hollins v. Fowler (sup.) and Stephens v. Elwall (sup.), and that the defendant, though acting as a subordinate, is responsible. He was party to a dealing with the plaintiff's property and acted at his peril. We think, therefore, that the judgment should be affirmed and the appeal dismissed with costs.

NELSON AND Co. (apps.) v. BOARD OF TRADE (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

NELSON AND Co. (apps.) v. BOARD OF TRADE

Life assurance—Life annuities—Granted by tea merchants to customers becoming widows—Life Assurance Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61), ss. 2, 3.

By sect. 2 of the Life Assurance Act 1870, "company" therein means "any person or persons, corporate or incorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, who issue or are liable under policies of assurance upon human life within the United Kingdom, or who grant annuities upon human life in the United Kingdom." By sect. 3 a company commencing business after the passing of the Act must deposit 20,000*l.* with the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery.

*N. and Co. were tea merchants who, in connection with their business as such, had since 1897 offered to married women who had bought their tea for a certain time before the death of their husbands annuities of a certain amount so long as they remained widows. N. and Co. were not registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, and had not deposited 20,000*l.* with the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery.*

Held, that they were a company within the Life Assurance Act 1870, and liable to a penalty for commencing business without making such deposit.

APPEAL by case stated from the justices of the borough of Louth.

On the 29th Nov. 1900 an information was preferred on behalf of the Board of Trade against Nelson and Co., otherwise known as Rasmus Jensen (hereinafter called the appellants), for that they, being a company not registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, and being a company who grant annuities upon human life and carry on the business of life assurance within the United Kingdom, and being established after the passing of 33 & 34 Vict. c. 61, intituled "An Act to amend the Law relating to Life Assurance Companies," did on the 19th May 1900 unlawfully make default in depositing the sum of 20,000*l.* with the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery, and that such default had since continued and still continued, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided.

At the hearing it was admitted by the appellants and found as a fact that the appellants were not registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies, and had not on the 19th May 1900 or since deposited the sum of 20,000*l.* with the Accountant-General, and that they were established after the passing of the Life Assurance Companies Act 1870 for the purpose of carrying on business under the scheme hereinafter described, which they commenced to do in Jan. 1898 and had since done.

From the documents annexed to the case, the nature and particulars of the scheme were shown to be as follows:

The appellants were retail tea merchants. In connection with their business as such they sold to customers, at the price of one penny, a "purchaser's card" for the purpose of recording the amount of tea purchased weekly by the customer to whom the card was sold. On the front of the card was printed an intimation that the entries of the card must correspond with the books of the appellants, such books being considered the only proof of the fact of the consecutive purchase of the tea. On the back of the card was set out the scheme or arrangement under which the card and tea were to be sold. The material parts of it were as follows:

NELSON AND Co. (apps.) v. BOARD OF TRADE (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

Nelson and Co. . . . will pay to every woman who shall have become a widow since Christmas 1897, and who since that date shall have purchased not less than one half pound of their tea per week for the last five consecutive weeks previously to her becoming a widow 10s. per week as long as she remains a widow, and to every woman who became a widow previously to Christmas 1897, or previously to her commencing to purchase Nelson and Co.'s tea, 10s. per week as long as she remains a widow, provided that she shall have purchased half a pound of tea per week for ten years. Customers who require only a quarter of a pound weekly and purchase the same under the above conditions, will receive 5s. per week instead of 10s. The only condition is that at the commencement of the continuous taking of the tea the husband must be certified to us by a duly qualified medical practitioner to be in good health, but a certificate of health will be dispensed with in case of customers who have purchased tea every week for the twelve months next previous to the husband's death.

In order to provide a reserve fund to meet liabilities under this scheme the appellants had on the 17th Feb. 1900 executed a trust deed under which a board of management was constituted, and by the terms of the deed the appellants' books were to be audited quarterly, and the appellants were to pay to such board one penny on every pound of tea sold.

The appellants had also published in support of the scheme a leaflet containing an announcement of its provisions as above set out, a list of widows who were receiving annuities under the scheme, and a certificate by the solicitor to the appellants to the effect that the books of the appellants had been audited for the year ending the 31st Dec. 1898, and the reserve fund of one penny on every pound of tea sold had been handed to him to hold in trust.

It was found as a fact that the widows whose names were given in this leaflet had purchased the appellants' tea in accordance with the scheme, and that they were in fact being paid by the appellants the annuities to which they had thus become entitled.

On these facts the justices held that the appellants were, on the 19th May and subsequently, carrying on the business of life assurance within the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Life Assurance Companies Act 1870, and convicted the appellants.

The Life Assurance Companies Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 61):

Sec. 2. In this Act the term "company" means any person or persons corporate or unincorporate, not being registered under the Acts relating to friendly societies who issue or are liable under policies of assurance upon human life within the United Kingdom or who grant annuities upon human life within the United Kingdom.

Sec. 3. Every company established after the passing of this Act within the United Kingdom, and every company established or to be established out of the United Kingdom, which shall after the passing of this Act commence to carry on the business of life assurance within the United Kingdom, shall be required to deposit the sum of twenty thousand pounds with the Accountant-General of the Court of Chancery. . . . The Accountant-General shall return such deposit to the company so soon as its life assurance fund accumulated out of the premiums shall have amounted to forty thousand pounds.

Haldane, K.C. (Wood Hill with him) for the appellants.—Shortly my contention is that when the whole Act is looked at it is clear that by "assurance company" is meant an assurance company carrying on assurance business in the ordinary sense, and it is not to be taken to extend to what not only covers the case of Messrs. Nelson, but might cover the case of an enormous lot of business carried on by people who as a mode of supporting their ordinary business give prizes or pensions to those of their customers or employees who conform to certain conditions. Sometimes tradesmen give a rebate on the goods purchased during the year where these amount to a certain value; sometimes they give cards with purchases, a certain number of which entitle the possessor to something or other. Here they give pensions to customers becoming widows under the circumstances set out in the case. This is surely very different from carrying on a business of life assurance or granting annuities on lives. No doubt, on the principle of Carlill v. Carbolic Smoke Ball Company (67 L. T. Rep. 837; (1893) 1 Q. B. 256), Messrs. Nelson, who are perfectly bona fide in making this offer to widows, are liable on it to widows who have fulfilled the condition. But, nevertheless, this card is not a policy of assurance, for by sect. 2 of 14 Geo. 3, c. 48, it is enacted: "That it shall not be lawful to make any policy or policies on the life or lives of any person or persons, or other event or events, without inserting in such policy or policies the person or person's name or names interested therein, or for the whole use, benefit, or on whose account such policy is so made or underwrote" [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—But the customer's name is inserted in the card.] The card as issued is blank—it is merely called a "purchaser's card"—and the books of the firm are made the only evidence of the purchases.

The Attorney-General (Sir R. Finlay, K.C.) (H. Sutton with him) was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case the magistrates came to the conclusion on the facts that the appellants were on the 19th May 1900 carrying on the business of life assurance in the United Kingdom within the meaning of the Life Assurance Companies Act 1870, and the question for the court is whether, on the facts stated in the case and as disclosed by the documents, Messrs. Nelson are a company granting annuities upon human life, and carrying on the business of life assurance. Now nothing turns upon the question of incorporation. It is quite clear that the statute deals also with the person, but the question is what business was being carried on? It is really a question of fact, but, the case being submitted to us, I think we ought to express our opinion upon the facts before us, inasmuch as it arises upon documents, and it is obviously a case of importance. Now the facts, as I understand them, are these: Messrs. Nelson, perfectly bona

[K.B. Div.]

ST. JAMES' HALL COMPANY v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

fide and with the intention of promoting their own business, devised a very attractive scheme which will in certain events give to widows annuities on the deaths of their husbands of 10s. or 5s. a week. They receive so much money for the tea; and of course it is not suggested that it is done for charity, but out of profits. A portion of the price paid for the tea is the money which Messrs. Nelson can use for the purpose of insuring the annuities to these widows. They take a card on which the name of the person is entered who has purchased the tea; a weekly record is kept of the number of pounds bought, which of course would indicate so much money paid to Messrs. Nelson by that particular woman upon the terms of the bargain or contract which is held out by Messrs. Nelson to her, and there is made and entered in the book of the branch a record which is to be prima facie evidence if not the only evidence of the fact of the purchase. Therefore these gentlemen are perfectly bona fide and properly keeping a record of their customers who may ultimately become entitled to this annuity. Some will become entitled and some will not. As Mr. Haldane says, some will drop out and will not continue buying, and others will not become widows under such circumstances that they can obtain the annuity. In addition to that they publish an attractive advertisement (I agree with Mr. Haldane that it is no part of the contract, and use it only for the purpose of seeing whether the magistrates were right in the conclusion they came to as to the nature of the business) in which they say that they are in the course of establishing a business which if, by the assistance of many customers, it reaches the magnitude which is indicated will show that there is out of the profits of the tea, after deducting salaries, rent, taxes, costs, and duty, enough to pay 10,000 widows 10s. apiece per week, with a very enormous balance of cash in hand, which would be Messrs. Nelson's profits; but it is of course available in the shape of security for the insurance if the figures are at any rate approximately right. Further, they purport to set aside a penny in the pound, and there is a trust deed, which trust deed says that 2000*l.* is held in respect of this business. In the face of these facts it is, in my mind, quite impossible to come to any other conclusion than that, in connection with this tea trade, Messrs. Nelson are carrying on what may be a very desirable scheme of insurance, in a very profitable method to them, and also a very desirable and advantageous system to people who buy tea, of granting annuities which become effective on the death of the husband. Now the words of the section to which our attention has been called are "who issue or are liable for policies of assurance on human life, or who grant annuities upon human life within the United Kingdom." Now, I do not think that the argument based upon what is a policy within the Act of George III. had any real relation to the subject. But even if it had, the latter words, "who grant annuities upon human life," are obviously applicable because this is to be an annuity for the life of the widow, to commence on the death of the husband. I think, on consideration of this section, that it points to a carrying on of a business which depends on the payment of money or the payment of annuities dependent upon the duration of human life. That is what I understand to have been the object of the business which was contemplated by the statute, and as to which business it is provided that an amount should be deposited. I will only point out that the 20,000*l.* deposit under sect. 2 has no relation to the amount of business done. It was no doubt considered to be a sort of indication of substantial position of the person carrying on the business; and when the sum accumulated from premiums has reached 40,000*l.*, the amount deposited under sect. 2 is to be returned. Therefore it is clear that it was not intended to be a sum of money deposited with reference to the kind of business done by the company, but to be an indication of the substantial position of the people, be they companies or be they persons who are carrying on the business. I think the magistrates came to a perfectly right conclusion, and had the facts been submitted to me as a judge of fact of first instance I should have come to the same conclusion. At any rate, I am quite unable to say that the conclusion at which they arrived is wrong, and I think that judgment should be entered for the respondents.

LAWRENCE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I am very glad to be able to come to that same conclusion. I accept what Mr. Haldane says with regard to the bona fides of these people, but I am bound to say I should not have gathered it from the documents before us. If the company have any prospect of doing the immense business they hope to do, according to the scheme as advertised by them, they should not find any difficulty to deposit the comparatively paltry sum of 20,000*l.*

ST. JAMES' HALL COMPANY v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a)

Metropolis—Places of public entertainment—Structural defect—Notice to alter—Metropolis Management and Building Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 32), s. 11.

The powers given to the London County Council by sect. 11 of the Metropolis Management and Building Act 1878 to require, by written notice, that the owner of any theatre, music-hall, or other place of public entertainment, shall make structural alterations in the same whenever it appears to the council that such theatre, music-hall, or other place of public entertainment is so defective in structure that special danger from fire may result to the public frequenting the same, can be exercised only once in respect to the same theatre, &c., unless perhaps the owner has, since the powers were first exercised, himself so altered the structure of the theatre, &c., as to cause in the opinion of the council special danger from fire.

ACTION claiming a declaration that a certain notice served by the defendants on the plaintiffs was ultra vires and an injunction.

ST. JAMES' HALL COMPANY v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

[K.B. Div.]

The notice in question purported to be issued under the powers conferred upon the defendants by sect. 11 of the Metropolis Management and Building Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 32).

The material part of sect. 11 is as follows :

Whenever it appears to the board that . . . any house, room, or other place of public resort within the metropolis containing a superficial area for the accommodation of the public of not less than five hundred square feet, which was at the time of the passing of this Act authorised to be kept open, and which is kept open, for dancing, music, or other public entertainments of the like nature, under the authority of a licence granted by any Court of Quarter Sessions, is so defective in its structure that special danger from fire may result to the public frequenting the same, then and in every such case the board may, with the consent of . . . Her Majesty's principal Secretary of State in all cases, if in the opinion of the board such structural defects can be remedied at a moderate expenditure, by notice in writing require the owner of such house, room or other place kept open for any of the purposes aforesaid, under such authority as aforesaid, to make such alterations therein or thereto as may be necessary to remedy such defects within a reasonable time, to be specified in such notice.

The facts and arguments are fully set out in the following written judgment:—

CHANNELL, J.—This action, tried before me without a jury, was brought to obtain a decision upon the true interpretation of sect. 11 of the Metropolis Management and Building Act 1878, which section gave to the Metropolitan Board (and now the London County Council, their successors) certain powers for the prevention of danger from fire in music halls which had been licensed for the first time prior to 1878. The Metropolitan Board exercised those powers in 1885 in reference to St. James' Hall, and the plaintiff company, the owners of that hall, contend that the powers of the section must be exercised once for all. The defendants have served another notice purporting to be under the powers of the section, and the plaintiffs bring this action for a declaration that the notice is ultra vires and for an injunction. The plaintiffs have obtained an interlocutory injunction restraining the defendants from acting upon the notice until the trial, and I have now to say whether the plaintiffs' view of the section is right. If it is, there is no dispute that the plaintiffs are entitled to the declaration and, if they require it, to an injunction. The facts are that in 1885 the Metropolitan Board, proposing to proceed under the section, prepared a draft notice of their requirements. This draft notice was the subject of negotiation between Mr. Walter Emden (who then, as now, was the architect of the plaintiffs) on the one hand and the architect of the then board on the other. The result was that modifications of what was first proposed by the board were agreed to, and those modifications were embodied in the formal notice which was served dated the 10th Aug. 1885. The works in that notice were done by the plaintiffs at a cost, it is said, of upwards of 7000*l.* There was no appeal as the works had already been agreed, but the result seems to me to be the same in substance as if there had been an appeal against the original proposals of the board and the award had been that the works, which in fact were in the notice of the 10th Aug. 1885, should be done. At any rate it is not disputed that there was an exercise of the compulsory powers of the section. The original proposal of the board included the pulling down of an existing staircase and the re-erection of a better staircase at the same place. The modifications agreed on included the pulling down of that staircase, but it was agreed that it should not be re-erected, the necessary accommodation being provided elsewhere. One of the things which the county council now direct is the erection of a staircase at the same spot. I do not myself regard that fact as very important, but the change of view which has apparently taken place is an illustration of the mischief of holding that the powers of the section may be exercised from time to time whenever "it appears" to the fluctuating body that there is danger, as it certainly would be hard on the owner of the building if, as soon as he has complied with the requisition of the board, he is liable to be ordered to pull down and alter that very work on a change of views of the board, or its architect. Since the works were completed in 1885 the plaintiff company have from time to time, at the suggestion of the county council, voluntarily made some alterations in such matters as the seats in the hall, and otherwise, but they have done so without admitting the right of the defendants to require them to make those or other alterations, and it seems doubtful whether any of them were structural alterations. The London County Council now require, claiming the powers to do so by the 11th section, further works, the cost of which is estimated at upwards of 4000*l.*, and they have obtained (though without prejudice to the question now raised) the leave of the Secretary of State to make the requirement. Under these circumstances it becomes necessary carefully to examine the words of the section. [Reads sect. 11.] There is also a provision for an appeal to an arbitrator appointed by the First Commissioner of Works, who may either confirm the notice with or without modifications, or refuse to confirm it, and whose decision shall be final. There is nothing in the words used which is clearly inconsistent with the contention of either party. The word "whenever" seems to be as capable of meaning "at whatever time," which is the plaintiffs' contention, as it is of meaning "so often as," which is the defendants' contention; and it is necessary to look at the rest of the section and the context to see which of the two meanings it does bear. The first observation on the section is that it relates entirely to defects in structure and not to defects arising from want of repair, or from the mode of control or management of the premises, such as keeping doors locked or the like. Further, it only gave power to the board to require alterations which could be effected at a moderate expenditure. The result of that is that, if in 1878 there was a licensed music-hall which was so defective in its structure that special danger from fire arose, and the defects were such that they could not be remedied except at an excessive expenditure, no alterations could be required to be made in that music-hall, and, subject to any power the licensing authority might have to refuse to renew the licence, the hall must continue with its defects

K.B.] MERSEY DOCKS & HARBOUR BOARD v. ASSESS. COM. OF BIRKENHEAD UNION. [H. OF L.]

That being so, it seems clear that the Metropolitan Board could not, in reference to such a hall, divide its requirements and make successive requirements, each of which could be complied with at a moderate expenditure, although the total would be excessive. That goes to show that the powers of the section must be exercised once for all; otherwise, though the expenditure on each of the successive requirements might be moderate, the total might be excessive. Again, when the 12th and 13th sections are looked at, it certainly seems that, if a music-hall first licensed after 1878 complied with the regulations of the board in force at the date it was completed, and got a certificate to that effect, it would not be interfered with. It is unlikely that the existing halls would be put on a worse footing than new halls in this respect, but to this argument it is answered that the old halls can only be interfered with when it appears to the board that there is actual danger, and, further, that they are protected by the power of the Home Secretary to veto the requirement and by the right to require arbitration. These protections are, however, given in respect of the first exercise of the powers, and, therefore, they do not go far to show that there cannot be a second exercise. Further, the condition precedent is not that there should in fact actually be danger, but merely that there should "appear to the board" to be danger, and it is these words that give rise to the question whether the board can change their views. On the whole I have come to the conclusion that the plaintiffs are right in their contention. I think that the board had only power to order alterations if such alterations not only could be done at a moderate cost, but also would when done remedy the defects. It must, therefore, be assumed that, when the works done in pursuance of the former order were completed the defects were remedied, or, at all events, that in the opinion of that board they were remedied. That board could not in the next year have said that they themselves had made a mistake, and ought to have ordered something more or something different, and, if they could not, neither can the London County Council, who succeed to their rights. The word "whenever" is fully accounted for by its not being intended to compel the Metropolitan Board forthwith on the passing of the Act of 1878 to survey all existing music-halls. They were to exercise the power given whenever they choose, but when they did exercise it their judgment was, in my opinion, to be, subject to the mode of appeal provided in the section, final not only as to the works ordered being required, but also as to the order being sufficient. I may point out that this view of the section is in accordance with what has been decided in analogous cases in other Acts of Parliament, in that a power to a local authority to order structural works (as, for instance, sewers) at the expense of a private owner, must be exercised once for all: (Bonella v. Twickenham Local Board, 58 L. T. Rep. 299; 20 Q. B. Div. 63; Hornea Local Board v. Davis, 68 L. T. Rep. 503; (1893) 1 Q. B. 756). I am, however, not prepared to hold that if the owner of an old music-hall after complying with a requisition under this section, were himself to make further structural alterations, and the effect of those alterations was to cause, in the opinion of the London County Council, danger from fire, they might not then act in this section. That question does not arise now. If the owners of a hall should ever do this, it would probably be held that the hall as so altered was not the old hall which had been licensed prior to 1878, but a new hall coming under sect. 12, and that it must comply with the existing regulations. If, however, that was not held, it would be, in my opinion, an open question whether sect. 11 could not be applied to the case on the ground that although the hall had not lost the protection given by sect. 11, yet the powers of the board had never been exercised in reference to the defects in question. That case, however, differs entirely from the present. Here undoubtedly the Metropolitan Board did exercise in 1885 the powers of sect. 11, and, if there are any defects now, they either existed prior to the order of 1885 and ought to have been dealt with, or were occasioned by the works done in pursuance of that order. In either case the powers under sect. 11 were, in my opinion, exhausted. I therefore think that the London County Council cannot now exercise the powers. There must be judgment for the plaintiffs with costs.

HOUSE OF LORDS.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF BIRKENHEAD UNION. (a)

ON APPEAL FROM THE COURT OF APPEAL IN ENGLAND.

Poor rate—Rateable value—"Lairages"—Receipts and expenditure—Admissibility of evidence.

There is no rule of law limiting the method in which the rating authority may arrive at the rateable value of a hereditament, and the profits derived from the occupation are a legitimate element to be taken into consideration in arriving at the value of the occupation.

Judgment of the Court of Appeal affirmed.

THIS was an appeal from the judgment of the Court of Appeal (Smith, Collins, and Williams, L.J.J.), reported 19 Mag. Cas. 425; 81 L. T. Rep. 798; (1900) 1 Q. B. 143, who had affirmed a judgment of the Queen's Bench Division (Lawrance and Channell, J.J.) upon a case stated by the Recorder of Birkenhead, on an appeal against a rate and assessments made for the relief of the poor in respect of certain "lairages" on the Birkenhead side of the river Mersey, of which the appellants were owners and occupiers.

The facts of the case submitted by the recorder, Mr. Clement Higgins, K.C., who, at the desire of the Court of Appeal, further stated the principle on which he based his decision, stated (inter alia) that some of the lairages, known as the Woodside lairages, were entirely within the township of Birkenhead, and others, known as the Wallasey lairages, were only partly situated in that township.

(a) Reported by C. E. MALDEN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

H. OF L.] MERSEY DOCKS & HARBOUR BOARD v. ASSESS. COM. OF BIRKENHEAD UNION. [H. OF L.]

The lairages are buildings of brick and wood, roofed partly with felt and partly with slate, used for the reception and slaughter of cattle and sheep brought from abroad, and for the cooling and preservation of the carcases. Two of the buildings used as lairages were originally warehouses—one a warehouse of several stories and another a warehouse of two stories, erected and formerly used for the storage of general produce. Certain sloping galleries were constructed outside the warehouses with entrances thereto to enable the cattle to walk up to the various stories, and the warehouses were fitted with pens and other fittings necessary for lairages, slaughterhouses, cooling rooms, and stores. The other buildings were designed and constructed for the purpose of lairages, slaughterhouses, cooling rooms, and stores, and were fitted with pens and other fittings necessary for the above purposes and were for the most part of one story.

The premises are the only place in the neighbourhood at which foreign animals can be landed, except under penalties as provided by the Diseases of Animals Act 1894, but there are lairages for foreign animals at Deptford, Manchester, Hull, Cardiff, Bristol, Glasgow, and other places.

The premises of the said Woodside and Wallasey lairages are the part of the port of Liverpool defined as a foreign animals' wharf by an order of the Board of Agriculture, made the 4th Jan. 1896 in pursuance of the Diseases of Animals Act 1894.

The said lairages were erected and are worked and carried on by the appellants under the provisions of their statutory powers, and not as a local authority under the Diseases of Animals Act 1894. No local authority has been appointed under such Act in respect of the port of Liverpool. Only the part of the lairages which is within the township of Birkenhead is within the municipal area of Birkenhead. The lairages are carried on subject to the provisions of the Foreign Animals Order of 1896, which order was to be referred to and taken as part of the case.

In pursuance of the appellants' statutory powers, certain bye-laws have been duly passed for regulating, governing, and managing the stages, wharves, and landing places at which foreign animals are from time to time permitted to be landed on the estate of the Mersey Docks and Harbour Board, and in further pursuance of such statutory powers the appellants have prescribed a schedule of charges in respect of such animals. Such bye-laws and schedule of charges were attached to and formed part of the case.

In the course of the hearing of the appeal, the respondents tendered in evidence certain accounts, made up from the books of the appellants, showing the receipts and expenditure of the appellants in the conduct of the business of the lairages for the three years ending the 1st July 1896 and the averages thereof. The appellants objected to the admission of any evidence as to the amount of receipts and expenditure, but the recorder held such evidence admissible and admitted the evidence tendered by the respondents accordingly.

The learned recorder found the following facts:—

1. The tenements subject to assessment are capable of separate beneficial occupation apart from their connection with the rest of the appellants' property.

2. Their value is enhanced by their proximity to and connection with the docks and rails belonging to the appellants.

3. There are tenants other than the appellants available for the occupation of the tenements for the purpose of carrying on the business of a lairage.

4. There are no similar tenements in this neighbourhood with which a comparison can be made. If the assessment ought to be based on the mere structural value of the buildings plus the value of the land and without reference to receipts and expenditure, I find as follows: Lairage in Woodside, gross estimated rental, 13,381*l.*; net annual value, 8964*l.*; lairage in Wallasey, gross estimated rental, 3728*l.*; net annual value, 2419*l.* The appellants admit that if the principle of assessment contended for by the respondents is correct the gross estimated rentals of the two hereditaments in question appearing upon the rate book are not too high, and the respondents admit that in this appeal they cannot be increased. Consequently I adopt these figures and find the true rateable value as follows: Lairage in Woodside, gross estimated rental, 19,333*l.*; net annual value, 12,622*l.*; lairage in Wallasey, gross estimated rental, 4723*l.*; net annual value, 3414*l.* The result is that as the net values are reduced the appeal is allowed and the rate must be made upon the aforesaid net values of 12,622*l.* and 3414*l.*, instead of the figures 17,400*l.* and 4251*l.* As each party to the appeal has succeeded in part, there will be no order as to costs.

The questions for the opinion of the court are: (1) Whether the accounts referred to were properly admitted; (2) whether the principle adopted in the aforesaid judgment is correct. If the answers to both the questions are in the affirmative then the gross and rateable values as found by the Court of Quarter Sessions are to stand. If the answer to either question is in the negative, and the appellants' contention is correct, then the assessments are to be as follows: Lairage at Woodside, gross estimated rental, 13,381*l.*; rateable value, 8964*l.*; lairage at Wallasey, gross estimated rental, 3728*l.*; rateable value, 2419*l.*

Asquith, K.C., F. Marshall, K.C., and Horridge, K.C., appeared for the appellants, and contended that the recorder was wrong in admitting the evidence of the receipts and expenditure. The rateable value of a shop or place of business is quite independent of the actual profits made by the occupier. This is an attempt to rate a privilege conferred by the order of the Board of Agriculture, the profits from which can only be applied in the manner prescribed by statute. In considering the rateable value of a lighthouse the dues taken in respect of it cannot be taken into account. The proper way to arrive at the rateable value is to take the structural value of the buildings, and the value of the land, and Pickford, K.C., A. A. Tobin, and Montgomery, who appeared for the respondents, were not called upon to address their Lordships.

At the conclusion of the argument for the appellants, their Lordships gave judgment as follows:—

The LORD CHANCELLOR (Halsbury).—My Lords: In this case it appears to me, for reasons which have been given by the Court of Appeal and the subsequent explanation of the learned Recorder, that this appeal ought to be dismissed with costs. I cannot help thinking that a great deal of the hesitation and confusion which has arisen upon the subject matter which your Lordships have heard debated now on the part of the appellants has arisen from the advisory character of the judgments which have been given from time to time by the various courts before whom this question has come. The thing that the Legislature has called upon the overseers to do is to solve a simple question of fact, and although it may be by no means simple in the mode in which they are to arrive at it, the question of fact is simple enough as stated—that is to say, they are to look at the rent at which the several hereditaments rated might reasonably be expected to let from year to year free of all usual tenant's rates and taxes and tithe commutation rent-charge, if any, deducting therefrom the probable average cost of the repairs, insurance, and other expenses, if any, necessary to maintain them in a state to command such rent. That is the proposition put before the parish officers, which they have to answer, and they are to arrive at the value, so far as I know, unfettered by any statute as to the way in which they can do it. Now, I am not aware of any rule of law or of any statute which has limited them as to the mode in which they shall arrive at it, and it is not a question of law at all, it is a question of fact. These questions have from time to time come before the courts and have been argued as questions of law, where instead of doing what the section has directed them to do, the overseers, or those who were acting on the part of the parish, have thought proper either to include something which by law ought not to be included, or to exclude something which ought to have been included; and, of course, in that sense, where you are dealing with a question of fact which has to be answered by any tribunal, it may be that the question has come up in the argument as a matter of law; but still one must bear in mind that the thing to be done is to answer a plain question of fact: What is the rent which a tenant, subject to the deductions mentioned in the statute, can reasonably be expected to give for the buildings as a tenant from year to year? The first part of the proposition is that you are to rate. What? Not the tenant's trade. Some questions arise, with which I will deal presently, as to whether you are to go into the question of profit and loss. They are excluded by the language from the statute. You are to rate the hereditaments according to their value. Therefore it would be wrong to rate the trade as if you were dealing with it as a question for income tax. You are not rating the income; you are rating the hereditaments. So that where you have buildings of a similar character with equal facilities for carrying on the trade, you have a very facile mode of coming to the conclusion what sum would reasonably be given by a tenant from year to year for such buildings. But if instead of doing that, you choose to go into elaborate calculations of how much the thing cost to erect and when erected what would be the value of it, you are only elaborating and making more complex and difficult the simple proposition which the Legislature has put before the overseers to answer. From time to time observations have been made by some learned judges saying this should have been done and the other should have been done and the other should not have been done, but that was not as pronouncing judgments upon the law of evidence as to whether or not such and such a topic was legitimate or not in arriving at the conclusion at which the Legislature has directed them to arrive, but what was the ordinary and natural means of arriving at the conclusion at which they were bound to arrive. I am the more anxious to point this out because I think that in these later days we have got rid of a good many of these sources of confusion. The advisory character, as I have said, of the judgments given by the courts has, no doubt, led to words being used not in the strict sense, but as matters of advice to the justices in determining such questions, and sometimes they have been printed in the Law Reports as if they were decisions upon the law of evidence in this country. I protest against any such view, and in this very case, although, as I say, during the last half century we have arrived at conclusions which get rid of a great deal of the confusion which at one time existed, I find that Channell, J. uses a phrase to which I am afraid that I cannot assent—namely, that wherever you can arrive at the value by comparing it with similar tenements, you are bound to arrive at it in that way. If that means that it is a facile and proper way of doing it, I should agree, but if it is laid down as a proposition of law, that it is the only means by which it can be arrived at, I venture to say that I do not assent to that view. Again, I find that Collins, L.J. in the same way says: "Hence the rule that in ordinary cases when the standard of rent is applicable, evidence of actual profits made cannot be received. But it is equally true that when no such standard of comparison exists, it is legitimate to inquire into the profits actually earned."

Again, I am compelled to say that I cannot concur with the form in which that proposition is put. It is not a question of deciding what, according to the law of evidence, is receivable, but what is the more natural and ordinary and usual mode by which you can answer the proposition put by the Legislature to the overseers. The proposition appears to me a very intelligible one, if unclouded by all these questions which from time to time have been raised by ingenious persons (and at the expense of the parishes a good many academic questions have been discussed) you are to find out what a tenant will reasonably give, looking at all the circumstances of the particular occupation, including therein the business that might be done on the premises; and I think that I had occasion to say, in a former case, that it would be a very extraordinary thing if, although you can give evidence by expert testimony as to what kind of business might be done, you are not at liberty in point of law to ascertain what business has been done. It seems to me that no such proposition could reasonably be maintained. If, on the other hand, to go into the account of profits and losses would not be irrelevant, if you are finding out what a man's income is, for the purpose of ascertaining what a tenant would be likely to give, to suggest that it is something which in point of law you have no right to inquire into is equally absurd. If all the circumstances of the particular occupation, the mode in which the trade is carried on, and the circumstances either of restriction or of amplitude of the trade, are all legitimate subjects of inquiry, the only question of law is whether the particular tribunal has followed the line which I have indicated. Surely those who are complaining of what has been done by the tribunal must establish either that something has been excluded from the calculation which by law ought to be included, or that something has been included which by law ought not to have been included because the proposition is a proposition of fact, and the only mode in which you get in a question of law at all is as to the mode in which that proposition of fact has been dealt with. Let me see in that view what it is that the learned recorder has done. I must take the recorder's own statement of what he has done, and how he has applied his mind to the topics which I have stated to be legitimate topics—the topics to which he has been directed to apply his mind by the Legislature: "I did not assess the rate upon the profits of the tenant, but I used them, together with other evidence to test the values given by the appellants and respondents respectively. Having taken into consideration all the evidence before me as to the actual receipts and expenditure of the occupiers, who carried on the business, the nature of the business, and the chances of its permanence, the structural value of the buildings, the value of the land, and all the surrounding circumstances, I came to the conclusion that the gross values given by the respondents were too low, but I felt that I had no power in this appeal to put them up." Upon that no question arises before your Lordships. "I therefore accept these values as the nearest to the true gross values I could arrive at, and proceeded to determine the amount of the deductions to be made therefrom in order to arrive at the net annual values by a consideration of the evidence before me, most of which was given by the appellants." Now, when we are dealing with it as a question of law, the limits to which I have pointed being whether in arriving at this conclusion of fact anything wrong has been done either by way of inclusion or exclusion, when I read that, how is it possible to say that what the recorder here has done is wrong? What abstract proposition of law can be laid down to say that the learned recorder was wrong? I have nothing to do with the question of amount. He may or may not be wrong in the particular amount at which he has arrived, but that is not a question of law. The question of law is, whether upon any of this statement of fact you can say that he has included anything which he ought not to have included, or has excluded something which he should have included? Upon that statement of fact it is hopeless to contend that either of those propositions can be made out, and I therefore move your Lordships that this appeal be dismissed with costs.

LORD MACNAGHTEN.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion.

LORD SHAND.—My Lords: I also concur and adopt all that has been said by the Lord Chancellor in giving judgment. The heritable property in question is in this position: that no building of the same class can be referred to to ascertain the annual value of this building. It is not like a public-house, or a railway, or canal, or docks, or anything which may have analogous buildings to which you can refer. That being the state of matters, it appears to me that the return which has been actually had from the occupation and use of the building is a legitimate element and a material element in ascertaining the valuation according to the statute. That is what a tenant would reasonably give for the premises. Upon that ground, adopting the view which Smith, L.J. took of this case, and adopting what my noble and learned friend on the woolsack has said, I am of opinion that the appeal should be dismissed.

LORD DAVEY.—My Lords: I am of the same opinion. I only desire to say a very few words upon what I understood to be Mr. Asquith's argument upon this case, or, at all events, the chief argument which he put forward. If I understood Mr. Asquith rightly, his argument was this: That he did not say as an abstract proposition that profits made from the use of the hereditament ought not to be taken into account generally, but he argued that they ought not to be taken into account in this particular case, because by statute the occupier of the hereditament was precluded from putting those profits or the produce of carrying on this business on this hereditament into his own pocket for his own advantage and the enhancement of his own wealth, but was bound to apply those profits in the particular mode pointed out by the statute in reducing the debt and so forth. Now, I think that argument is answered by the case which was decided in this House in the year 1865 in Jones v. Mersey Docks (ubi sup.), because in that case, although it is quite true that the question put to the learned Judges by the House and the question decided was whether the hereditament was rateable at all, yet in answering that question ex necessitate the consideration was involved of the question upon what basis the rating should be, because the argument used was that there was no beneficial occupation, and it was held to be rateable because there was a beneficial occupation. I conceive that in principle and impliedly, as I think has been held in subsequent cases which have come before the courts, what was really decided was that, notwithstanding the restriction upon the application of the profits resulting from carrying on that business on that hereditament, the profits so derived were a legitimate element in arriving at the value of the beneficial occupation which was to be the subject of rating. And I think that it is put beyond controversy in a passage in the judgment of Blackburn, J. in advising the House on behalf of himself and the other judges. He says this: "Whichever may be the true mode of enunciating the position, it is clear that there can be no valid rate unless the occupation be such as to be of value; and if the words 'beneficial occupation' are to be understood as merely signifying that the occupation is of value (which is obviously the sense in which the phrase is used in many of the cases cited at the Bar), it is clear that a beneficial occupation is essential as the foundation of the rate; but it is equally clear that if the phrase is to be understood in this limited sense, the trustees have a beneficial occupation, for they actually occupy land as docks, and in virtue of that occupation receive payments from the shipping using the docks, at present greatly in excess of what is necessary to maintain the docks." Every word of that is applicable. "Hereafter the charges on shipping may be reduced so as to greatly diminish the revenue derived from this occupation, possibly at some future time to render it no greater than the sum requisite to maintain the docks; but whilst the dues on shipping are maintained at their present rate, it is clear that the hypothetical tenant would give for the occupancy of the docks, as at present enjoyed by the trustees, a rent greatly in excess of what would be necessary to maintain the docks in a state to command that rent." And Lord Westbury, in moving the judgment of the House, after referring to the Parochial Assessment Act, which he quotes as saying "that 'occupation' must be of property yielding, or capable of yielding, a net annual value," and so forth, continues: "It is in this sense that I understand the words 'beneficial occupation,' wherever it is said that to support a rate the occupation must be a beneficial one. For on principle it is by no means necessary that the occupation should be beneficial to the occupiers; or, in other words, it is perfectly immaterial what becomes of the amount which is the result of carrying on the business on the hereditament after paying the expenses and other outgoings, whether it is applied for the purpose of public uses, whether it is applied for the payment of debt and other charges, as in the present case, or whether it goes into the pockets of the occupiers. What you have to look at is whether the occupation is beneficial in the sense in which the term is used in that passage; and I conceive that if the principles there laid down are adopted (although I admit that the question was not then before the House upon what principle the rate should be made), they are applicable to the case which is now before us, and, as it humbly appears to me, that is a complete answer to the argument which Mr. Asquith addressed to us.

Lord ROBERTSON.—My Lords: I agree in what has been said by my noble and learned friend the Lord Chancellor, and by my noble and learned friends who have addressed the House. I also concur in the remarks which have just been made by my noble and learned friend Lord Davey.

Metropolis—Buildings—Building "used in part for purposes of trade and in part as a dwelling-house"—Public-house—Necessity of fire-resisting materials between part used as public-house and part used for residence—London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cccviii.), s. 74, sub-s. 2.

By sect. 74, sub-sect. 2, of the London Building Act 1894: "In every building exceeding ten squares in area used in part for purposes of trade or manufacture and in part as a dwelling-house, the part used for the purposes of trade or manufacture shall be separated from the part used as a dwelling-house by walls and floors constructed of fire-resisting materials."

Held, that this sub-section does not apply where certain rooms in a dwelling-house are used for the purposes of trade, or certain rooms on business premises are used for the purpose of residence; and therefore does not apply to an ordinary fully licensed public-house exceeding ten squares in area, where the trade of the public-house is carried on in the lower part of the house and the licensed occupier and his family reside in the upper part of the house—the whole house being licensed—so that the part used for residence need not be separated from the part used for business by walls constructed of fire-resisting materials.

CASE stated by the metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at Southwark Police-court.

On the 19th Oct. 1900, an appeal under sect. 150 of the London Building Act 1894, wherein Frederick Hoskins was appellant and Bernard Dicksee was respondent, was heard before the magistrate sitting at the Southwark Police-court, and upon such hearing the following facts were proved or admitted.

On the 11th July 1900 the respondent Hoskins,

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

DICKSON (app.) v. HOSKINS (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

who is a builder, served notice on the appellant, who is a district surveyor, under sect. 145 of the London Building Act 1894, of the proposed erection of a building at No. 87, Old Kent-road, together with plans showing that the proposed building was the re-erection of a licensed beerhouse on the site of an old beerhouse called the Horse Shoe.

On the 15th Aug. 1900 the appellant, as such district surveyor, served upon the respondent a notice of objection to the proposed erection of the building under sect. 150 of the London Building Act 1894, on the ground that it would be in contravention of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 74 of the Act.

This notice of objection, in specifying the particulars of work which would be in contravention of the Act, stated that:

The building will exceed ten squares in area, and will be used in part for purposes of trade and in part as a dwelling-house; but the part to be used for the purposes of trade will not be separated from the part to be used as a dwelling-house by walls and floors constructed of fire-resisting materials, and the passage, staircase, and other means of approach to the part to be used as a dwelling-house will not be constructed throughout of fire-resisting materials, and the doorways in the fire-resisting walls separating the part to be used for the purposes of trade from the passage and other means of approach to the part to be used as a dwelling-house will not be fitted with fire-resisting doors. The building, therefore, will be in contravention of sect. 74, sub-sect. 2.

Then the notice specified the particulars of work required by the Act, but which were proposed to be omitted, namely:

Floors to be constructed of fire-resisting materials between the parts to be used for purposes of trade and the part to be used as a dwelling-house, and fire-resisting doors to be fitted to the doorways in the fire-resisting walls separating the part to be used for the purposes of trade from the passage and other means of approach to the part to be used as a dwelling-house, and the passage, staircase, and other means of approach to the part to be used as a dwelling-house to be constructed throughout of fire-resisting materials as required by sect. 74, sub-sect. 2.

The building when erected will exceed ten squares in area, and will contain (1) in the basement, beer and wine cellars; (2) on the ground floor, a bar, public lobby, saloon bar, private bar, bar parlour, and a public room; (3) on the first floor, a sitting-room, three bedrooms, and a kitchen; and (4) on the top floor attics.

The old house called the Horse Shoe and the site of the new building was licensed and used, and the new building when completed will be licensed and used for the sale of wine and beer, to be consumed on or off the premises under the Beerhouse Act 1830 (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 64), and the Refreshment Houses Act 1860 (23 & 24 Vict. c. 27), and the Acts amending the same. The trade of the beerhouse will be carried on on the basement and ground floor, and the licensee and his family will reside in the upper floors of the building. The whole of the building will be covered by the justices' certificate and excise licence. The plans for the new building had been submitted to and approved by the licensing justices for the Newington Division of the county of London.

The floors separating the ground floor from the first floor and the staircase leading from the first floor will not be constructed of fire-resisting materials, and if sub-sect. 2 of sect. 74 of the London Building Act 1894 applies to this building, the provisions of that section will be contravened.

It was contended for the appellant that sub-sect. 2 of sect. 74 of the Act applied to the proposed building, as it was to be used in part for the purposes of the trade of a beerhouse and in part as a dwelling-house.

It was contended for the respondent that sub-sect. 2 of sect. 74 did not apply to a beerhouse, and the decision in Carritt v. Godson (19 Mag. Cas. 267; 80 L. T. Rep. 771; (1899) 2 Q. B. 193) was relied on.

The magistrate found as a fact that the basement and ground floor of the building were intended to be used for the purposes of the trade of a beerhouse, and that the part above the ground floor was intended to be used as a dwelling-house for the licensed occupier, but he held that the case was governed by the decision in Carritt v. Godson (ubi sup.), and he accordingly allowed the appeal and overruled the objection of the district surveyor.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the decision of the magistrate was right in law.

The London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. ccciii.) provides:

Sect. 74.—(1) Every building shall be separated by an external wall or by a party wall or other proper party structure from the adjoining building (if any) and from each of the adjoining buildings (if more than one). (2) In every building exceeding ten squares in area used in part for purposes of trade or manufacture, and in part as a dwelling-house, the part used for the purposes of trade or manufacture, shall be separated from the part used as a dwelling-house by walls and floors constructed of fire-resisting materials, and all passages, staircases, and other means of approach to the part used as a dwelling-house shall be constructed throughout of fire-resisting materials. The part used for purposes of trade or manufacture shall (if extending to more than two hundred and fifty thousand cubic feet) be subject to the provisions of this Act relating to the cubical extent of buildings of the warehouse class: Provided that there may be constructed in the walls of such staircases and passages such doorways as are necessary for communication between the different parts of the building, and there may be formed in any walls of such building openings fitted with fire-resisting doors.

Sect. 5.—In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires: (23) The expression "square" applied to the measurement of the area of a building means the space of 100 superficial feet. (25) The expression "dwelling-house" means a building used, or constructed, or adapted to be used wholly or principally for human habitation. (36) The expression "fire-resisting material" means any of the materials and things described in the second schedule to this Act.

Avory, K.C. (Rowse with him) for the appellant.—The proposed building would clearly come within sect. 74, sub-sect. 2 of the London Building Act 1894. It is over ten squares in area and is intended to be used in part for purposes of trade—namely, the trade of a beerhouse keeper, and in part as a dwelling-house. It therefore comes within the express terms of the sub-section. The test really is the size; that is, if there be a building over ten squares in area and if it be used in part for purposes of trade and in part as a dwelling-house, then it comes within the sub-section. It could not be disputed that the section was intended to apply to ordinary shops above this size, if used partly for the business of the shop and partly as a residence. It would apply to all shops with bedrooms above the business part of the shop. Carritt v. Godson (19 Mag. Cas. 267; 80 L. T. Rep. 771; (1899) 2 Q. B. 193) is distinguishable on the ground that on the facts there stated the court seem to have drawn the inference that the whole building would in the ordinary course be used for trade. In this case the finding of fact by the magistrate as set out at the end of the case, is conclusive in favour of the appellant, unless, first, the subsection does not apply to licensed premises at all, or, secondly, that it does not apply where the upper part is used as a dwelling-house by the occupier of the trade part. The object of the Legislature was clearly to guard against the danger from fire, and there would be as much danger in the present case as in most other cases which would come within the sub-section. The magistrate was, therefore, wrong in the view he took of the case.

Danckwerts, K.C. and W. F. Craies for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In deciding this case I do not at all wish to base my decision solely upon the judgment of my brothers Day and Lawrance in the case of Carritt v. Godson (ubi sup.), although I think that that decision was perfectly right. I do not base my decision solely upon that judgment for this reason that it is possible it may be suggested that there was an additional ground for the decision in that case, namely, the possibility of access to part of the premises by a yard into the lobby. In this case we have to decide a very important point, but I think, when understood as we understand it after the very clear argument for the appellant, a clear point as to what is the meaning of subsect. 2 of sect. 74 of the Building Act 1894. Now reading the provision of that sub-section I do not think it can be properly contended that that provision was meant to apply to the case of rooms in one dwelling-house used partly for trade and partly for residence. In answer to that, counsel for the appellant suggested that the limit is to be found only in the size, and that in every case in which the county council are satisfied that the building is intended to be used partly for a dwelling-house and partly for trade, and is above ten squares—that is, a thousand feet—ground area, it comes within the section. I think, speaking generally, that interpretation of the sub-section goes too far. Now, having dealt with what I may call the general question, I will say one word on what I understand the facts of this case to be. Here there was an ordinary house intended to be used as a beerhouse, and it makes no difference to my mind whether it was or was not going to be used as an hotel, as has been suggested. I do not think there is anything in that point. The upper floors of the building would, under all ordinary circumstances, be used for the licensed victualler or beerhouse keeper to reside in, and, although it is of no very great importance, I take it that, as far as it is a fact in the case, the licence would cover the whole house, and beer might be supplied in any place in that house. However, as I am going to base by judgment on rather broader grounds, I only mention those facts in order that it may be understood that I appreciate those points. Now the finding in the case is that the basement and ground floor of the building were intended to be used for the purpose of the trade of a beerhouse, and that the part above the ground floor was intended to be used as a dwelling-house by the licensed occupier. I understand that finding to mean that the licensed occupier would live there; and I think it is because the argument for the appellant overlooks the real language of the section that the difficulty has arisen. In my opinion, whatever be the use of the premises, whether they are licensed premises, or ordinary shop premises, or manufacturing premises, if the state of things is that in the one tenement or dwelling-house some people sleep in rooms which are part of that tenement or dwelling-house the necessity or the obligation to have fire-proof divisions does not arise. I come to the words of the section for a moment. It begins: "In every building . . . used in part for the purposes of trade and in part as a dwelling-house." I do not think we can or ought to shut our eyes to the common and well known state of things in the year 1894, when this Act was passed. It was perfectly well known that there were shops with bedrooms over them much larger than ten squares. It was also perfectly well known that it had become a common practice to have the ground floor and basement, and sometimes the first floor, applied as a separate tenement to trade purposes, and that above the part so applied to trade purposes there was, as a separate tenement, approached by some kind of staircase, a part of the building which was used as a dwelling-house. I am satisfied in my own mind that what the London Building Act of 1894 meant to say was this: If there is a building above the specified size of which there is one part which is used for trade and another part which is used as a dwelling-house, then these parts are to be separated in a particular way. The language, however, is not apt to meet, and we should require clear language to include, the case of the user of certain rooms of a dwelling-house for the purpose of trade, or certain rooms on business premises for the purpose of residence. The reasoning in Carritt v. Godson (ubi sup.) entirely supports this view, and is an authority in favour of the view which I take. That decision would, of course, have been binding on us, but I wish it to be distinctly understood, speaking for myself, that I have arrived at this conclusion, whether it be right or wrong, on the considerations which arise on the language and purview of the section itself, quite apart from that decision, with which decision, however, I entirely concur. I therefore think that this appeal should be dismissed.

LAWRENCE, J.—I entirely agree. I only desire to say this about Carritt v. Godson (ubi sup.), that with regard to the judgments, both of my brother Day and myself, it was directed almost entirely, as I notice, to the argument of the learned counsel for the respondents and it did not go further, or profess to go further than that. We agreed with him and took the view he put forward that the building was not used partly for the purpose of trade and partly as a licensed house within the meaning of the section, and that being so, it was not necessary to go further into the case than that. The judgment was intended to meet the case that was before us. I entirely agree with the extension of the principle, if I may so call it, which has been stated.

Avory, K.C., for the appellant, asked for leave to appeal.

Danckwerts, K.C., for the respondent, referred to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Reg. v. Shiel (19 Mag. Cas. 581; 82 L. T. Rep. 587), where the court, affirming the decision of the Divisional Court, had refused to grant a mandamus to a metropolitan police magistrate to state a case upon this point, on the ground that the case then in question came within the decision in Carritt v. Godson (ubi sup.), and that the magistrate was right in so holding and in refusing to state a case; and he contended that leave to appeal ought not to be given in this case, more especially as the decision in Carritt v. Godson (ubi sup.) was approved by the Divisional Court in Reg. v. Shiel (ubi sup.). The court ultimately granted leave to appeal.

Appeal dismissed. Leave to appeal.

SMITH (app.) v. BOON (resp.). (a)

Light locomotive—Excessive speed—“Having regard to the traffic on the highway”—Light Locomotives on Highways Order 1896, art. 4 (1).

By the Light Locomotives on Highways Order 1896, art. 4 (1), no person shall drive a light locomotive at any speed that is greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic on the highway.

The appellant drove his motor tricycle at a speed from eighteen to twenty miles an hour along a highway, but there was no direct evidence that any traffic was interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected.

The justices found that the speed was excessive, having regard to the traffic on the highway.

Held, that the justices were right in convicting, as the words “having regard to the traffic on the highway” meant having regard to the traffic on the road, and not to the traffic in the immediate vicinity of the motor.

CASE stated on an information preferred by the respondent against the appellant charging him with driving a light locomotive at a speed greater than was reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic on a certain highway.

Evidence was given by a police-constable that at the time and on the day in question the appellant drove his motor tricycle at considerably over twelve miles an hour, quite eighteen miles an hour, on the highway. The police-constable admitted that he “guessed” the rate of speed and stated that he saw a Carter Paterson’s van and a butcher’s cart on the highway. He admitted that no particular vehicle on the highway was interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected by reason of the speed. Another witness said that he could not count twenty during the time it took the appellant to drive 300 yards. He thought the appellant was driving twenty miles an hour. He also admitted that the traffic on the highway was neither interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, nor affected by reason of the speed at which the appellant drove his motor tricycle.

The appellant denied that he was driving at the before-mentioned speed and stated that he was driving at a speed of eight miles an hour.

There was no evidence before the justices that any vehicle or person using the highway was interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected, by reason of the speed at which the motor tricycle was driven, and it was contended by the appellant that in the absence of such evidence the offence charged was not made out.

The justices found as a fact that the appellant was driving his motor tricycle at a speed of from eighteen to twenty miles an hour, and decided that such speed was excessive having regard to the traffic on the highway, and that the appellant’s contention that direct evidence of traffic being interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected was necessary to support a conviction was ill-founded in law.

They therefore convicted the appellant.

Roger Wallace, K.C. (S. Fleming with him) for the appellant.—These proceedings were taken under art. 4 (1) of the Local Government Board Regulations relating to Light Locomotives, which prohibits the driving a light locomotive when used on any highway at any speed greater than is reasonable and proper, having regard to the traffic on the highway. There should have been direct evidence that the traffic was being interrupted or incommoded, in order to enable the justices to convict under this article, though, of course, they would have been able to summon the appellant under the other provisions of the order. In Stinson v. Browning (13 L. T. Rep. 799; L. Rep. C. P. 321) it was held that making a fire within 50ft. of the centre of a public carriage way is not an offence within sect. 72 of the General Highway Act (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 50), unless it is done to the injury of the highway, or to the injury, interruption, or personal danger of persons travelling thereon. Willes, J. says: “The nuisance is not such per se, but is a nuisance only if done to the injury of the highway, or to the injury, interruption, or personal danger of persons travelling thereon.” Again, in Hill v. Somerset (51 J. P. 742), under the same statute it was held that it was essential to the offence that passengers should be endangered or interrupted. The magistrates here were wrong in convicting, and the conviction should be quashed.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In my opinion, the magistrates were perfectly right. They find as a fact that the appellant was driving his motor at a pace of eighteen to twenty miles an hour, and there is no appeal from that finding. They also find that such speed was excessive, having regard to the traffic on the highway. Now the appellant contends that, in order to support a conviction, it was necessary that there should be some direct evidence that the traffic was being interrupted, interfered with, incommoded, or affected. It is said that there must be direct evidence that some vehicle was nearly run into or incommoded, or that some old woman must have had to step back on the footpath when crossing the road. In fact, it is said that there must be something amounting to a risk of accident, if not actual accident, before there can be a conviction. I think that the words "having regard to the traffic on the highway" mean having regard to the traffic on the road, and not having regard to the traffic in the immediate vicinity of the light locomotive.

Electric lighting — Local authority — Boxes in street — Notice to district surveyor — London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cccviii.), s. 145.

Where a local authority within the meaning of the Electric Lighting Acts 1882 and 1888, in pursuance of those Acts, has been granted a provisional order confirmed by a statute, and under the provisions of that order has constructed in a street boxes for the purposes in connection with the supply of electric energy, such boxes are buildings, structures, or works, within sect. 145 of the London Building Act 1894, and a notice under that section must be served on the district surveyor before they are commenced.

CASE stated on a complaint preferred under the London Building Act 1894 by the respondent, a district surveyor, under the Act against the appellants, for beginning to execute a work respecting which they ought to have served a building notice, before serving such notice, contrary to the provisions of that Act.

Upon hearing of complaint the following facts were proved or admitted:

The respondent is a district surveyor under the London Building Act 1894 for a district comprising the place in which the boxes hereinafter mentioned are situate.

The appellants are the local authority within the meaning of the Electric Lighting Acts 1882 and 1888 for that district, and they are also the surveyors of highways in and for that district.

In the year 1892 the appellants were granted by the Board of Trade, pursuant to the Electric Lighting Acts 1882 and 1888, in respect of their district, a provisional order called the Whitechapel District Electric Lighting Order 1892.

That Order was confirmed by the Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 6) Act 1892, which was passed on the 27th June 1892, upon which date the order came into force.

Sects. 11 and 12 of the Order are as follows:

11. Subject to the provisions of this Order and the principal Act, and any regulations made under this Order, the undertakers may construct in any street such boxes as may be necessary for the purposes in connection with the supply of energy, including apparatus for the proper ventilation of such boxes. Every such box shall be for the exclusive use of the undertakers and under their sole control, except so far as the Board of Trade may otherwise order, and shall be used by the undertakers only for the purpose of leading off service lines and other distributions, conductors, or for examining, testing, regulating, measuring, directing, or controlling the supply of energy, or for examining or testing the condition of the mains or other portions of the works, or for other like purposes connected with the undertaking, and the undertakers may place therein meters, switches, and any other suitable and proper apparatus for any of the above purposes. Every such box, including the upper surface of covering thereof shall be constructed of such materials, and shall be constructed and maintained by the undertakers in such manner as not to be a source of danger whether by reason of inequality of surface or otherwise.

12. Where the exercise of any of the powers of the undertakers in relation to the execution of any works (including the construction of boxes) will involve the placing of any works in, under, along, or across any street or public bridge, the following provisions shall have effect: (a) One month before commencing the execution of such works (not being the repairs, renewals, or amendments of existing works of which the character and position are not altered) the undertakers shall serve a notice upon the Postmaster-General describing the proposed works, together with a plan of the works showing the mode and position in which such works are intended to be executed, and the manner in which it is intended that such street or bridge is to be interfered with, and shall, upon being required to do so by the Postmaster-General, give him any such further information in relation thereto as he may desire. (b) The Postmaster-General may in his discretion approve of any such works or plan subjects to such amendments or conditions as may seem fit, or may disapprove the same, and may give notice of such approval or disapproval to the undertakers. (c) Where the Postmaster-General approves any such work, works, or plan subject to any amendments or conditions with which the undertakers are dissatisfied, or disapprove of any such works or plan, the undertakers may appeal to the Board of Trade, and the Board of Trade may inquire into the matter and allow or disallow such appeal, and approve any such works or plan subject to such amendments or conditions as may seem fit, or may disapprove the same. (d) If the Postmaster-General fail to give any such notice of approval or disapproval to the undertakers within one month after the service of the notice upon him, he shall be deemed to have approved such works and plans. (e) Notwithstanding anything in this order or the principal Act, the undertakers shall not be entitled to execute any such works as above specified, except so far as the same may be of a description and in accordance with a plan which has been approved, or is to be deemed to have been approved, by the Postmaster-General or by the Board of Trade as above-mentioned, but where any such works, description, and plan are so approved, or to be deemed to be approved, the undertakers may cause such works to be executed in accordance with such description and plan, subject in all respects to the provisions of this order and of the principal Act. (f) If the undertakers make default in complying with any of the requirements or restrictions of this section, they shall (in addition to any other compensation which they may be liable to make under the provisions of this order or the principal Act) make full compensation to the Postmaster-General for any loss or damage which he may incur by reason thereof, and, in addition thereto, they shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding ten pounds for every such default, and to a daily penalty not exceeding five pounds: Provided that the undertaking shall not be subject to any penalties as aforesaid if the court having cognisance of the case shall be of opinion that the case was one of emergency, and that the undertakers complied with the requirements of this section as far as was reasonable under the circumstances.

The undertakers shall serve a like notice and plan upon the county council in addition to those served upon the Postmaster-General, and where any street or public bridge is repairable by the county council the other provisions of this section shall with the necessary modification apply to the county council in like manner as to the Postmaster-General. Nothing in this section shall exempt the undertakers from any penalty or obligation to which they may be liable under this order or otherwise by law in the event of any telegraph lines of the Postmaster-General being at any time injuriously affected by the undertaker's works or supply of energy.

On or about the 6th Nov. 1899 the appellants began to construct in Great Prescott-street, under the public footway at or near the junction of the street with Leman-street, three boxes, which were necessary for the purposes in connection with the supply of electrical energy.

The boxes were constructed of iron and brick-work.

It was assumed at the hearing before the magistrate that in connection with the construction of the boxes the appellants fulfilled all the requirements of the provisional order, but it was understood that the respondent reserved his right to contend the contrary in any future proceedings.

The street, Great Prescott-street, is not a street repairable by London County Council, but is repairable by the appellants as the authority.

The appellants did not, before commencing the construction of the boxes, serve on the district surveyor a building notice respecting the same under the London Building Act 1894, s. 145.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the boxes, being a building, structure, or work within the meaning of sect. 145 of the London Building Act 1894, the appellants were bound, before beginning the same, to serve upon the respondent as such district surveyor a building notice as prescribed by the section.

On the part of the appellants it was contended that the London Building Act 1894 did not apply at all to boxes constructed in streets under the provisional order, inasmuch as the order contains a complete code regulating the materials, situation, and mode of construction of such boxes, and provides complete machinery for enforcing such regulations, with which special code and machinery the London Building Act 1894 (being an Act generally applicable in the administrative county of London passed after the provisional order came into force) is inconsistent.

The magistrate found as a fact, so far as it is a question of fact, and in law, that the boxes so constructed as above were building structures or works within the meaning of sect. 145 of the London Building Act 1894, and, having regard to the provisions of sects. 72, 201, and 203 of the Act, he held that the provisions of sect. 145 were not inconsistent with the said special Act, and he accordingly convicted the appellants.

The judgment of the learned magistrate setting forth the grounds of his decision was as follows, and was to be taken as part of the case:

This is a summons taken out by the district surveyor against the Whitechapel Board of Works for not having given him notice before they began certain works—viz., the construction of boxes or chambers under the street for the purpose of electric lighting. Mr. Dickens, for the defendants, contended that it was not necessary for them to give such notice, first, because the London Building Act 1894 does not apply, the boxes being constructed under the provisions of the Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation Act 1892 a special Act which he said is not consistent with the general Act, and therefore overrides it; and, secondly, because, even if the general Act does govern, these boxes are not "buildings, structures, or works" within its meaning. By sect. 72 of the London Building Act 1894 it is enacted that any construction under any public way shall be constructed in any such manner as may be approved by the district surveyor, and by sect. 145, where any "building or structure or work" is about to be begun, a building notice respecting it must be served on the district surveyor. In the Electric Lighting Order Confirmation Act 1892 the clauses relied on by Mr. Dickens were the 11th and 12th. Clause 11 gives power to the undertakers—i.e., the Whitechapel Board of Works, to "construct" (an expression which has a bearing on the second part of Mr. Dickens' argument) boxes in the streets. The 3rd paragraph of that clause enacts that every such box shall be constructed in such manner as not to be a source of danger by reason of inequality of surface (i.e., to the public using the streets) or otherwise. Who is to be the judge whether there is any such danger? Probably not the undertakers themselves but the duly appointed officer under the Building Act whose duties are imposed by sect. 72 of that Act. The clause 12 requires a notice of the works with plan to be served on the Postmaster-General and also upon the county council; on the Postmaster-General on account of the exigencies of the Post Office, and on the county council because if the street is repairable by them the other provisions of the section shall, with the necessary modification, apply to them in like manner as to the Postmaster-General. It appears to me that this 12th clause only deals with the notices to be given to the Postmaster-General and the county council for the purposes I have mentioned, and has nothing to do with the notice required to be given to the district surveyor where any structure is to be made under any public way that he may look after and guard the safety of the public using the way. Mr. Dickens asked: "Why give notice to the district surveyor who says he has nothing to do with the streets?" The answer to that question is the 72nd section itself. The principle which has to guide me in coming to a decision on this point is—Is there anything in the special Act of 1892 so inconsistent with the general Act of 1894 that they cannot stand together? If such inconsistency does exist, the provisions of the special Act must override those of the general Act, and it was held in the cases cited by Mr. Dickens—City and South London Railway Company v. London County Council (65 L. T. Rep. 632; (1891) 2 Q. B. 513) and London County Council v. School Board of London (1892) 2 Q. B. 606)—that such inconsistency did exist. But if the provisions of the two Acts are reconcilable, the cases of Uckfield Rural Council v. Crowborough District Water Company (19 Mag. Cas. 386; 81 L. T. Rep. 539; (1899) 2 Q. B. 664), and more recently the London County Council v. Wandsworth and Putney Gas Company (19 Mag. Cas. 568; 82 L. T. Rep. 562) show that the provisions of the general Act must prevail. I am unable to see any inconsistency here. The undertakers who are by statute given powers for interfering with the streets have to give notices (for certain purposes) to the Postmaster-General and to the county council, but that liability is quite consistent with an obligation to give notice to the district surveyor (as they would have had to do had they been doing any similar work not under statutory powers) in order that he might see that the work was properly done for the public safety. Further, upon the question of whether the Building Act applies, it is important to look at sect. 201, the exemption clause, which does not include electric lighting, though it specially mentions railway, dock, and gas companies, but there is a section (203) which does specially mention electric supply companies and exempts certain buildings (these boxes or chambers not being amongst the number) from the general provisions of certain parts of the Act, the inference to be drawn therefrom being that the other building of such companies were to be subject to the provisions of the Act. Upon the second point—whether these boxes or chambers (which are admittedly of varying sizes) are buildings or structures or works within the meaning of the 145th section—I am of opinion that they are. They are the artificial work of man, excavated and then specially constructed with bricks and mortar, and used for a definite purpose. I can see no reason why the terms should not apply to buildings below as well as on the surface of the ground which, indeed was the view expressed by the judges in Thompson v. Sunderland Gas Company (37 L. T. Rep. 30; 2 Ex. Div. 429). I find that in the case of the Mayor, &c., of Tunbridge Wells v. Baird (74 L. T. Rep. 385; (1896) A. C. 434) Lord Halsbury, Lord Herschell, and Lord Macnaghten speak of a convenience which the corporation had made in one of the streets, sunk to a depth of 9ft. and lighted by skylights on level with the surface of the street as a building the erection of which is complained of, construction of this underground chamber, &c. As a matter of fact and of law, then I find that these boxes or chambers come within the 145th section. I therefore impose the nominal penalty of one shilling with ten guineas costs.

Dickens, K.O. (G. J. Talbot with him) for the appellants.—We contend that by virtue of the Electric Lighting Acts and provisional orders the Whitechapel Board of Works are made the electric authority for the district, and the special provisions of those Acts and orders are not controlled by the London Building Act 1894. It is contended by the other side that these two sets of provisions—namely, the Electric Acts and orders and the London building regulations can work together. But that is a fallacy, for when you look at the Electric Acts and orders, not only do they deal with electric works, but also with the safety of the public. The reason why they are not to work together is that if they did so you would get two authorities dealing with the same matters and all the attendant difficulties arising therefrom. The way in which two statutes of this kind—namely, special and general enactments, are to be dealt with is clearly laid down by Lord Selborne in Seaward v. Vera Cruz (52 L. T. Rep. 474; 10 App. Cas. 68). They referred to:

Electric Lighting Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 56), ss. 3, 4, 6 (c), (e), (g), 12, 13, 34;

Electric Lighting Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 12), s. 4; Whitechapel District Electric Lighting Order 1892, clauses 10, 11, 12, 13, 63;

Electric Lighting Orders Confirmation (No. 6) Act 1892 (55 & 56 Vict. c. cccx.).

These enactments constitute an absolute code dealing with the subject, which has been designed to meet two points—viz., the safety of the public, and the care of the wires of the Postmaster-General. If the county council are the road authorities, notice must be given to them and they may require certain things to be done, and if any difference arises the matter is to be referred to the Board of Trade. Directly the Board of Trade gives its consent the work may be proceeded with. [GRANTHAM, J.—But in all these provisions and sections nothing is said as to who is to see that the details are being properly carried out.] That is provided for by clause 12 of the order. [KENNEDY, J.—Then the Whitechapel Board are to be the judges of their own misdoing if such occurs.] Notice has to be given to the county council, but not to the district surveyor, who is quite a different entity. It was never contemplated that this should be a building within sect. 203 of the London Building Act 1894, for that Act was never intended to apply at all. [KENNEDY, J.—But sect. 160 shows that the district surveyor is to be in constant communication with the county council.] The other side say that two notices ought to be given, but, if that is so, the notice to the county council is quite illusory. The notice to the county council must be for some purpose, and there can be no necessity to give a notice to the district surveyor.

Avory, K.C. (Rowse with him) for the respondent.—The question here is whether there is such an inconsistency between the special Act and the general Act that they cannot stand together. If no such inconsistency exists, then the Whitechapel Board is subject to the general Act. A question might arise if the district surveyor required them to do something inconsistent with the requirements of the Board of Trade, but that has not arisen here. This is a proper matter to come under the jurisdiction of the district surveyor, and, that being so, is there anything in the special Act to prevent that happening? If the district surveyor is to supervise the carrying out what the Board of Trade has approved, there can be no inconsistency in that. Where the Board of Trade has laid down rules as to materials, surely the district surveyor can see that proper materials are used? Sect. 201 of the London Building Act 1894 shows certain buildings to be exempt from parts 6 and 7 of the Act dealing with construction, but they are not exempt from part 13 dealing with the superintending architect and district surveyor. In the case of special exemptions they are all specifically dealt with by the Act of 1894; for instance, gas companies have to give the notice, but are not subject to certain regulations, while in the case of Government buildings no notice is required as provided by sect. 202. By sect. 203, buildings for the supply of electricity are dealt with, and they are exempted from parts 5, 6, and 7, but not from part 13. The sole reason for giving notices and plans to the Board of Trade and the Postmaster-General is to enable them to supervise any question as to electricity. [KENNEDY, J.—Can it be confined to that when clause 11 of the order of 1892 is considered?] He referred to

Uckfield Rural Council v. Crowborough Water Company, 81 L. T. Rep. 539; (1899) 2 Q. B. 664; London County Council v. Wandsworth and Putney Gas Company, 82 L. T. Rep. 562.

There is nothing in the special Acts and orders inconsistent with the requirements of sect. 145 of the Act of 1894.

Talbot, in reply.—He referred to Venner v. McDonnell, 76 L. T. Rep. 152; (1897) 1 Q. B. 421.

GRANTHAM, J.—In my judgment, the appellants have failed to show that the decision of the learned magistrate is wrong, and our judgment must, therefore, be for the respondent. There is no difference of opinion between the parties as to the principle of law that has to be applied in determining whether or not an Act of Parliament can, or does, override some of the sections or provisions contained in a previous Act of Parliament. The judgment of Lord Selborne in the case of Seward v. Vera Cruz (52 L. T. Rep. 474; 10 App. Cas., at p. 68) has always been accepted as the ruling authority on that question, and in that case Lord Selborne said: "Now, if anything be certain it is this—that where there are general words in a later Act capable of reasonable and sensible application without extending them to subjects specially dealt with by earlier legislation you are not to hold that earlier and special legislation indirectly repealed, altered, or derogated from merely by the force of such general words without any indication of a particular intention to do so." The difficulty arises, however, in applying it. Does the London Building Act of 1894 revoke or alter, by construction of general words, the Electric Lighting Acts of 1882 and 1888? Is the language of the former Act, where it directs that notice is to be given to the district surveyor before commencing work, inconsistent with the powers given to the appellants by the Electric Powers Act 1882 and 1888, and the provisional order 1892 for the supply of electricity to their district? In my judgment, it is not. It is true that the appellants have power given them to provide electricity for their district, and that by statute they are obliged to lay the schemes they propose to adopt and the plans by which they propose to give effect to it before the Postmaster-General and the county council, but neither one body nor the other is bound to see how the work is done. The necessity of obtaining the sanction of the Postmaster-General is evidently for the purpose of enabling him to see that the interests of the Post Office are not prejudiced, and not in any way to provide for supervision of the work to be done. Again, when the authority that is to provide electricity for any district proposes to break up a road it is clearly necessary that the authorities responsible for the repairs of the road should be made acquainted with the proposals of the lighting authority, that they may consider whether the scheme, if properly carried out, would be inconvenient or injurious to the public; and in the same way the notice to the London County Council, as the superior municipal authority of the district, is desirable, if not necessary, that the council may be cognisant of what is going to be done in one of the districts included in its municipal area on such an important matter as the provision of electricity. Not one of these notices, however, has reference to any control of the way in which the work is to be or is being performed, or as to the compulsory supervision of the work during its construction, but the section of the Building Act in question—viz., sect. 145—requires such a notice to be given to the district surveyor as will enable him to know when the work is to be commenced and the details of the proposed work, so that he can survey the work when commenced, and see that the details are carried out in conformity with any bye-laws that may have been passed in reference to such buildings. How can it be said that it is inconsistent with or contradictory to the general provisions of the Electric Lighting Acts under which the appellants obtained their authority to provide the electricity for their district? Which of the sections of the Electric Lighting Acts or of the provisional order is thereby repealed, altered, or derogated from? The supervision proposed may be unnecessary, may be a work of supererogation, but it does not necessarily at all conflict with the powers given by the earlier Acts. But, again, can it be said that the mind of the Legislature in passing the Building Act 1894 was not drawn to the special Acts in question, and that those who drew the Act were not fully alive to the existence and provisions of the Electric Lighting Acts, when we see that by sects. 201, 202, and 203 they expressly exempt a great number of buildings, and by sect. 203 especially exempt local authorities, or companies in the position of the appellants, having statutory powers for the supplying of electricity, from certain parts of the Act of 1894 which would otherwise apply to them. The insertion of those exceptions seems, therefore, to show that the Legislature advisedly intended that the work done under these Electric Lighting Acts, and the provisional orders obtained under those Acts, should be under the supervision of the same authority that was entrusted with the supervision of all building works in the district, and, knowing something of the way in which public authorities sometimes do their work, I do not think the general rule as to compulsory supervision at all unnecessary. For these reasons my judgment must be for the respondent.

KENNEDY, J.—I have come to the same conclusion, and I concur in that view which I was inclined to take after we first heard the case and which has been expressed by my brother Grantham, and, agreeing as I do generally in that view, I only desire to add very few words. I wish to call attention myself especially to the effect of sect. 203 read with the earlier sect. 138, which is in part 13 of the Act. Sect. 138 shows, to my mind, the clear intention of the Legislature as to the universal application which the Act is intended to have, except where exemption is made by the terms of the Act itself. It provides that, "Subject to the provisions of this Act, and to the exemptions in this Act mentioned, every building or structure, and every work done to or in or upon any building or structure shall be subject to the supervision of the district surveyor appointed to the district in which the building or structure is situate." That is a section, as I have said, in part 13, which is headed "Superintendent, Architect, and District Surveyor." There being, then, that general clause, we have sect. 203. Now, the effects of sect. 203 is this: It follows certain sections which begin with 201, and which are headed "Application of Act." Sect. 201 expressly exempts from the operation of parts 6 and 7 a long list of buildings. Sect. 202 exempts altogether certain Government and public buildings. Sect. 204 and 205 especially exempt other special property. Then we have 203 which refers to buildings for the supply of electricity and runs thus, so far as it is material: "When a local authority or a company has statutory powers for the supply of electricity in any metropolitan district, the building of such local authority or company used as a generating station or for works shall be deemed to be a special building to which the general provisions of parts 5, 6, and 7 and the 1st and 2nd schedules to this Act do not apply, and plans thereof shall be submitted to the council for approval, and the council shall have power to authorise"—and then there are certain special exemptions as to height—"and in other respects to exempt such building from any of the provisions of this Act if they think fit." It seems to me that the appellants are in somewhat of a dilemma having regard to that section and the section to which I have already referred showing the intention of those who passed the Act that it should be of universal application except where there is special exemption. If the words used in this section, "building used for works," are to be read as including these boxes, then this section expressly deals with them and treats them as special buildings so far as regards parts 5, 6, and 7, and therefore by implication does not exempt them so far as regards sect. 145, which is a section not in parts 5, 6, or 7, but in part 13. If, on the other hand, as the appellants contend, the expression "building used for works" does not include these boxes, then the section which expressly deals with the local authority having statutory powers for the supply of electricity and exempts from the operation of certain parts of the Act some of these buildings appears to me, by implication and reasoning, to leave these boxes to be subject to all the provisions of the Act. I only desire to add that to the judgment which has already been delivered, in the result of which I concur.

GRANTHAM, J.—My brother Darling desires me to say that although at the time it was first argued he was inclined to differ from my brother Kennedy and does not quite see his way to agree with us, yet, at the same time, he does not wish to differ.

LAW (app.) v. GRAHAM AND BRADLEY (resps.). (a) Factory—Bottling beer—Washing bottles—Adaptation for sale—Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 16), s. 93.

Certain premises were used solely for the purpose of washing bottles and bottling beer. Before the bottles were filled, which was done by manual labour, they were washed inside by a rotary brush driven by a small gas engine, the bottles being held in position by hand and the outsides being washed by manual labour. Nothing was done to the beer itself, and no process of any kind, manufacturing or otherwise, was done on the premises.

Held, that the premises were not a factory within sect. 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878.

CASE stated upon an information preferred by the appellant against the respondents for that they being the occupiers of certain bottling works, the same being a factory within the Factory Acts, did fail to have affixed at the entrance the prescribed extract of the Acts.

On the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:

The respondents were the occupiers of the premises referred to in the information, which they used solely for the purpose of washing bottles and bottling beer in their trade of wholesale and retail beer dealers.

Before the bottles were filled with beer, which was done by manual labour alone, they were washed by manual labour with the aid of mechanical power. The bottles were washed inside by a rotary brush driven by a small gas engine, and were held in position by hand. The washing of the outside of the bottles was effected by manual labour only.

Nothing was done to the beer itself to in any way alter its nature or character for the purpose of adapting it for sale.

No process of any kind, manufacturing or otherwise, was carried on on the premises, beyond that of washing bottles and bottling beer as already described.

The respondents had not the prescribed abstract of the Factory Acts fixed at the entrance of their premises in the prescribed form.

If the premises came within the definition of a factory under the Factory Act 1878, s. 93, sub-s. 3 (c), then the respondent had infringed the provisions of sect. 78 of the Act.

It was contended for the respondents that that their premises were not a factory within the meaning of the Act for the following reasons:—(1) That nothing was done to the beer itself "to adapt it for sale." (2) That washing the bottles and bottling the beer were not "adapting the beer for sale." (3) That no manufacturing process was carried on on the premises.

The appellant contended that washing the bottles and filling them with beer in the manner before described was "adapting the beer for sale," and was also a "manufacturing process," within the meaning of the Act, in aid of which mechanical power was used.

The justices were of opinion that, according to the tone, intent, and meaning of sub-sect. (3), something must be done to the article itself for the purpose of adapting it for sale and that even assuming filling the bottles with beer was adapting the beer for sale, the premises were not a factory inasmuch as the bottling was effected by manual labour alone, without the aid of mechanical power. They were also of opinion that no manufacturing process was carried on on the premises, as in the absence of any definition in the Act of the phrase "manufacturing process" the words must be construed in their ordinary sense: (Spencer v. Livett, 82 L. T. Rep. 75; (1900) 1 Q. B. 498).

They therefore held that the respondent's contention on each point was right, and gave their determination against the appellant as before stated.

The definition of a factory is contained in sect. 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, which says that the expression "factory" means "textile factory" and "non-textile factory" or either of such descriptions of factories. "Non-textile" factory means:

(1) Any works, warehouses, furnaces, mills, foundries, or places named in part 1 of the 4th schedule to this Act. (2) Also any premises or places named in part 2 of the said schedule wherein or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which steam, water, or other mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there. (3) Also any premises wherein or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which any manual labour is exercised by way of trade or for the purposes of gain in or incidental to the following purposes, or any of them; that is to say—(a) in or incidental to the making of any article, or part of any article; or (b) in or incidental to the altering, repairing, ornamenting, or finishing of any article; or (c) in or incidental to the adapting for sale of any article and wherein or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which steam, water, or other mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there.

H. Sutton for the appellant.—These premises were within the definition of a “non-textile factory,” for manual labour was exercised for making an article—viz., bottled beer—and if it was not making an article it was adapting beer for sale. Mechanical power was used in aid of the process. In Petrie v. Weir (Ot. Sess. Cas. 5th Series, vol. 2, 1041) the premises consisted of a yard in which stones were dressed by manual labour, and included an engine-house where the workmen's tools were sharpened on a grindstone driven by a gas-engine. No other mechanical power was used in the premises, but they were held to be premises in which mechanical power was “used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on therein” within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, s. 93 (3). That case, I submit, is conclusive.

Travers Humphreys for the respondents.

Lord ALVERSTONE, O.J.—This is one of the Acts in which we have to construe language which is very near the line, and if one could find any guide from any general object of the Act, as to giving the words a very wide interpretation, then I think it would be quite possible in many cases to bring processes within these words as factories which at first sight they were not perhaps intended to apply to. We have not any real guide here, but have to take the section as it stands. I think two conditions must concur, either (a), (b), or (c), and the last words of the section. I think it is plain that bottling beer was not incidental to the making of an article, and it is not “the altering, repairing, ornamenting, or finishing of any article.” I doubt if it can be said to be incidentally adapting it for sale, but I think it is possible that if that were the only thing in the section, to take the view that where casks of beer were brought in wholesale and bottles provided, the putting the beer into bottles might be an adaptation of the article for sale by a strained meaning of the words. Then, assuming that that is satisfied, you have to construe the additional words: “And wherein or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which steam, water, or other mechanical power is used in aid of the manufacturing process carried on there.” I think that, having regard to what we have seen before in the other part of the schedule and the section as to the manufacturing process, that the washing of the bottles by mechanical means fails to be fairly called a process which is used in aid of the bottling of the beer. It is true that the bottles ought to be clean, and that they wash the bottles because they are going to put beer into them, but it is not “in aid of” in the sense used in this section. Therefore, though I admit the point is near the line, I think the magistrates are right. Now, with regard to the Scotch case I do not wish to be thought to dissent from it, because I can see in one sense that the actual condition of the tools might have a good deal to do with the dressing of the stone for sale, and whether I should have decided the Scotch case in the same way or not I need not now consider. I do not in what I have said intend to overrule the Scotch case because I think that some distinction may be drawn between that and the one now before us. I think our judgment must be in favour of the decision of the magistrates.

REX v. OVERSEERS OF CONNAH'S QUAY; Ex parte CONNAH'S QUAY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)

Burial expenses—Transfer of powers from burial board to district council—Poor rate—District rate—Payment—Local Government Act 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), ss. 62, 67.

In 1882 a burial board, having been formed for three townships, borrowed money which was charged upon the poor rates.

In 1897 the C. Q. Urban District Council by resolution took over the powers, duties, and liabilities of the board.

Held, that the expenses of carrying into execution of the Burial Acts was still payable out of the poor rates.

CAUSE shown against a rule nisi for a writ of mandamus to the overseers of Connah's Quay to pay to the Urban District Council of Connah's Quay certain expenses under the Burial Acts.

The council was formed of three townships by order of the Local Government Board, dated the 22nd Sept. 1896.

In the year 1882 a burial board was formed for the three townships, and on the 20th Nov. 1882 the burial board, with the sanction of the vestry and of the Commissioners of the Treasury, borrowed certain sums by means of terminal annuity deeds, which constituted the repayment of the sums a charge upon the poor rates of the parish, which consisted of the three townships. The expenses of the board were from 1882 to 1897 paid out of the poor rate upon the certificate of the board.

On the 3rd March 1897 the urban district council by resolution took over all the powers, duties, and liabilities of the burial board.

In the years 1897, 1898, and 1899 a certificate was issued to the overseers of the poor to meet the accounts payable under the deeds and the expenses of carrying into execution the Burial Acts, and the certificates were duly honoured.

Upon the 4th July 1900 a certificate was issued to the overseers, directing them to pay a sum of 150*l.* to defray the expenses of carrying into execution the Burial Acts. They refused to honour this certificate or to pay the sum of 150*l.*,

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case the Connah's Quay Urban District Authority has become the burial board by virtue of the operation of the powers of the Act of 1894, and they have as a burial board made a demand upon the poor law authorities to pay the money which would have been payable under the Burial Acts. As I gathered from Mr. Marshall's very clear statement, the facts are that there was a burial board from 1882 to 1897. In March 1897 there was a resolution to transfer the burial board to the present applicants under the powers of sect. 62, sub-sect. 1. It is not denied that the Burial Acts are adoptive Acts, and that they are now to be exercised by this district authority. Sect. 67 of the Local Government Act 1894 provides "Where any powers and duties are transferred by this Act from one authority to another authority (1) All property held by the first authority for the purpose or by virtue of such powers and duties shall pass to and vest in the other authority, subject to all debts and liabilities affecting the same; and (2) the latter authority shall hold the same for the estate, interest, and purposes, and subject to the covenants, conditions, and restrictions for and subject to which the property would have been held if this Act had not passed, so far as the same are not modified by or in pursuance of this Act; and (3) all debts and liabilities of the first authority incurred by virtue of such powers and duties shall become debts and liabilities of the latter authority, and be defrayed out of the like property and funds out of which they would have been defrayed if this Act had not passed." As I understand these two sections, taken together, and some other provisions of the Act which I need not specify, but which Mr. Marshall referred to, it means this, that after the passing over of the powers under the resolution which transfers the adoptive Acts, or under the machinery which transfers the adoptive Acts, the new authority is to exercise the old powers, and I think that if it was intended to charge the different class of tax or ratepayers or different properties, special words would be required. They are really adoptive Acts—that is to say, Acts that may be adopted by the local authority. I think the matter is very clear; but Mr. Marshall raises the point because a resolution was required to pass over the powers of the burial board to the urban district council, and that, therefore, it is not a transfer by the Act from one authority to another. I think that if it had been intended to exclude from the protective clauses of sect. 67 transfers which took place under sect. 62, we should have found a specific enumeration. I think sect. 67 intended when by virtue of the operation of the Act of 1894 powers and duties are transferred, that these protective clauses should apply. I agree that we have not to consider the rights of the persons who lend the money in this case. It appears that there was money borrowed by the burial board under the earlier Acts, but I think that it is only fair to point out that the ordinary scheme of legislation would be that where duties are transferred, and under the powers of an act, the rights, powers, and obligations should continue to have the same incidence and effect in the hands of the new authority. I think this rule for a mandamus must be made absolute.

LAWRENCE, J.—I entirely agree.

CORBETT (app.) v. BADGER (resp.). (a)

Metropolis—District surveyor's fees—Default of builder—Liability of owner—Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), s. 11—London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cccxiii.), ss. 154, 157.

By sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848, in all cases where no time is specially limited complaint shall be made within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint arose.

By sect. 154 of the London Building Act 1894 it is provided that certain fees shall be paid by the builder or in his default by the owner or occupier; and sect. 157 enacts that (1) at the expiration . . . (a) of fourteen days after the roof of any building surveyed by a district surveyor under this Act has been covered in . . . the district surveyor shall be entitled to receive the fees due to him from the builder employed in erecting such building . . . or from the owner or occupier of the building so erected. . . . (2) If any such builder, owner, or occupier refuses to pay the said fees they may be recovered in a summary manner on its being shown to the satisfaction of the court that a proper bill specifying the amount of the fees was delivered to him or sent to him in a registered letter addressed to his last known residence.

Bills in conformity with the section having been delivered to the builder he became insolvent. Thereupon the district surveyor delivered bills to the owner.

Held, that the six months' limit contained in sect. 11 of the Act of 1848 only commenced to run against the owner from the date when the bills were delivered to him, as it was only on that date when the matter of complaint arose.

CASE stated upon eight summonses issued on complaints by the respondent, and all dated the 8th Nov. 1900, to recover fees amounting in the aggregate to 546l. 7s. 6d. alleged to be due to him as district surveyor under the London Building Act 1894.

CORBETT (app.) v. BADGER (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

On the hearing of the summonses the following facts were either proved or admitted:—

The appellant in the year 1899 was the owner of certain lands known as the St. German's Estate, situate at Hither Green, Lewisham, and the respondent was, and is, the district surveyor for the district under the London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cxxiii.), and it was admitted that at all material times the appellant was the owner of buildings placed on the land for the purposes of sects. 154 and 157 of the Act.

In or about the year 1899 the appellant contracted with one John Lawrence, a builder, to erect certain houses on part of the lands, and John Lawrence did, in pursuance of such contracts, erect the houses which are described in the summonses. John Lawrence was paid by the appellant the sums for which he contracted to erect the houses. Such sums included any fees which John Lawrence was liable to pay to the respondent under the London Building Act 1894.

By the London Building Act 1894, sect. 154, it is provided that

There shall be paid by the builder or, in his default, by the owner or occupier, as the case may be, of the building or structure, in respect whereof the same are chargeable to every district surveyor in respect of the several matters mentioned in parts 1 and 3 of the 3rd schedule to the Act, the fees therein specified or such other fees not exceeding the amounts therein specified as may be directed by the council.

By sect. 157 of the Act it is enacted that

(1) At the expiration of the following periods (that is to say): (a) Of fourteen days after the roof of any building surveyed by a district surveyor under this Act has been covered in . . . the district surveyor shall be entitled to receive the fees due to him from the builder employed in erecting such buildings . . . or from the owner or occupier of the building so erected . . . (2) If any such builder, owner, or occupier refuses to pay the fees, they may be recovered in a summary manner on its being shown to the satisfaction of the court that a proper bill specifying the amount of the fees was delivered to him or sent to him in a registered letter addressed to his last known residence.

The amounts claimed by the respondent were fees to which he was entitled under part 1 of the 3rd schedule of the Act.

The roofs of the houses in respect of which the summonses were issued had been covered in prior to the end of Dec. 1899, and the respondent delivered to John Lawrence proper bills specifying the amount of the fees to which the respondent was entitled in respect of the houses, and demanded them from John Lawrence at various times (from the 17th Jan. 1900 to the 10th Sept. 1900).

On several occasions subsequent to the delivery of the bill to John Lawrence, the respondent requested payment of the fees from him, but he did not and has not since paid any part thereof although frequent promises were made by him to make the payments, and on or about the 2nd July 1900 he caused to be sent to the respondent notice of his insolvency.

On the 20th Oct. 1900 the respondent delivered to the appellant proper bills specifying the amount of the fees and demanded payment thereof from the appellant.

On behalf of the appellant it was contended that the fees in question became payable by the appellant (if at all) immediately upon John Lawrence making default in payment thereof, and that John Lawrence made default in Jan. 1900. That the respondent's complaints were not laid within six calendar months from the time when the respondent became entitled (if at all) to receive the fees nor were they laid within six months from the time when John Lawrence made default, and were therefore not laid within the time limited for the commencement of summary proceedings by sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43), and that each of the summonses should be dismissed.

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the respondent's complaints were laid within six months from the time when proper bills specifying the amount of the fees were delivered to the appellant, and that the date upon which the bills were delivered to the appellant was the time from which the six months period mentioned in sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 commenced to run.

The magistrate held that the true construction of sect. 157 of the London Building Act 1894 was that the appellant became liable to pay the fees on the delivery to him of the respondent's bills on the 20th Oct. 1900, and that consequently the respondent's complaints were laid within six months from the time when the matters of the complaints arose, and he ordered the appellant to pay the amounts claimed.

Macmorran, K.C. and B. C. Glen for the appellant.—The whole question here turns upon the true construction of sect. 157 of the London Building Act 1894. Although by sub-sect. 2 the sending of a proper bill, specifying the amount of the fees is made a condition precedent, that does not extend the period within which the fees can be recovered. The time within which proceedings must be taken—viz., six months—is provided by sect. 11 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. 43). The matter of complaint arises when the district surveyor is entitled to recover his money. The fact that the district surveyor has to send in his bill makes no difference, and cannot extend the period of limitation. The fees that are payable are regulated by sect. 154 of the Act of 1894, and so it is known by the person liable what are the amounts payable. The magistrate held that this case was covered by the case of Labalmondière v. Addison (1 El. & El. 41). It was there held that where expenses in respect of a dangerous structure were recoverable from the owner under 18 & 19 Vict. c. 122, the matter of complaint was the non-payment of the expenses, and therefore the six months limited by 11 & 12 Vict. c. 43 ran from the demand for payment and the refusal, and not from the completion of the work. The present case, however, is quite different from that which was commented upon in Pool and Forden Highway Board v. Gunning (46 L. T. Rep. 163). There it was held that the six months' limit, within which a complaint must be preferred to recover extraordinary expenses under sect. 23 of the Highways and Locomotives Amendment Act 1878 must be reckoned from the date of the surveyor's certificate, and not from the time that payment is demanded. That case accentuates our point that in construing a statute a construction should not be taken which enables a creditor to extend the period within which he can take proceedings to recover a sum due to him. The same principle was acted upon by the Court of Appeal in Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Investment Building Society (61 L. T. Rep. 867; 24 Q. B. Div. 1). The period of limitation ought to run from the time the district surveyor was entitled to demand his money—namely, within fourteen days of the covering in of the roof. In a case like the present, where proceedings are taken against the owner or occupier owing to the builder's default under sect. 154, the time must begin to run when default is made by the builder. Once the statutory time has begun to run against the builder it begins to run against both the others, the owner and the occupier. They referred to Tubb v. Good, 22 L. T. Rep. 885; L. Rep. 5 Q. B. 443.

[K.B. Div.]

Shearman (Ruegg, K.C. with him) for the respondent.—The matter of complaint cannot arise against the owner until a bill in conformity with sect. 157 (2) has been delivered to him. He referred to Labalmondière v. Addison, 1 El. & El. 41.

A somewhat analogous case arose in Jacomb v. Dodgson (7 L. T. Rep. 674; 3 B. & S. 461) where expenses incurred by a board of health were recoverable summarily, and where the person upon whom the expenses were apportioned did not appeal within three months, the apportionment was to be binding and conclusive. It was there held that the six months limit for proceeding summarily only began to run from the expiration of the three months. Cockburn, C.J. said: "During these three months the local board cannot enforce their remedy, and it remains in abeyance, and to suppose it to form a portion of the six months would be to place this class of cases in a different category from all others." Here until the bill has been delivered to the owner or occupier no proceedings could be taken. In Hornsey Local Board v. Monarch Investment Building Society (sup.) the words in the statute (37 & 38 Vict. c. 57) are "next after a present right to receive the same shall have accrued," and as Lopes, L.J. points out in his judgment, "the words are 'present right to receive' and not 'present right to recover'; and it is to be observed that the right to receive may exist though the exact sum to be received is not ascertained." It is only after the default by the builder that the district surveyor is entitled to receive from the owner or occupier, and he cannot lay his complaint until he has gone through the procedure required by sect. 157 (2) of the Act of 1894. Bowen, J. in Pool and Forden Highway Board v. Gunning (sup.) says: "I think the date of the surveyor's certificate is the time at which the complaint arises." There the certificate had to be given to the authority before proceedings were taken.

Macmorran, K.C. in reply.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In my opinion, this case is one of very considerable difficulty, but, after the best consideration I can give, I do not see my way to interfere with the decision of the magistrate. Certainly not as regards the whole, but for reasons which I will explain in a moment, it is possible that another view may be taken by the Court of Appeal. As to part of these summonses, the question might have to be further investigated. Now, I do not want to decide any more than is really necessary for this case, because, as I have said, I think the matter is one of very great difficulty. I can quite conceive a state of circumstances arising where very general considerations might have to apply. The roofing of the houses in this case was completed in Dec. 1899, and I understand it is agreed by both parties that at some date after the expiration of fourteen days from Dec. 1899—which, at any rate, would not be later than the 14th Jan. 1900—the surveyor did become entitled to the fees that are now claimed. Between the 17th Jan. 1900 and the 10th Sept. he delivered the bills specifying the amount of the fees contemplated by sub-sect. 2 of sect. 157 of the London Building Act 1894 to the builder, whose name was Lawrence. On the 2nd July Lawrence became insolvent, and on the 8th Nov. 1900 the summonses were taken out against the owner. Now, it is necessary for us therefore to consider whether the six months ran from the 14th Jan. at the latest in the year 1900, or whether they ran either from the dates when the bills were given to the builder—in which case some of the summonses would be out of time—or whether they ran from the date of the notice to the owner, which, I think, if I remember rightly, was the 20th Oct. 1900, in which case none of the summonses would be out of time. The material words for our consideration, there being no specific direction in the statute, are the words in sects. 11 and 12 Vict. c. 43. They are: "Such complaints shall be made and such informations shall be laid within six calendar months from the time when the matter of such complaint and information respectively arose." I think it would be quite possible to hold that the matter of such complaint and information arose generally when there was a neglect to pay the fees after fourteen days. I mean it is quite possible to take the view that when money becomes payable at a given date or on a given event the matter of such complaint and information respectively arises then. But I think we cannot hold that the whole matter is clearly ascertained at that date. In the first place, at any rate with regards of some of the fees under this Act, and possibly with regard to the fees in this case, they are a matter of calculation which require skilled ability and training in order to arrive at them. It is quite plain, as Mr. Shearman pointed out, that some fees are for special services, and it would be required to know how much the man himself had done. Therefore I think we cannot say that at fourteen days from the roofing in the amount was ascertained or ascertainable by the person who had to pay. Under those circumstances I think that the principle, and I will say no more than the principle, which was enunciated in the judgment of Field and Bowen, J.J. in the case of the Pool and Forden Highway Board v. Gunning (46 L. T. Rep. 163) applies—namely, that, at any rate, at that time the amount could not be so ascertained as to enable the debtor to pay. Unfortunately, that does not, again, enable us to decide the question because we have to consider the rights of two people. As against the builder, assuming I am right, the time would run from when the bills were sent in to him, and Mr. Shearman says that inasmuch as the owner has not to pay until there is default by the builder and inasmuch as the owner does not know what he, the owner, has to pay, or may not know until a notice has been served upon him, sub-sect. 2 of sect. 157 makes it impossible to bring proceedings at all until that notice has been sent, and that, therefore, the six months ought to run from that period. In support of his contention he cites the case of Labalmondiere v. Addison (1 El. & El. 41), where, undoubtedly, they did decide that the six months only ran from the time of making the demand. But I think that that is obviously a case in which the principle of the decision was that the default could not be ascertained, or the failure to fulfil the legal obligation take place, until the demand. Therefore I may say I have very little doubt in coming to the conclusion that, at any rate, the six months did not run until a bill had been delivered to the builder. That would prevent us from being able to accede to the whole of the argument for the appellants, because with regard to some of the summonses it is admitted that the bills were not served upon the builder until a period less than six months before the 8th Nov., the date when the summonses were taken out. I have had still further difficulty in coming to the conclusion, but, after consideration, I feel that I must express my opinion that the time does not run as against the owner until he has received a bill under sub-sect. 2. It seems to me that we have to consider when there is a default, and I do not think that we can lay down any general principles which would exclude cases where the owner really may not know what has happened. Part may have been paid—or it does not to my mind follow that because a builder has not paid, that of necessity the whole amount may be due from the owner. But in any event I think that, prima facie, the evidence of the neglect and default of the builder will be a neglect and default to pay after a bill has been delivered. I cannot say on the facts before me that there was such evidence of default as would justify the six months commencing to run, the matter of complaint there being the neglect of the owner to pay after the default of the builder. Therefore I come to the conclusion with hesitation, and being quite conscious of the fact that wiser minds may take different views, that we are not able in this case to say that any of these complaints were too late. I do not wish to decide more than that, because, as I have said, I can imagine such a state of circumstances that general principles might make it wholly inequitable that any summonses should be brought against either owner or occupier. Now, I have only to deal with the principal argument which was pressed yesterday by Mr. Glen and to-day by Mr. Macmorran—namely, that it would be a great hardship upon an owner, because, in this particular case, and very likely in many cases, the whole obligation to pay these charges and expenses is thrown upon the builder, and in this case, and in many cases, he may have to pay twice over. I think, when you come to examine that, although, of course, in one sense it is a hardship, it is not a hardship which ought to lead us to put any different construction upon the Act. The fact that these fees are due from owner, builder, and occupier is known to everybody, and must be known to everybody. The owner need not enter into a contract whereby he relies upon the builder to indemnify him against these fees, and he need not, under such a contract, pay the full amount without being satisfied that his liability as owner has been discharged by the builder having to pay these fees. I cannot see that the contractual relations between the builder and the owner ought to affect the rights of the surveyor to recover the fees. For these reasons I have come to the conclusion that we ought to affirm the decision of the magistrate in regard to all the summonses. If it shall turn out that I am wrong, then I think we ought to affirm the decision of the magistrates, so far as it relates to all summonses which were brought within six months of the delivery of the bill to the builder.

Metropolis — Black smoke — Nuisance — Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 24 (b).In order to support a conviction under sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, it is not necessary to show that any particular person or property has been affected by the black smoke.

CASE stated on ten complaints under the Public Health (London) Act 1891, preferred by the respondent against the appellants.

The first complaint charged that at the premises occupied by the appellants the following nuisance existed after notice had been duly served on them by the respondent, to wit a chimney (not being a chimney of a private dwelling-house) that did on the 1st Nov. 1900 send forth black smoke in such quantity as to be a nuisance, and that the appellants did unlawfully make default in complying with the requisitions of the notice within the time specified, and that the nuisance was caused by the act, default, or sufferance of the appellants, contrary to the provisions of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

The other nine complaints were in like terms, except that each stated a different date—namely, the 2nd, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 10th, 12th, 13th, and 14th Nov.

At the hearing of these complaints it was proved that black smoke issued from the appellants' chimney, which was 180ft. high, on the days alleged in the complaints, at various times varying from eight minutes to one hour, and from six occasions to one occasion on each day.

No witness stated that the black smoke was a nuisance to himself.

On behalf of the appellants it was contended that in the absence of affirmative evidence that a nuisance to some person or property was created by the black smoke, the offences charged were not made out.

The magistrate on the evidence came to the conclusion that the black smoke on each of the days amounted to a nuisance, and he accordingly convicted the appellants.

Cripps, K.O. (Scott Fox, K.O. and S. Fleming with him) for the appellants.—This was a conviction under sect. 24 (b) of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, and the provisions of that sub-section are not complied with merely by showing that black smoke is coming out of a chimney for a given time. Something else must be shown—namely, that such a quantity is sent forth “as to be a nuisance either to a person or to property.” There must be some evidence that annoyance has been caused or evidence of a nuisance at common law. There is a great difference between sub-sects. (a) and (b) of sect. 24, but this is a prosecution under (b). He referred to Avory, K.O. and Louenthal for the respondent.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I must not be thought to say that a magistrate must convict merely because black smoke was issuing out of the chimney. On the other hand, I am clearly of opinion that it is not necessary to show that a particular individual or particular property has been affected by the black smoke. The magistrate has found as a fact that the black smoke on each of the days amounted to a nuisance. I think that the magistrate was entitled to find that this was not one isolated fact, but that on ten days out of fourteen black smoke was issuing from this chimney. If it had been on one day only he might have found that there was no nuisance, but he has found that on one day, as well as on others, the black smoke came out. It is impossible to argue that there should be no conviction. The magistrate was justified in his finding, and we cannot say that he was wrong in coming to that conclusion. I feel sure that the magistrate would not have convicted for one event, on one day, by accident; but it is quite different where the events are continuous.

EDGAR (app.) v. SPAIN (resp.). (a)

Animal—Slaughter of—“Brought to or delivered at such place for the purpose of being slaughtered”—Cruelty to Animals Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), s. 8.

The respondent, a licensed horse slaughterer, purchased a mare for 10s., for working which the seller had been fined, and sent it by his servant to his premises licensed for the slaughter of such animals. He entered it in his statutory register “ . . . bought . . . brown mare to kill for 10s.” The mare was kept on those premises for nine days, and after being cautioned, the respondent had cut the hair from its neck.

Held, that the mare had been brought to the premises for the purpose of being slaughtered within sect. 8 of the Cruelty to Animals Act 1849.

CASE stated upon two informations preferred by the appellant against the respondent under sect. 8 of 11 & 12 Vict. c. 92, charging him that he, being a person licensed to slaughter horses under the statute, did omit to cut off the hair from the neck of a certain mare immediately upon such mare being brought to or delivered at his premises for the purpose of being slaughtered, and omitted to do so for one day thereafter; and also that he did not within three days from the time of the mare being so brought to or delivered at the premises kill or cause to be killed the mare, and omitted to do so for nine days thereafter.

At the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted:—

The respondent was a licensed horse slaughterer, and on the 22nd Nov. 1900, in a street he bought the mare in question for the sum of 10s. which was knacker price, for working which the seller had the day before been fined. The respondent's own servant led it straight to the respondent's premises, licensed for the slaughter of such animals.

In the register kept by the respondent, as the statute directs, on the licensed premises, the following entry of the transaction was made on the 23rd Nov. 1900: “Nov. 22, 1900, bought of D. Huckstep, Southwood, carrier, brown mare to kill, for 10s.”

Upon the visit of the appellant, on the 23rd Nov. 1900, to the premises of the respondent he found that the hair had not been cut off from the neck of the mare, and he informed the respondent that he had not complied with the statute in omitting to do so immediately the mare was brought on the premises, and after this caution the hair was cut off the next morning. The mare was however kept on the premises, and was not killed within three days as provided by the statute, although requested to do so by the appellant, the respondent giving as his reason for not doing so that he had already more horse-flesh meat than he could find a market for.

The respondent did not kill the mare until nine days after it had been delivered as aforesaid.

On behalf of the respondent it was proved that D. Huckstep did not sell the animal for the purpose of being slaughtered by the respondent, but that the respondent could do as he liked with it.

It was argued on behalf of the appellant that it must be assumed on the facts that the mare was brought to and delivered at the licensed premises for the purpose of being slaughtered, irrespective of the fact that there was no expressed condition made that the mare should be slaughtered, such condition, whether expressed or not expressed, being irrelevant to the issue, which was determined by the facts proved relating to the condition of the mare, the amount of purchase money, the entry in the register, the cutting off the hair, and the keeping the animal on the licensed premises until it was slaughtered.

PICKFORD (app.) v. CORSI (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

On behalf of the respondent it was contended that the words brought to or delivered at such place for the purpose of being slaughtered, in sect. 8, referred to a direction given by the sender, and not to the intention with which the buyer might receive the horse, and that in the absence of any direction by the sender, the statute leaves the receiver at liberty to slaughter the horse or not as he thinks fit.

The justices were of opinion that the respondent was not bound by the provisions of sect. 8 for the reasons advanced on his behalf, and they dismissed both informations.

By the Cruelty to Animals Act 1849 (12 & 13 Vict. c. 92), s. 8:

Every person keeping or using or acting in the management of any place for the purpose of slaughtering horses or other cattle (not intended for butcher's meat) shall, immediately upon any horse or cattle being brought to or delivered at such place for the purpose of being slaughtered, cut off or cause to be cut off the hair from the neck of such horse or other cattle, and within three days from the time of such horse or other cattle being brought or delivered as aforesaid shall kill or cause to be killed the said horse or other cattle, and, until such horse or other cattle shall be killed, shall supply such horse or other cattle with sufficient quantity of fit and wholesome food and water; and if any other person keeping or using or acting in the management of any such place shall neglect or omit to cut or cause to be cut off the hair of the neck of such horse or other cattle, or to kill or cause to be killed any such horse or any other cattle within the time above limited, or shall neglect or omit to supply a sufficient quantity of fit and wholesome food and water to such horse or other cattle as aforesaid, every such person shall on conviction of any or either of the said offences be liable to a penalty not exceeding 5l.

Colam for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case if there was any real question as to the object with which the horse was taken to the premises of the respondent, whether it was taken there to be slaughtered or not, I think some difficulty might arise. But it is obvious in this case that the horse was sold to the respondent for the very purpose of having it slaughtered, and the very excuse given by the respondent that he had deferred slaughtering it because he could not find a market for the supply of horseflesh already on his hands, shows that he knew perfectly well the object with which the horse was sold to him. The regulations under this Act are provided in the interests of public health as well as considerations of humanity. The case must be remitted to the justices to convict.

PICKFORD (app.) v. CORSI (resp.) (a)

Pawnbrokers—Pledge of stolen goods with pawnbroker—Conviction of pawner for larceny of goods—Liability of pawner to charge of unlawful pawning after conviction for larceny—Autre fois convict—Pawnbrokers Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 93), s. 33.

The fact that a person has been convicted of larceny of goods which he has stolen and pawned, does not prevent proceedings from being afterwards taken against him under sect. 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872, for the offence of knowingly and designedly pawning goods the property of another person; and consequently, where a person who has stolen goods and has pawned the same with a pawnbroker, has been convicted of larceny of the goods, he may, notwithstanding such conviction for larceny, be afterwards charged with and convicted under that section of the offence of unlawfully pawning the stolen goods.

CASE stated by the metropolitan police magistrate sitting at Worship-street Police-court in the metropolis.

At a court of summary jurisdiction held at the Worship-street Police-court on the 24th and 31st Jan. 1901, an information dated the 18th Jan. 1901 was preferred by the appellant against Antonio Corsi (the respondent) under sect. 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872, charging that the respondent on the 5th Jan. 1901 had knowingly and designedly pawned with the appellant, being a pawnbroker within the meaning of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872, two rings, being the property of one Constance Biddulph, the respondent not being employed or authorised by the said Constance Biddulph to pawn the same.

This information was heard and determined by the magistrate and was dismissed by him.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were either admitted or proved in evidence:—

The appellant was a licensed pawnbroker within the meaning of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872.

On the 5th Jan. 1901 the respondent pledged with the appellant two rings for 6l. then advanced by the appellant to the respondent on the security thereof, which rings had been stolen by the respondent at the Avenue Studios, where he was employed, and which were the property of Constance Biddulph.

On the 16th Jan. 1901 the owner of the rings charged the respondent at the Westminster Police-court with stealing the two rings on a day prior to the 5th Jan. 1901. The respondent was convicted and was thereupon bound over by recognisance in the sum of 10l. to come up for judgment if called upon.

The appellant declining to give up the rings the owner, on the 16th Jan. 1901, issued against the appellant a summons under the Metropolitan Police Courts Act 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71), s. 27, for unlawfully refusing and neglecting to deliver the two rings to her. This summons was heard on the 22nd Jan. 1901 at the Westminster Police-court, when the appellant was ordered to deliver

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

[K.B. Div.]

the two rings to the owner on payment by her to appellant of the sum of 3*l.*, and in compliance with this order the appellant delivered the two rings to the owner and received the above sum of 3*l.* from her.

The respondent had not repaid the above sum of 6*l.* advanced by the appellant on the security of the rings or any part thereof.

It was contended for the appellant that the conviction for larceny of the rings did not prevent the respondent being proceeded against under sect. 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872.

No one appeared for the respondent.

The magistrate was of opinion that the respondent, having been convicted of larceny of the rings, was not liable to be convicted of another criminal offence in respect of the same property and upon the same facts as those proved upon the conviction for larceny; that the offence under sect. 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872 was a criminal offence inasmuch as a penalty is awarded, and the fact of a court of summary jurisdiction having the power in addition to imposing a penalty to award to the pawnbroker any sum not exceeding the full value of the pledge did not constitute a civil remedy merely for the purpose of recouping the pawnbroker for any loss he might have sustained.

He therefore dismissed the information.

The question of law for the opinion of the court was whether the respondent having been convicted of the larceny of the two rings as aforesaid, he was thereby discharged from liability to proceedings under sect. 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872, and whether under the circumstances aforesaid the magistrate was right in dismissing the summons against the respondent.

If the court should be of opinion that the summons was properly dismissed, and that the appellant was barred from proceeding under sect. 33 of the Pawnbrokers Act 1872, then the order of dismissal was to stand; but if the court should be of a contrary opinion then the case was to be remitted to the magistrate with the opinion of the court thereon.

The Metropolitan Police Courts Act 1839 (2 & 3 Vict. c. 71) provides :

Sect. 27. And be it enacted, That if any goods shall be stolen or unlawfully obtained from any person, or being lawfully obtained, shall be unlawfully deposited, pawned, pledged, sold, or exchanged, and complaint shall be made thereof to any of the said magistrates, and that such goods are in the possession of any broker, dealer in marine stores, or other dealer in second-hand property, or of any person who shall have advanced money upon the credit of such goods, within the metropolitan police district, it shall be lawful for such magistrate to issue a summons or warrant for the appearance of such broker or dealer, and for the production of the goods and to order such goods to be delivered up to the owner thereof, either without any payment, or upon payment of such sum and at such a time as the magistrate shall think fit, &c.

The Pawnbrokers Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 93) provides :

Sect. 33. If any person knowingly and designedly pawns with a pawnbroker anything being the property of another person, the pawnbroker not being employed or authorised by the owner thereof to pawn the same, he shall be guilty of an offence against this Act, and shall be liable, on conviction thereof in a court of summary jurisdiction, to forfeit any sum not exceeding 5*l.*, and in addition thereto any sum not exceeding the full value of the pledge as ascertained by the court. The forfeitures when recovered shall be applied towards making satisfaction thereout to the party injured, and defraying the costs of prosecution as the court directs; but if the party injured declines to accept of such satisfaction and costs, or if there is any surplus of the forfeitures, then the forfeitures or surplus (as the case may be) shall be paid to the overseers of the poor of the parish or place where the offence is committed, for the use of the poor thereof.

Avory, K.O. (C. L. Attenborough with him) for the appellant.—The question is whether a person is liable to be convicted of the offence under the Pawnbrokers Act of unlawfully pledging goods of another person after he has been convicted of the larceny of the same goods. The property in the rings did not pass by the larceny to the respondent, and therefore when he pawned the rings he was pawning the property of another person, so that the case comes expressly within the statute. I do not dispute that this offence under sect. 33 was a criminal offence, but the next question is, Could the defendant plead autrefois convict, and is the matter res judicata? He could not plead autrefois convict because, although it is a criminal offence, it is not the same criminal offence, and it is not an offence necessarily involved in the former offence. These two considerations cover the two cases of autrefois acquit and autrefois convict. It is a conclusive answer to the plea autrefois convict or res judicata, that it is not the same criminal offence which forms the subject of inquiry. The man who steals goods does not necessarily pawn them; the pawning is a separate and subsequent transaction. The case of Fancett v. Bierman (14 Times L. Rep. 148) throws some light on the point. There the question was raised whether under this section (sect. 33) the pawnbroker was the proper person to take proceedings. The magistrate held that the pawnbroker was not the party injured within the meaning of the Pawnbrokers Act, and that he had no right to take proceedings under this section, but that it was only the owner of the property who could take such proceedings. The court overruled that contention, and said that the pawnbroker was the person injured within the meaning of this section. That case therefore decides that there were two separate offences, one committed against the owner of the property and a second offence committed against the pawnbroker. The object of this Act is the protection of pawnbrokers, and the object of this particular section is to give the pawnbroker a remedy against any person who deceives him by pawning property which does not belong to him, the necessary consequence being that the pawnbroker ultimately has to give up the property, and may or may not get back from the owner the amount which he has advanced. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—If your contention is not right the remedy given to the pawnbroker under the section of getting something back out of the fines would be taken away.] That is so, as the latter part of the section clearly shows. The object is to give the pawnbroker a remedy, and also to give him some recompence for the money which he has lost, and which the Legislature recognises he must lose on property pawned belonging to somebody else. The magistrate thought that because the same evidence was called to prove the one offence as was called to prove the other, therefore the defendant was entitled to be acquitted. That was the confusion in his mind, and it is very clearly expressed in the recent case of Reg. v. Ollis (19 Mag. Cas. 680; 83 L. T. Rep. 251; (1900) 2 Q. B. 758). There a man was indicted for false pretences and acquitted. A second indictment for false pretences was preferred against him, and evidence which had been given on the first trial was repeated at the second trial, and the question was whether that evidence was admissible. Darling, J. there says (19 Mag. Cas. at p. 686; 83 L. T. Rep. at p. 256; (1900) 2 Q. B. at p. 780): "It seems to me, therefore, that by the admission of this evidence the defendant was not bis vexatus, for I feel sure that those words are not to be understood as meaning that a man is not to be more than once annoyed by the same evidence. I think they mean that he is not to be by legal process twice exposed to the risk of being found guilty of the same crime, or the same tort, or liable twice to pay the same debt, be it to the State or to his fellow citizen. To hold otherwise seems to me to rule that evidence which has been given once shall never be produced again against the same defendant; yet it is plain that up to a certain point the evidence must often be the same, although the defendant is accused of wrongs done to two distinct persons, and that in different suits or forensic proceedings." So here, up to a certain point the evidence is the same; but the evidence necessary to convict the defendant of larceny does not involve proving that he has pawned the article. He may be convicted of larceny without any proof that he has pawned. He was guilty of the offence of larceny before he committed the other offence, which is a separate and subsequent offence. The magistrate was wrong, and the defendant ought to have been convicted of this second and subsequent offence.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In my opinion the learned magistrate ought to have entertained this case. I think the ground of our decision may be shortly put in the way in which it has already been put in the argument for the appellant—namely, that this was a statute which was passed, not only for the protection of owners of goods, but also for the protection of pawnbrokers, and that the offence charged is the offence specified in the section, of knowingly and designedly pawning goods which are the property of somebody else. It would seem strange that, because in this particular case, which is very likely the great majority of such cases, the goods had been stolen before they were pawned, and the person stealing them had been convicted of the larceny, therefore the pawnbroker should lose his right to such remedy as the section gives him, and should lose that right by virtue of the fact that the ownership of the goods had been proved not to be that of the person who pawned them. I think that it would require express words in the statute to make it an answer in such cases to an offence under sect. 33 of the Act, which is a different offence to the larceny, to say that there had been a previous conviction in respect of the depriving another person altogether—namely, the owner—of his property in the goods. I think the distinction is between the evidence given to establish one offence and partly the same evidence which may be given to establish a different offence of greater or less degree. I think, in this case, the learned magistrate ought to have admitted the evidence and dealt with the charge.

REX v. JUSTICES OF SUNDERLAND. (a)

Licensing—Agreement with borough corporation as to lapse of licence—Members of corporation voting as justices on grant of new licence—Interest—Bias.

The corporation of the borough of S. entered into an agreement with D. and D., brewers, that if the latter bought for 10,000l. certain lands which the corporation had acquired under an improvement scheme, and carried out the improvements contemplated by the corporation, the latter would allow the licence of the L. Hotel, which was situate on the said lands, to lapse, and would covenant not to apply for a renewal thereof, and would repay the 10,000l. to D. and D. if the latter failed to obtain a new licence for certain other premises belonging to them in P.-road, within the borough of S. On the licensing committee of justices were several members of the corporation. At the licensing sessions the committee, after having refused four applications by other persons for licences for premises in P.-road, granted D. and D.'s application for a licence for their premises there. This grant was afterwards confirmed by the justices, of whom a majority were members of the corporation. There was evidence to show that the justices in refusing the other applications had considered the merits of each application.

Held, that there was not sufficient evidence of interest or bias to invalidate the licence.

THE facts in this case are thus stated in the written judgment of Lord Alverstone, C.J.: In this case a rule nisi for a certiorari was granted on the application of Mr. Foster and certain other gentlemen, inhabitants of Sunderland, calling upon the justices for the county borough of Sunderland to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up a certain order of the 27th Sept. 1900, confirming a provisional licence which had been granted to Duncan and Dalgleish Limited, a brewery company, on the 26th Sept. 1900. The grounds of the motion, as stated in the rule, were: (1) Bias of the justices in wrongfully using their positions as justices in carrying into effect an agreement with Duncan and Dalgleish Limited; (2) the wrongfully granting a full licence at Pallion to sell intoxicating liquors in lieu of the licence of the Londonderry Hotel, on payment by the applicant of the sum of 10,000l. to the borough funds of Sunderland. The facts of the case, as disclosed by the affidavits, were as follows: At some time in the year 1899, the corporation of Sunderland purchased some property with a view to street improvements, and, among other properties, a fully-licensed house in High-street, Sunderland, known as the Londonderry Hotel. Attempts had been made by the corporation since they acquired the property to make arrangements for the pulling down and rebuilding of the hotel on some part of the site acquired by them for the purpose of the improvements, but these attempts had apparently not produced any result. On the 8th Aug. 1900 a resolution of the council was passed that the council should consent to the transfer or lapsing of the licence of the Londonderry Hotel, and that the premises should be demolished, and the highways committee be instructed to negotiate accordingly. The chairman of the highways committee was Alderman Atkinson Gibson, and between the 8th and 22nd Aug. he entered into negotiations with Duncan and Dalgleish Limited, which resulted in an agreement of the 22nd Aug., which recited the intention of the company to apply at the adjourned general annual licence meeting for a full licence to sell on or off the premises to be erected in Pallion-road, Sunderland, and that upon such application the company was desirous of offering to surrender an existing licence of the same nature. The agreement then provided that, in the event of the application being granted, the company should pay the corporation the sum of 10,000*l.*, and that the corporation would, upon the opening of the proposed new premises in Pallion-road, close the Londonderry Hotel as a licensed house and not apply or suffer any application to be made for the renewal of any licence thereof. The agreement further provided that should the grant and confirmation of the licence be revoked by proceedings in the High Court of Justice, expressly instituted for that purpose, the corporation should repay the sum of 10,000*l.* On the 23rd Aug., the day after the agreement was made, the general annual licensing meeting of the borough of Sunderland was held, and at that meeting there were present among others the mayor (Mr. Dix), Messrs. Reed, Sanderson, Pratt, Burns, and Gibson, and at that meeting a notice was served by the solicitor for Mr. Foster and the other gentlemen on whose behalf the rule was moved, objecting to their adjudicating on any application for a licence for Pallion, on the ground that they were members of the corporation which was primarily interested in the granting or refusing of licences in that district. No application was made on behalf of Duncan and Dalgleish Limited at that meeting, but there were four other applications made for full licences for houses at Pallion, all of which were refused. The adjourned meeting was held on the 25th Sept. At that meeting Duncan and Dalgleish Limited, in pursuance of notice given by them, applied for a provisional licence for an hotel to be erected at Pallion. On that occasion the six gentlemen, Dix, Reed, Sanderson, Pratt, Burns, and Gibson, were again present, and a similar objection was taken on behalf of Mr. Foster and the other gentlemen above mentioned. The licensing committee granted a provisional licence, and on the 27th Sept. the confirming authority—that is to say, the justices of the county borough of Sunderland—confirmed the grant. There were present at the confirming meeting of the 27th thirteen magistrates, of whom seven were members of the corporation, and six of such gentlemen were Messrs. Dix, Reed, Sanderson, Pratt, Burns, and Gibson above mentioned.

REX v. JUSTICES OF SUNDERLAND.

E. Shortt for the justices.—The rule was obtained as I understand on two grounds—namely, bias and interest on the part of those justices who were members both of the corporation and of the licensing and confirming authority. The charge of bias is founded on the fact that the licensing authority rejected various applications for licences in Pallion-road before granting the application of Messrs. Duncan and Dalgleish. The gentlemen in question have filed affidavits denying bias, and stating that in all these applications they acted on the evidence before them. This being so there is no evidence of bias:

Reg. v. Justices of Stockport, 60 J. P. 552.

As to the charge of having a personal interest in the grant of this licence, any personal interest these members of the corporation had was merely as ratepayers. This is not a sufficient personal interest to prevent them from voting on the grant of the licence, or to make that licence bad. It will be said that they had a greater interest than other ratepayers in granting the licence, as they were personally interested in the development of the corporation property. Such interest was only an interest as the representatives of the ratepayers:

Reg. v. Taylor, 14 Times L. Rep. 185;

Reg. v. Rand, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 230.

This is a very different case from Reg. v. Bowman and others (78 L. T. Rep. 230; (1898) 1 Q. B. 663). There the grant was made conditionally upon the applicants paying a certain amount to the corporation funds. Even there the court did not hold that this gave the justices of the borough a personal interest in the grant; it only held that it showed that they had taken into consideration matters extraneous to the application, and therefore had not in any proper sense heard the application at all.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C. (Montague Lush with him) for the Corporation of Sunderland.—I adopt the argument for the justices, and wish merely to point out that this is not a transfer of the licence of the Londonderry to Messrs. Duncan and Dalgleish's premises. It is the grant of a new licence:

Lacey v. Lacey, 19 Mag. Cas. 178; 80 L. T. Rep. 473; (1899) A. C. 222.

Dickens, K.C. and H. Lloyd for Duncan and Dalgleish Limited.

C. A. Russell, K.C. (Blacklock with him).—As the affidavits show, it was the original intention of the corporation to sell the land on which the Londonderry Hotel stood without any licence—to allow the licence to lapse altogether—and finding the site unsaleable on these terms they resolved that there should be what is in effect, if not in law, a transfer of the licence to Messrs. Duncan and Dalgleish on condition that this firm would take over the site at a very large price. On these facts we contend that the justices, who were members of the corporation and who were more especially members of the very committee who had the disposal of the site upon their hands, were disqualified to vote as to the grant or transfer of the licence to Messrs. Duncan and Dalgleish's premises. I base this contention on three grounds. In the first place

K.B. Div.]

REX v. JUSTICES OF SUNDERLAND.

[K.B. Div.]

they had a direct personal interest in granting the licence—an interest quite independent of their interest as ratepayers—the interest which men have who wish to bring a transaction (whether for their own or their clients' benefit) for which they are responsible to a successful issue. These gentlemen did not want their improvement scheme to turn out a failure. Interest does not necessarily mean pecuniary interest:

Reg. v. Myers and others, 34 L. T. Rep. 247; 1 Q. B. Div. 173.

In the second place, I say, in this matter these justices were for the same reasons judges in their own cause. On this ground again they were disqualified to act:

Reg. v. Haynes, 12 Times L. Rep. 323.

Lastly, there is, I submit, evidence, and strong evidence, of bias. The refusal of several applications for licences for premises in Pallion-road in which the corporation had no interest followed by the grant of this licence for premises in Pallion-road in which the corporation had a direct interest is proof that the justices, who were members of the corporation, were consciously or unconsciously biased in their decisions. As to the difficulty created by Reg. v. Sharman (1898) 1 Q. B. 578, that does not arise here as the rule is not only for a certiorari, but also for a mandamus.

Tindal Atkinson, K.C. in reply.

May 8.—Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In the argument before the court it was contended that both the order originally granting the licence, and the order confirming it, were bad, and that, therefore, the confirmation order must be quashed upon the grounds mentioned in the rule. We have to consider whether the existence of the agreement with the corporation and the circumstances under which that agreement had been arranged, are sufficient to disqualify the gentlemen in question from sitting as members of the licensing committee or confirming authority. It was contended on behalf of the gentlemen on whose application the rule had been granted that the six gentlemen in question had such an interest in the matter as to prevent them from being impartial, and to cause them to be in fact biased in favour of the application of Duncan and Dalgleish Limited. The case is not without difficulty, and no doubt it would be better that under such circumstances the tribunal which had to adjudicate upon the matter should not include gentlemen who had been concerned in bringing about the agreement of the 22nd Aug., but in our opinion, both upon the authorities and upon the principles which had been laid down in similar cases, we cannot hold that there is such evidence of bias as to make their action invalid. The grounds upon which persons in such a position were disqualified from acting were, we think, correctly stated by Mr. Russell in his argument in support of the rule—(1) pecuniary interest; (2) that a man may not act as judge in his own case; (3) that the circumstances were such as to show that a member or members of the tribunal was or were in fact biased, or did not act impartially. The first two grounds were not relied on, nor could they be upon the facts. No doubt the magistrates, as ratepayers of Sunderland, would be interested in the agreement of the 22nd Aug. being carried into effect; but we are clearly of opinion, and the contrary was scarcely contended, that such an interest would not make it illegal for them to act, but would be an interest similar to that which was the subject of discussion in Reg. v. Rand (sup.). The real ground upon which the rule was attempted to be supported was the third, that of bias in fact. In considering this it was necessary to keep in view the issue which was raised on the application of Duncan and Dalgleish Limited; it was, substantially, whether a licence was necessary for the Pallion district, as no question arose on the application of the company of rival or competitive interests. It was, indeed, attempted to be alleged by the affidavits in support of the rule that the licensing meeting had decided at the meeting of the 23rd Aug. that no further licences were necessary for Pallion. The affidavits in opposition to the rule showed that this was not the case; but, on the contrary, that the applications had been considered upon their merits, and that the ground of opposition in one particular case was the proximity of the premises, to which it was proposed a licence should be granted, to a church and the residence of one of the inhabitants of Pallion. It was further suggested that no evidence was adduced before the magistrates that there was any necessity for licensed premises in Pallion. Upon the affidavits we think it is established that this suggestion is not well founded, but that the licensing committee on more than one occasion had to consider whether the circumstances of Pallion made the licensing of premises desirable or not. It was sworn by all the persons to whose action objection was taken—and we see no reason to doubt the truth of their statements—that they approached the consideration of the application with perfectly unbiased minds and gave their decision according to conviction, after hearing the evidence. The case was not without authority. A similar question was raised in the case of Reg. v. Justices of Stockport (sup.), in which the action of a gentleman named Torkington was attacked upon similar grounds; and the court there decided that such opposition was not sufficient of itself to justify them in holding that there was in fact bias. We think it right to add that we are satisfied upon the affidavits, including that of the town clerk, that the allegation which was made in the affidavit upon which the rule was granted, that there had been a promise by the members of the corporation to directly or indirectly support Duncan and Dalgleish's application, is not well founded. For the above reasons we are of opinion that the rule of certiorari must be discharged. It would not, therefore, be necessary to consider the application for the mandamus.

NOTT v. NOTT. (a)

Appeal—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895 (58 & 59 Vict. c. 39), ss. 5, 7—Order of justices—Variation—Joint income of husband and wife—Voluntary allowance.

In making an order for maintenance against a husband, under the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895, the justices making the order must take into account the means both of the husband and wife, and it is immaterial that the means of the wife simply consist of a voluntary allowance made by a relative.

THIS was an appeal by the husband, Albert Nott, from a decision of the Green-lane (Liverpool) justices refusing to reduce an order for maintenance.

The appellant, on the 29th May 1900, was found guilty of persistent cruelty to his wife, Kate Nott, under sect. 4 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act 1895, and an order was made against him for the payment of 1l. a week to her as maintenance.

At that time the husband was employed as a traveller for a firm of cattle medicine and disinfectant merchants, and was paid by commission. His earnings varied greatly, sometimes being nothing and sometimes as much as 10l. a week.

Shortly after the order of the magistrates was made the appellant was dismissed from his situation in consequence of his domestic troubles. He was afterwards employed as travelling agent for an insurance company; but his salary was only 30s. a week and commission, out of which he had to pay his own travelling expenses. He had never been able to do sufficient business to earn any commission.

The payment of 1l. a week fell into arrear, and on the 12th Nov. Nott was summoned for nonpayment and sent to prison for one month. In consequence of his imprisonment he lost his insurance agency, but was afterwards reinstated.

Another summons was taken out on the 30th Jan. 1901 in respect of further arrears, whereupon the husband applied, under sect. 7 of the Act of 1895, to the justices to reduce the order from 1l. to 10s. a week.

The justices refused the application, but adjourned the summons of the wife pending this appeal to the High Court.

It appeared that the wife had an income of 91l. a year, but the justices declined to take this into consideration, since it was a voluntary allowance, and gave as their reasons for refusing to reduce or vary the original order that the husband had not fully disclosed his income in examination-in-chief, but had concealed the fact that he had on one occasion obtained a small sum when acting as an official at a dog show. They were also of opinion that his education and natural abilities were such that he might easily obtain a good livelihood.

Barnard for the appellant.—The magistrates ought to have taken into account the voluntary allowance made to the wife. The question has been before the courts on several occasions, though generally in cases where the allowance is one made to the husband. The practice of courts of summary jurisdiction in matters of orders for maintenance is the same as that of the High Court in allowances of alimony. He cited

Clinton v. Clinton, 14 L. T. Rep. 257; L. Rep. 1 P. & D. 215;

If the order of the magistrates remained unchanged, the applicant would only have 10s. a week upon which to live and to pay his travelling expenses. The magistrates evidently acted upon trivial incidents which had no bearing upon the case.

There was no appearance on the part of the respondent.

The PRESIDENT.—I think we can deal with this case at once. It is desirable, whenever it is possible, to avoid sending cases back to the justices, and it will not be necessary to do so on the present occasion. After an order has been made by justices, under the Act of 1895, it is possible to get an alteration if the circumstances of the parties are changed. Now, what are the facts here? The husband appears to earn about 30s. a week, and the wife has a voluntary allowance of 91l. a year, therefore, after deducting that portion which she receives for house-rent, her income is about the same as that of her husband. The joint income of the parties being about 3l. a week, the wife's proportion, by the principle of this court, should be 1l. a week. But there is the question of the children to be taken into account. The question whether a voluntary allowance should be taken into account has been considered in Bonsor v. Bonsor (ubi sup.), in which I held that the whole actual income of the parties, from whatever source it came, must be taken into account. It does not appear that the justices ever considered the wife's income at all, but simply that of the husband. They ought to have considered both. Under the circumstances the order of 1l. a week is too large, and should have been reduced. The justices appear to have been influenced by considerations which were unimportant and outside the question altogether. The husband has offered to pay the sum of 10s. a week, and we are of opinion that the order should be varied to that amount.

(Before RIGBY and COLLINS, L.JJ.)

GRAHAM v. WROUGHTON. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE CHANCERY DIVISION.

Local government—Surface drain—Additional user—Nuisance from sewage—Connection with sewer—Notice—Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), s. 21.

G. was the owner of a house and grounds, and on her property and adjoining her garden was an old disused quarry, into which a covered drain had for many years conveyed surface or rain water and slops from some of the houses in the neighbouring village. Recently an inhabitant of one of these houses had discontinued the use of a cesspool and, without any notice to the local authority, discharged fecal matter from a water-closet into this drain, thereby causing an intolerable nuisance to the plaintiff.

The local authority had made no bye-laws or regulations as to the notice to be given by the owner of a house under sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875, but there was no evidence that they had dispensed with the notice.

Held (by Byrne, J.), that though the defendant had lawfully caused his drain to empty into the sewer for the purpose of carrying off surface and slop water, he was not entitled, under sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875, to add to this the fecal and other solid matter from the water-closet, and the plaintiff was entitled to an interim injunction restraining him from doing so.

Kinson Pottery Company v. Corporation of Poole (81 L. T. Rep. 24; (1899) 2 Q. B. 41) followed.

Held (by the Court of Appeal), that, even if the defendant had a right to send fecal matter into the sewer, he had not performed the preliminary conditions as to notice to the local authority and otherwise contained in sect. 21, and therefore the injunction was rightly granted.

THIS action was brought by Mrs. Graham, the owner of a house called Green Bank, at Wetheral, in Cumberland, against Dr. Wroughton, Mr. Platt, and Mr. Hendry claiming an injunction restraining the defendants from continuing to discharge solid sewage matter upon her land from houses in their occupation through a drain passing under the highway on to her land.

The drain in question had existed for many years, and was a covered drain running along one side of the high road in the village, and it emptied itself into an old disused quarry, the property of the plaintiff and adjoining her garden.

This drain had been used solely for conveying surface or rain water and slops from some of the houses in the village adjoining the high road; but lately some of the inhabitants whose houses adjoined the road, including the three defendants, had discontinued the use of cesspools, which was the system of drainage prevailing in the village, and built water-closets, which they connected with a communication they already respectively had with the drain and discharged the fecal matter into this drain, and so caused an intolerable nuisance to the plaintiff from the smell arising from the old quarry.

The plaintiff moved for an interlocutory injunction, and the application was heard on the 3rd May.

Levett, K.C. and Lushington for the plaintiff.

Norton, K.C. and Alexander Glen; Maughan and Stokes for the defendants.

BYRNE, J. referred to the facts, and continued:—This old drain was, until about the year 1886, a horseshoe-shaped drain obviously intended and meant for carrying off surface water, and not intended for carrying off fecal matter and things of that kind. The mere carrying off of surface water and other matters that were allowed to go in, caused in itself a nuisance; and at the present time it is admitted that the matter which passes into the quarry is of such a nature as to create an intolerable nuisance. This is not an information brought by the Attorney-General, and I have nothing to do with the question of public nuisance; but what this lady complains of is the use the defendants have recently made of this drain, which was, and was intended to be, used in its origin only for surface water and which has for some years past been used for the purpose of carrying off liquid slop water and other matters of that kind, including what passes from lavatories and kitchen sinks and other sinks, that pass down this drain. With reference to one of the defendants, Mr. Hendry, there are questions of fact to be determined, and it is undoubted that for some years past he has had a communication with this drain, which in the year 1886 was made into a covered 6in. drain. He has had a connection from a water-closet to it, and on an interlocutory motion I could not grant an interlocutory injunction against him to restrain him from doing what he has been doing for so many years. There will be questions of fact on the trial which may or may not result in an injunction being granted against him also. But the question is whether I ought to grant an injunction against the other two defendants, connections between whose water-closets and the drain have been made within the last few months. The parties are anxious that I should determine this point on the interlocutory motion, because possibly it may save them time, trouble, and expense hereafter. Now, the matter stands in this way: When Dr. Wroughton became tenant of his house, which he holds on a yearly tenancy, it contained bath, lavatory, sink, and an outside privy, with no water-closet, and consequently whatever did pass into the drain was only liquid matter, liquid matter of a more or less offensive kind, but nothing in the shape of refuse from a water-closet passed into it. And the circumstances as to the other defendant, Mr. Platt, are similar. Now, it is endeavoured to justify the discharge of solid sewage matter into this drain by sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875, which provides that "The owner or occupier of any premises within the district of a local authority shall be entitled to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of that authority on condition of his giving such notice as may be required by that authority of his intention so to do, and of complying with the regulations of that authority in respect of the mode in which the communications between such drains and sewers are to be made, and subject to the control of any person who may be appointed by that authority to superintend the making of such communications. Any person causing a drain to empty into a sewer of a local authority without complying with the provisions of the section shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding 20l., and then power is given to the local authority to close the communication between the drain and sewer. Now, I will assume that the original connection with the drain from those houses was lawfully made for the purposes of carrying off such liquid matter as was carried down the drain prior to the date of the erection of the water-closets. Then, further, the drain in question is, within the definition of the Public Health Act 1875, undoubtedly a sewer. It is said, first, that no connection has been made between the drains and the sewer by what has been done in reference to these water-closets, because it has been merely a question of making a small drain pass into the old drain which carried the liquid matter into the sewer. I cannot accept that. It appears to me that it is none the less causing the drains to empty into the sewer because you join your new drain to an old drain which already empties into the sewer. Passing that by, I think that the question that really arises in the present case is this: Are private owners, who have lawfully (and I must take it for the present purpose that they have lawfully) caused their drains to empty into this sewer for the purposes for which it was used prior to the erection of those water-closets, justified now for the first time in causing these drains to carry off faecal solid matter coming from the water-closets? Really it resolves itself into a question of whether, if a sewer is used for the purpose of carrying off any kind of sewage, that necessarily involves a right to use that sewer for the purpose of carrying off all other kinds of sewage. Now, the argument which has been extremely well and forcibly urged on me by counsel for the defendants is that there is no authority which shows that, where a sewer has been used for one kind of sewage, the persons entitled so to use that sewer may not pour sewage of any description into the same drain. I do not know whether they would limit it so as to say that if it were drainage from houses they might do so. I do not know, nor is it perhaps material to consider, because all they contend for, for the present purpose, is that, if they have a right to allow any portion of household drainage to go into the sewer, they are entitled, in addition, to send into that sewer (with notice to the local authority and with their permission) household sewage of any description. A case has been recently before the Divisional Court of Kinson Pottery Company Limited v. Corporation of Poole (81 L. T. Rep. 24; (1899) 2 Q. B. 41). In that case the appellants, the Kinson Pottery Company, were summoned by the sanitary authority of a borough for non-compliance with a notice to abate a nuisance caused by turning slop and scullery water from twelve houses, owned by the appellants, into a drain constructed beside a highway to receive the surface water of the highway which emptied into an open ditch. According to the plan deposited with the sanitary authority when the houses were built by the appellants' predecessor in title, the houses should have been drained into cesspools, but cesspools to receive slop and scullery water had not been constructed. No sewer had been constructed by the sanitary authority, by means of which the houses could be drained. The houses were separately occupied, and were not within the same curtilage. The justices made an order to abate the nuisance, by disconnecting the drains of the houses from the surface-water drain and making cesspools for the houses. On a case stated, it was held that the sanitary authority were not bound under the Public Health Act 1875, s. 15, to provide a sewer to drain the appellants' houses; that the surface-water drain, though for some purposes "a sewer" within the meaning of sect. 4, was not a sewer into which the appellants were entitled to empty their drains; that the nuisance was caused by the want of a structural convenience within the meaning of sect. 94; and therefore the defendants, as owners, were liable. Now, there, what had been allowed to pass into the drain was surface water, and in the present case more than surface water—namely, liquid refuse from the houses—has been allowed to pass into the drain; but, with that exception, the reasoning of the learned judges seems to form a complete guide in the present case. The justices were of opinion that the drain in question, being constructed by the respondents for the sole purpose of receiving the surface water from the highway, could not lawfully be used by the appellants to carry off scullery and slop water from their houses, and that the appellants had created the nuisance in the open ditch into which the surface-water drain discharged. It also appeared that the respondents, as the highway authority for the borough, had previously to 1892 laid down, at the side of the highway upon which the appellants' houses abutted, a drain for a distance of 123 yards or thereabouts, for the purpose only of receiving the surface water from the highway, which surface water was by means of the drain conveyed to and emptied into an open ditch by the side of another highway, about 49 yards distant from the appellants' houses. Darling, J. said: "I agree that for certain purposes the surface-water drain was a sewer, but it is contended that therefore the appellants have a right to turn into it any refuse they please, and then it is for those who own the sewer to deal with the state of things so caused. In my opinion that is not the law. Sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875 entitles an owner to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of a local authority on giving notice, and complying with the local authority's regulations; but that does not entitle an owner to empty all kinds of filth into a small roadside drain and leave the local authority to deal with it as best they can, and, moreover, here no notice was shown to have been given. To hold otherwise would lead to an absurd result; and, whether notice had been given or not, I do not think that the appellants had a right, under the general law, independently of the permission referred to in the case, to turn into the surface-water drain even rain water, and still less had they a right to turn into it slop and scullery water, as to which no permission had been given." Channell, J. said: "It is contended that this surface-water drain was a sewer, and I think it was for some purposes. It was intended to carry off mere surface water, yet it was a 'sewer' within the words of the definition contained in sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875. But to entitle the appellants to succeed it would be necessary to go further and show that it was a sewer which the appellants had a right to use as they did. If they had any such right, it could only be by sect. 21, which requires notice to be given. I do not wish to say, if notice had been given in pursuance of that section, there would have been a right to empty the sloop and scullery water into this surface-water drain, for I agree that it is unnecessary to decide that question; but here no notice was given. I think the appellants cannot lawfully empty sewage into a mere water sewer." In the present case there was a drain which, when it came into the control of the present authority, had been used for a surface-water drain, and had either before or after it came under their authority been allowed by them, either expressly or tacitly, to be used for carrying off other liquid and deleterious matter, some of which, at all events, might come within the general name of sewage, though it was not sewage within the meaning applied to it in ordinary parlance; but nothing more had been allowed, so far as the evidence before me goes, and no notice was given under sect. 21 of an intention to cause the drain to empty this other matter into the sewer. The case then resolves itself into this: If a public authority, being the owner of a sewer, has allowed that to be used for certain specific purposes, one of those purposes being the carrying off of liquid drainage matter, does that justify its use for those other matters to which I have referred? I think in principle the case of Kinson Pottery Company Limited v. Corporation of Poole (ubi sup.) really is a governing authority in the present case, and I think it would be drawing too refined a distinction (which I am not justified in doing) if I were to say it was not such a governing authority. I think, therefore, that, as against two of the defendants, the plaintiff is entitled now to the injunction which she asks. Of course I shall allow a reasonable time for putting matters in order.

GRAHAM v. WROUGHTON.

[CT. OF APP.]

From this decision Dr. Wroughton appealed.

Alexander Glen and Maughan for the appellant.—It is admitted that the appellant lawfully used this drain for the purpose of carrying away the surface and sloop water for many years. He therefore had the right to use it for carrying away faecal matter, and, if a nuisance is caused, it is the duty of the local authority to take such steps with regard to the place where it is discharged as will prevent the nuisance. The appellant incurs no liability in that respect. There is no authority to the contrary. This sewer vested in the local authority under sect. 13 of the Public Health Act 1875 as it is not within the exceptions. The appellant therefore lost all right to interfere with the sewer:

Ferrand v. Hallas Land and Building Company, 69 L. T. Rep. 8; (1893) 2 Q. B. 135, 140;

There is nothing in the Act which enables the plaintiff to say that sect. 21 applies only to any particular class of sewage or refuse. The respective responsibility with respect to drains and sewers of householders and local authorities is discussed in Kirkheaton Local Board v. Beaumont, 52 J. P. 68;

Wheatcroft v. Local Board of Matlock, 52 L. T.

Rep. 356;

Falconar v. Corporation of South Shields, 11 Times

L. Rep. 223.

A water drain may be used as a sewer unless it comes within sect. 13:

343; (1898) 1 Ch. 561;

Sykes v. Sowerby Urban District Council, 82 L. T.

Rep. 177; (1900) 1 Q. B. 584.

The local authority had power to make a new drain if this was not adapted for this purpose: (Public Health Act 1875, s. 24). Neither of these cases was cited in Kinson Pottery Company v. Corporation of Poole (81 L. T. Rep. 84; (1899) 2 Q. B. 41), which was relied on in the court below. In that case plans had been deposited with the local authority showing that the houses would be drained into cesspools, but in fact they were drained into a drain intended to receive surface water only. But the decision is inconsistent with the other authorities, and is also quite a different case from this one. Sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875 gives the plaintiff an absolute right to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of the local authority:

Eastwood Brothers Limited v. Honley Urban District Council, 84 L. T. Rep. 169; (1901) 1 Ch. 645.

The section provides that such notice as may be required by the local authority must be given, and that their regulations must be complied with. But no regulations have been made by this local authority, nor any rule as to the notice they require. Therefore no notice was necessary. A third party has no right to raise the objection that proper notice was not given to the local authority. The remedy of the plaintiff is to complain of the nuisance to the local authority under sect. 93 of the Public Health Act 1875, who must cause it to be abated (sect. 94), and, if the local authority does not do its duty, complaint must be made to the Local Government Board under sect. 299 of the Act. This action therefore cannot be maintained. Besides, the condition as to notice does not apply here. The appellant made no new communication between the drains and sewers. The putting up of the water-closet and its connection with his existing drain was not connecting the drain with the sewer; it had been connected long before, and, when a drain is once made, anything may be sent into it which its size allows:

Metropolitan Board of Works v. London and North-Western Railway Company, 44 L. T. Rep. 270; 17 Ch. Div. 246, 249.

They also referred to

[OT. OF APP.]

GRAHAM v. WROUGHTON.

[OT. OF APP.]

Levett, K.C. and S. Lushington for the plaintiff.—This is not a drain within sect. 21. The onus is on the appellant to show why he should be allowed to increase a nuisance on the plaintiff's land. He has no statutory right under sect. 21 to commit such a nuisance. It is not necessary that any formal rule as to giving notice to the local authority should exist. If there is no such rule, the common law applies, and reasonable notice must be given. If notice had been given here, the local authority could, and probably would, have refused to allow the connection with the water-closet. The word "sewer" has an extended meaning, but the authorities show that there is a distinction in the Act between surface-water drains and sewers. This is supported by the judgment of Channell, J. in Kinson Pottery Company v. Corporation of Poole (ubi sup.). If the defendant has any statutory right to increase the nuisance on the plaintiff's land, he has not given the necessary notice.

Glen in reply.

RIGBY, L.J.—I think this appeal must fail. I think that the order made is quite right, and that no grounds have been shown upon which we can set aside the judgment.

COLLINS, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The argument in this case has travelled over a wide area upon the question of sewers and drains under the Public Health Act, but I think that, when we come to the narrow point which has actually to be decided, it will not be necessary to deal in any detail with the cases referred to. The point arises shortly in this way: In the village of Wetheral, to which this case relates, there is, for anything that appears to the contrary, an adequate system of sewage so far as faecal matter is concerned. It seems that the practice was to deal with that matter by privies and cesspools, though in one case there was a private water-closet; but, for anything that appears to the contrary, the general scheme which now exists there is perfectly adequate. There is also running along the highway a drain which, it is admitted—or, at all events, it is not denied, and the evidence is in favour of it—was originally simply a highway drain and belonging as such to the highway authority, which was not the local authority now in question. That drain was subsequently, as far back as 1886, improved at the expense of the vestry, then the highway authority, and persons occupying houses along that highway had, no doubt, with possibly the tacit assent of the highway authority, connected their houses with it for the purpose of sending down slops and that class of water. That state of things continued until the present local authority came into existence and took over the control of the highway in 1894; and so things went on until 1900, when the appellant in this case, without any notice whatever to the local authority, made a water-closet and connected it with a communication which he already had with the highway drain, and which had been used for passing soap-suds and that class of liquid down the drain. He now contends that he is justified in doing what he did by virtue of the Public Health Act 1875. But the matter which he sends from his water-closet passes directly through the channel I have described into a disused quarry which is part of the plaintiff's premises, and immediately adjoins her garden and bowling-green. The effect of that is to create, as the learned judge says, an intolerable nuisance. It is true that the plaintiff had to submit to an inconvenience which may have amounted to a nuisance from the accumulation of soap-suds and that class of liquid in the quarry, but what the appellant has done is to make that a nuisance of a very aggravated character—namely, by the passing down of faecal matter from his water-closet directly into the quarry at the bottom of the garden. Supposing he had done that without the communication with the drain of the local authority, no one would question that he had committed a tort for which an action at the suit of the owner of the garden would lie against him. But he says: "I do not deny for a moment that a nuisance in which I have taken a part is created on the land of the plaintiff, but I am entirely discharged from any personal liability in respect of the matter inasmuch as the channel by which I have conveyed that nuisance on to the land of the plaintiff partly consists of this highway drain which I say is a sewer of the highway authority." In order to get the immunity that he claims under the Act of Parliament, he must at least show that he has conformed to the conditions of the Act of Parliament. He claims to have done so, and says that he comes within sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875. That section provides: "The owner or occupier of any premises within the district of a local authority shall be entitled to cause his drains to empty into the sewers of that authority on condition of his giving such notice as may be required by that authority of his intention so to do, and of complying with the regulations of that authority in respect of the mode in which the communications between such drains and sewers are to be made, and subject to the control of any person who may be appointed by that authority to superintend the making of such communications." He says: "True it is I did not consult this local authority upon the matter at all. I knew, or might have known because it was in evidence, that in that small community other persons had tried to make these communications and assent had been refused. I did not ask them. I had no reason to suppose that they would assent to it. The statute obliges me to give them notice. I did not do it, and yet I claim immunity under the statute for creating an intolerable nuisance on the land of the plaintiff." That seems a strong order, and, in order to bring himself within the section, he has first of all to show that the channel into which he has sent this faecal matter is a sewer of the local authority. The contention on behalf of the appellant goes to this whole extent, that if a highway drain had been made simply for the purpose of collecting rain water to be used for drinking purposes afterwards, and although there was an efficient system for dealing with faecal matter in the neighbourhood, that the appellant might nevertheless pass his faecal matter down into this channel which existed for the purpose of collecting, and it may be distributing, rain water for drinking purposes. That seems an extravagant construction of the statute, and one which I should shrink from unless driven to it by the absolute wording of the section. Although there may be drains which come within the definition of a sewer under the Act, I think that it was not this class of sewer to which the provisions of the Public Health Act 1875 apply, enabling any person to pass the faecal matter of his household into it. I do not think it is necessary to decide that as a matter of law in this case; and I should certainly be very reluctant to throw any doubt upon the views taken by the learned judges on this question, because that does not arise in this case for this reason, that, even if this were a sewer into which the appellant had a right under the conditions of the statute to pass faecal matter, he has not performed those conditions, and therefore it seems to me that he has no defence to this action. On those grounds I think that the appeal should be dismissed with costs.

HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE.

KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Thursday, April 18, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. and LAWRENCE, J.)

PROPERTY EXCHANGE (No. 1) LIMITED (apps.)
v. WANDSWORTH BOARD OF WORKS (resps.) (a)

Metropolis—New street—Paving expenses—Apportionment of—Strip of land added to old highway—Cost of paving added part—Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120), s. 105—Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102), ss. 77, 112.

An old public highway of 16ft. in width, which, prior to and since 1855 had existed as a formed road, with some houses on the south side thereof, and had been repaired by the district board of works, was widened in 1898 by the addition thereto on the north side of a strip of land of 24ft. in width, thereby making the width of the whole road 40ft., and there were buildings on both sides of the roadway. The board resolved to pave the road as a "new street" under the Metropolis Management Acts, and they apportioned the expenses of paving the added part amongst the owners of houses and lands on the north side only, exempting the owners on the south side.

Held, that the added part of 24ft. was the "new street" within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts, and that the expenses of paving the added part were properly apportioned on the owners on the north side only, as the houses and lands on the south side of the roadway abutted on the old highway, and not on the "new street."

Richards v. Kessick (59 L. T. Rep. 318) and White v. Fulham Vestry (74 L. T. Rep. 425) followed.

CASE stated by Mr. John Rose, metropolitan police magistrate, sitting at the South-Western Police-court, after the determination by him of a complaint against the Property Exchange (No. 1) Limited (the appellants) made by the Board of Works for the Wandsworth District (the respondents).

On the 11th July 1900 a summons to appear at the police-court was issued at the instance of the respondents (therein named the plaintiffs) to the appellants (therein named the defendants) for the appellants to answer a claim by the respondents, the particulars of which annexed to the summons were as follows:

69l. 11s. 3d., being the sum apportioned by the plaintiffs on the 31st day of January 1900, in respect of certain premises of which you are the owners or occupiers, and being the proportion payable in respect of such premises towards the expense of paving a new street called Totterdown (on the north side thereof), Tooting.

At the hearing of the summons on the 8th Aug. 1900 the facts of the case were stated and agreed on by the parties as follows, and were taken as evidence:

The street or roadway known as Totterdown has at present buildings erected on both sides.

The row of houses on the south side, belonging to a Mr. Melhuish, were erected before the year 1855, and probably as far back as 1825.

The houses or walks on the north side consisted of the following premises, namely: (a) the flank and flanking fence of the company's premises known as 29, St. Cyprian-street; (b) the flank and flanking fence of premises known as 28, St. Cyprian-street; (c) a yard and premises belonging to the London General Omnibus Company, opening into Totterdown; (d) a passage entrance to rear of houses in High-street; and (e) the flank and flanking wall of premises in High-street, in the occupation of Mr. Greig, with side entrance opening on to Totterdown.

The company's house and premises are known as 29, St. Cyprian-street, and were purchased by the company in the year 1899, and erected in or about the year 1898.

There were no windows or apertures on the Totterdown side of the main building of the company's house, but there were three windows and a fanlight in St. Cyprian-street, and at present all ingress and egress thereto was from St. Cyprian-street, and the premises were continuous with other houses situate in St. Cyprian-street.

In and for many years prior to 1855 Totterdown-road was a formed road used for wheeled and foot traffic from the entrance from the High-street, and it was then well known as "Totterdown," opening at High-street at one end and used for every description of traffic, and at the other end leading into meadows open daily for foot passengers.

Totterdown was a public thoroughfare known only by the name of "Totterdown," and had been repaired when required by the board since 1855.

In or about the year 1898 Totterdown-road was widened from the width of 16ft. to the width of 40ft., and a new street known as St. Cyprian-street was at the same time made running into Totterdown; but save and except this widening and the building of certain houses and flanking on the north side thereof, Totterdown, as above described, had not altered in character or position or in any other way since the houses on the south side were erected; the neighbourhood has, however, become more thickly populated.

In or about the year 1898 the lands on the north side of Totterdown were laid out for building purposes, and a new street, known as St. Cyprian-street, running nearly at right angles into Totterdown, was made.

The company have paid their due proportion of the expenses for paving St. Cyprian-street.

That portion of Totterdown now proposed to be adopted by the board, being of the width of 24ft. or thereabouts, is bounded on the north by the land and messuages as above described and shown on a plan attached to the case; and on the south by a space of 16ft., being the old highway known for many years prior to 1855 (and still known) as Totterdown.

The amount of 36l. 5s. 6d. was claimed by the board from the company, in accordance with their notice of the 7th Oct. 1899, as being the proper proportion of the rate payable by them, and in calculating such amount the board took into consideration that a due proportion would be paid by the owners of the houses on the south side of Totterdown.

In Dec. 1899 a summons was taken out by the board against a Mr. Melhuish, an owner of one of the houses on the south side of Totterdown, to recover the sum of 19l. 1s. payable by him under the apportionment made as previously mentioned, and such summons was heard by the same metropolitan magistrate in the South-Western Police-court, and the summons was dismissed on the ground that Totterdown as to so much thereof as formed the site of the old street before the recent widening took place, was not a new street within the meaning of the Metropolis Management Acts.

On the 14th Feb. 1900 the company received notice from the clerk of the board demanding the sum of 69l. 11s. 3d., being in respect of a new apportionment made in consequence of the decision of the magistrate in the summons against Mr. Melhuish last mentioned, which in effect exempted the owners of the houses (three) on the south side of Totterdown from the expenses of paving the space on the north side of the old site.

The sum of 12l. 1s. 10d. was in fact paid by the company to the board on account of the expenses charged under the notice of the 7th Oct. 1899, and a cheque for this amount had been drawn in favour of the company and a form of receipt submitted to the company, but the company have not yet taken up the cheque, and it was still retained by the board, though the board had offered to repay the above sum of 12l. 1s. 10d.

The works referred to in the notice had not yet been commenced.

Counsel for the company contended: First, that, upon the true construction of sect. 105 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855 and sects. 77 and 112 of the Metropolis Management Act 1862, the portion of Totterdown now proposed to be adopted by the board—that is, the northern portion of 24ft. or thereabouts—was not a new street within the meaning of the Acts or either of them; that the resolution of the board of the 31st Jan. 1900 apportioning the estimated expenses of paving such alleged new street was invalid and not binding on the company so as to fix the liability for contributing for the same at the sum of 69l. 11s. 3d. or any part thereof, on the ground that the road or street now known as Totterdown or any part thereof is not a new street within the meaning of the above-mentioned Acts, and having regard to the magistrate's decision respecting the southern portion of Totterdown above mentioned. Secondly, that the resolution of the board fixing a new apportionment after the magistrate's decision in the case relating to the southern part of Totterdown was invalid on the ground that the company had paid or offered to pay the sum of 36l. 5s. 6d. demanded under the first apportionment, and that the board were not enabled under their powers to make a fresh apportionment annulling the first apportionment and in substitution thereof. Thirdly, that the apportionment was invalid inasmuch as it was not within the power of the board whilst treating Totterdown in its entirety as it existed at present to make an apportionment for the pavement of it longitudinally; that, if Totterdown was to be regarded in its entirety for the purpose of judging whether it was or was not a new street, the owners of the houses on both sides (which would include the owners of houses on the south side) ought to bear their due proportion of the expense. Fourthly, that the decisions in the cases of Richards v. Kessick (59 L. T. Rep. 318) and White v. Fulham Vestry (74 L. T. Rep. 425) did not apply, and, in so far as any principle or doctrine covering the present case may in terms appear therein, that such principle or doctrine ought not to be applied in the circumstances appearing in this case.

In support of the above contention and submissions of law, the following cases were cited before the magistrate: Robinson v. Local Board for Barton (47 L. T. Rep. 286; 21 Ch. Div. 621, at p. 633; Whitechurch v. Fulham Board of Works (13 L. T. Rep. 631, at p. 633; L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 233, at p. 240; Vestry of Mile End v. Whitechapel Union, 34 L. T. Rep. 178; 1 Q. B. Div. 680; Great Clacton Local Board v. Young and Sons (71 L. T. Rep. 877; (1895) 1 Q. B. 395); Vestry of Paddington v. North Metropolitan Railway and Canal Company (1894) 1 Q. B. 633; Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. Crystal Palace Company (66 L. T. Rep. 840, at p. 842; (1892) 2 Q. B. 33, at p. 40); St. George's Local Board v. Ballard (72 L. T. Rep. 345; (1895) 1 Q. B. 702).

Counsel for the company therefore submitted that the summons should be dismissed with costs.

On the 25th Aug. 1900 the magistrate gave his decision as follows, his decision being annexed to the case:

Totterdown is in appearance a side street leading out of High-street, Upper Tooting. On the south side, the roadway to the width of 16ft. is an old public highway which before and since 1855 has been repaired by the board of works, and fronting it on the south side is a row of seventeen cottages built about seventy-five years ago. On the north side, a new roadway 24ft. in width was in 1898 added to the old highway, and some buildings were then erected. In 1899 the board of works resolved to pave Totterdown as a new street under sect. 105 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855, and took proceedings in this court to recover the expenses of paving from owners of the cottages on the south side. After argument and a view of the place, I decided that the southern side of Totterdown—namely, the old highway and old cottages—formed an old street, and that therefore the southern side of Totterdown could not be treated as a

"new street" under the Act, and that the resolution, order, and apportionment were invalid. The board of works have since made another order and apportionment under sect. 105 for the paving of the new roadway on the north side of Totterdown as a "new street," and are proceeding to recover the expenses from the owners of the houses and land on the north side of the new roadway. The learned counsel for the defendants argued that Totterdown must be regarded altogether—namely, as a street 40ft. wide with houses on both sides—and that the expenses of paving should be charged on the owners on both sides. The question is whether the modern addition to the old highway can be treated separately as a "new street" within sect. 105 of the Metropolis Management Act 1855. Houses are necessary to form a street within the Act, as the section itself shows. "Houses built on one side will do": (see Richards v. Kessick, 52 J. P. 756, per Willa, J.). "There must be a sufficient number of houses or buildings to constitute a street according to the ordinary sense of mankind," said Lord Esher, adding, "how many more than one there must be I will not undertake to say. If there were only two, half a mile from each other, I should say it would not suffice. The whole thing must be looked at, the number and character of the buildings and their position": (Vestry of St. Giles, Camberwell v. Crystal Palace Company (1892) 2 Q. B. at p. 40). Whether there is a sufficient number of houses to make a new street for the purposes of the Act is a question of fact for the magistrate, per Wright, J. in Vestry of St. Mary, Battersea v. Palmer (75 L. T. Rep. 362, at p. 365; (1897) 1 Q. B. 220, at p. 225), and see Allen v. Fulham Vestry (80 L. T. Rep. 253; (1899) 1 Q. B. 681). I can therefore treat a roadway with houses on one side only as a street. I have already done so with respect to the south side of Totterdown, and decided that, although a street, it was not a "new street." Now as to the north side, the buildings and roadway are "new," but are the numbers, character, and position of the buildings on that side such as to form a "new street" in the ordinary, popular, and natural sense of the words? The houses are few in number, they are not contiguous, and they do not front the roadway in question, but the road is short, the houses are near to each other, and in my opinion they form a "new street" in the ordinary, popular, and natural sense of the words, the resolution, order, and apportionment are valid, and therefore the defendants are liable under it, and I make an order directing the appellants to pay the amount claimed by the respondents.

The question for the decision of the court was whether the decision of the magistrate was right; if so, his order was to stand.

The Metropolis Management Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. 120) provides:

Sect. 105. In case the owners of the houses forming the greater part of any new street laid out or made, or hereafter to be laid out or made, which is not paved to the satisfaction of the vestry or district board of the parish or district in which such street is situate, be desirous of having the same paved, as hereinafter mentioned, or if such vestry or board deem it necessary or expedient that the same should be so paved, then and in either of such cases such vestry or board shall wall and sufficiently pave the same, either throughout the whole breadth of the carriage-way and footpaths thereof, or any part of such breadth, and from time to time keep such pavement in good and sufficient repair; and the owners of the houses forming such street shall on demand pay to such vestry or board the amount of the estimated expenses of providing and laying such pavement, such amount to be determined by the surveyor for the time being of the vestry or board; and in case such estimated expenses exceed the actual expenses of such paving, then the difference between such estimated expenses and such actual expenses shall be repaid by the said vestry or board to the owners of houses by whom the said sum of money has been paid; and in case the said estimated expenses be less than the actual expenses of such paving, then the owners of the said houses shall, on demand, pay to the said vestry or board such further sum of money as, together with the sum already paid, amounts to such actual expenses.

Sect. 250. In the construction of this Act . . . the word "street" shall apply to and include any highway (except the carriage-way of any turnpike road), and any road, bridge (not being a county bridge), lane, footway, square, court, alley, passage, whether a thoroughfare or not, and a part of any such highway, road, bridge, lane, footway, square, court, alley, or passage.

The Metropolis Management Amendment Act 1862 (25 & 26 Vict. c. 102) provides:

Sect. 77. Where any vestry or district board shall, under the powers given by the 105th section of the firstly-recited Act, have paved or be about to pave any new street, the owners of the land bounding or abutting on such street shall be liable to contribute to the expenses or estimated expenses of paving the same, as well as the owners of houses therein, provided that it shall be lawful for the vestry or district board to charge the owners of land in a less proportion than the owners of house property, should they deem it just and expedient so to do; and any such costs or expenses, including the costs of paving at the points of intersection of streets, and all other incidental costs and charges shall be apportioned by the vestry or board, and shall be recoverable either before the work shall be commenced or during its progress or after its completion, &c.

Sect. 112. In the construction of the recited Acts and this Act . . . the word "street" shall be deemed to apply to and include the subject-matters specified in the 250th section of the firstly-recited Act, and also any mews and a part thereof; the expression "new street" shall apply to and include all streets hereafter to be formed or laid out, and a part of any such street, and also all streets the maintenance of the paving and roadway whereof had not, previously to the passing of this Act, been taken into charge and assumed by the commissioners, trustees, surveyors, or other authorities having control of the pavements or highways in the parish or place in which such streets are situate, and a part of any such street, and also all streets partly formed or laid out; the word "pave" shall apply to and include the formation of the roadway or footway of any street.

W. L. Richards for the appellants.—The question is whether the magistrate was right in holding that this modern addition to an old street could be treated separately and held to be a "new street" within the Acts. First, having regard to the decision of the magistrate that the 16ft. of Totterdown is an old street, it must be held that the whole street should be treated as one, and that the whole street—the modern addition included—is an old street. Secondly, if the widened or added part of 24ft. should be treated as a new street, then the frontagers on both sides should pay their share of the expenses as to the new portion. Thirdly, on the materials before the magistrate there was no evidence to justify him in finding that Totterdown, in so far as it consisted of the new portion, was a new street, and we contend that it was not a new street within the meaning of the Acts. Fourthly, the second apportionment was invalid because the first one was never rescinded, and was acted on by the payment of money under it. In Vestry of Mile End v. Guardians of Whitechapel Union (34 L. T. Rep. 178; 1 Q. B. Div. 680), where a new street was directed by the vestry to be paved over half its breadth only, and the vestry had apportioned the cost on the frontagers on that side only, it was held that the apportionment was wrong, and that the frontagers on both sides ought to have been charged. The spirit of the Act is that both sides which take a benefit should at some time or other pay. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In that case the whole street was a “new street”; here there is a part old and a part new. If the whole be found to be a new street and the vestry have paved part, then there must be apportionment on both sides.] In Vestry of Paddington v. North Metropolitan Railway and Canal Company (1894) 1 Q. B. 633 it was held that the expenses of flagging a footway on one side of a road or street should be borne by the owners on both sides of the street. So, in Great Clacton Local Board v. Young and Sons (71 L. T. Rep. 877; (1895) 1 Q. B. 395), the expenses of paving a footpath on one side were held to be properly apportionable on the owners on both sides of the street, and the case shows that you cannot divide a road longitudinally. Coming to the sections of the Act, sect. 105 speaks of the paving throughout the whole breadth of the carriage-way, “or any part of such breadth,” so that the section contemplates that the whole street or any part of the street may be paved, and that the owners on both sides should pay; and sect. 112 of the Act of 1862 speaks of “a part of any such street.” The cases cited against the appellants are Richards v. Kessick (59 L. T. Rep. 318); White v. Fulham Vestry (74 L. T. Rep. 425), and Vestry of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell v. Edmondson and Son (83 L. T. Rep. 501; (1901) 1 Q. B. 264). Richards v. Kessick (ubi sup.) was under a different Act—namely, the Public Health Act 1875—and the definition of “street” in sect. 4 of that Act is very different from the definition of “new street” in these Acts. White v. Fulham Vestry (ubi sup.) is distinguishable on this ground that in that case the whole road was new since 1855. The frontagers on one side had paid their share in 1870, and it was only fair that the frontagers on the other side should pay in 1894. In the present case the 16ft. of this road is and always has been an old street. This road should have been dealt with as a whole. When the added part was thrown into the old highway, then the whole became one street, and the magistrate ought to have so looked at it:

Vestry of St. James and St. John, Clerkenwell v. Edmondson and Son (ubi sup.).

Paving is done for the benefit of owners on both sides of the street, and therefore, as the frontagers on both sides get the benefit of the paving, they ought both to be made to pay; and the south side of this road being an old highway, was not paved under the Act of 1855. Lastly, the resolution for the first apportionment having been acted upon could not be rescinded, and therefore the second apportionment was invalid:

Bishop v. Wandsworth Board of Works, 82 L. T. Rep. 766.

[Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. referred to the case of Cook v. Ipswich Local Board (24 L. T. Rep. 579; L. Rep. 6 Q. B. 451).] He also referred to sect. 98 of the Act of 1862, which has been repealed by the London Building Act 1894.

Mattinson, K.C. (J. C. Earle with him) for the respondents.—We do not dispute that if the whole roadway were a “new street” within the meaning of these Acts, and if a part only of this new street were paved, the expenses would properly be apportioned on the frontagers on both sides of the street. The case of Vestry of Mile End v. Guardians of Whitechapel Union (ubi sup.) would seem to be an authority for that proposition. That is in no way disputed, but the question here is, when did this become a new street and what is the new street? Is it the 24ft. which was added, or is it the whole 40ft. of the roadway? What was the position in the year 1897, the year before this 24ft. was added to the road? In 1897, as the magistrate has found, this road was, and had been for many years, a formed road for all kinds of traffic, and this old part was not a new street within the meaning of the Acts, but was, in fact, an old highway. The owners of the land on one side of this old highway added to the highway this strip of land, which is made into a street, and therefore the added part, and not the whole roadway, is the “new street” for these purposes. For the appellants to succeed in their contention it would be necessary for them to show that there cannot be a new street contiguous to an old highway; but there is no authority for that proposition. Richards v. Kessick (ubi sup.), is precisely the same case as this, and the principle there laid down absolutely covers this case. It is no answer to that case to say that it was under a different Act, as the definition of “new street” in sect. 112 of the Metropolitan Management Act 1862 imports the definition of “street,” and the definition of “street” in the Public Health Act 1875 is exactly the same. That case shows that if you have a strip of land added to an existing highway and houses are erected on the side of the strip of land, then the added part becomes the “street.” [LAWRENCE, J. referred to Evans v. Newport Urban Sanitary Authority (61 L. T. Rep. 684; 24 Q. B. Div. 264).] White v. Fulham Vestry (ubi sup.), goes a step further, and the very point to be decided here was decided there. That case clearly shows that the “new street” here was the added part, and that in such cases you must separate the old part from the added or new part. The decision of the learned magistrate was therefore right in limiting the liability to contribute to the paving of the added part to the frontagers on the north side. He referred to sect. 6 and the following sections of the London Building Act 1894, which deal with the formation and widening of streets.

W. L. Richards in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In this case I do not at all go back from the opinion which I formed and expressed in the case of Clerkenwell Vestry v. Edmondson and Son (ubi sup.) that a good deal may be said for the view that where streets are altered and practically new streets are made out of old highways it might not be unreasonable to treat them for all purposes as new streets, and to treat the property on either side as property abutting on the new street, and the owners of such property liable for the expenses. But, in my opinion, at any rate in this court, the decisions to which we have been referred are too strong for us to take any such view. It appears that there was an old highway called Totterdown, an old street 16ft. wide, repairable by the inhabitants at large before the year 1855. To that old highway persons on one side have added 24ft. and made the width of the whole 40ft. Under those circumstances the board attempted to apportion the expenses connected with paving that added part on the frontagers on both sides, and, the magistrate having decided that to be wrong, the board are now charging upon the frontagers of the north side the proper cost of repairing the new street—if I may so call it without begging the question—on the north side. We are clearly of opinion that there is nothing in the point urged for the appellants that, because some money had been paid under the apportionment held to be bad, these subsequent proceedings cannot be taken. We think that does not prevent subsequent proceedings being taken to set the matter right and to reapportion the expenses. It appears from the case that the money was at the disposal of the appellants, who naturally did not desire to take it while this question was open. Therefore the only question for our consideration is whether or not the appellants can contend that the apportionment ought to be made upon the frontagers on both sides of the street; or, to state the question a little differently, ought the frontagers on the south side of the street, who had next to them the 16ft. of the old highway, be made to contribute to the expenses connected with the 24ft. of the street on the north side? It is not disputed that if persons are fronting a new street, then, although the paving may only be done in part of it, both sets of frontagers are liable to pay. That was decided in the case of Vestry of Mile End v. Guardians of Whitechapel Union (ubi sup.), and that proposition counsel for the respondents in no way disputes. What he says is that where there is in fact an old highway and where there is added to that old highway by the act of the frontagers on one side of it a strip of land which is made into a street, then the added part, and not the whole, is a new street. I think both the authorities to which our attention has been called lay down that principle. The first case is Richards v. Kessick (ubi sup.), and although that case did not arise under the Metropolis Management Acts, but arose under the Public Health Act 1875, so far as the facts go they are practically identical. There there had been an old highway and the highway was widened by a strip of land which was thrown into the highway, and the liability to repair it under the Public Health Act was very analogous to what it would have been under the Metropolis Management Acts; that is to say, that the street could be paved and metalled by the direction of the authority, and the expenses apportioned on the frontagers. The street was so paved and metalled and the expenses were apportioned and made payable by certain persons under that Act, and there the Queen's Bench Division (consisting of Field and Wills, JJ.) decided that for the purpose of the Public Health Act the street—it was not called a new street but the street—was the part which had been added to the old highway. Counsel for the appellants did not at all deny that that case in principle had a considerable bearing upon this matter, but he said it was under a different Act. I quite agree that it was under a different Act, but we shall have to consider whether there is any real distinction in principle between the two Acts to prevent our considering that judgment seriously or to prevent our being bound by it. Then the matter came again before Hawkins and Williams, JJ. in the case of White v. Fulham Vestry (ubi sup.), where the facts were very much the same as in the present case, with the exception of one different incident on which great reliance has been placed. There the old road had been made since 1855 and there had been made a new street, and the frontagers on the one side of that street had paid their contribution under the Metropolis Management Act. Then later the street was widened by a new strip, and the court there decided that the added part was a new street for the purposes of the 105th section of the Metropolis Management Act of 1855, and that the expenses were to be apportioned among the frontagers who were upon the other side of the new street. Now, we have been pressed by the counsel for the appellants to say that the sole ground of that decision was that the frontagers on the south side, or the narrow part of the road, had already paid contributions under the Act of 1855. That they had paid contributions is perfectly true; but when we look at the principle of that case and the principle which was adopted in Richards v. Kessick (ubi sup.), which that case followed, it seems quite clear that the court in both cases considered that the "new street" as it was in the one case under the Metropolis Management Acts, and the "street" simply as it was in the other case under the Public Health Act, was the added part. I cannot see any reason why we should come to a different conclusion with regard to what is, and what is not, a new street in this case simply because the part to which the new strip has been added was an old highway as distinguished from being a new street made under the Metropolis Management Act 1855. In both cases we have to consider what is new, and for the purpose of the section apportion the costs upon the persons whose houses or land abut upon the new street. If I am right in the conclusion I have come to in following these two decisions, which, of course, are binding upon us, the case is at an end, because it was not contended that, if the houses or land abut upon the new street, and if the authority are to draw a distinction between the old portion of the street and the new portion, that distinction was not drawn. I think the learned magistrate was quite right in coming to the conclusion in this case that he must follow the authorities and hold that the only new street here was the added part, and therefore the expenses must be apportioned among the persons whose houses or land abutted on the north side of the widened road. With regard to the case, my brother Lawrence has called attention to, the case of Evans v. Newport Urban Sanitary Authority (ubi sup.). I have no doubt that there the whole point turned upon whether or not the frontagers could resist payment because some portion of the road on either side had been an old footpath, and it was decided that that was not an objection which would prevent the expenses being properly apportioned. If any different view of the case is to be taken—I do not say it is to be taken—it must be taken by some court other than a court of first instance. I think, for the reasons I have mentioned, the decision arrived at by the learned magistrate was quite right.

SOUTH-EASTERN AND CHATHAM RAILWAY COMPANY (apps.) v. LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL
(resps.). (a)

Smoke—Locomotive emitting black smoke—Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20), s. 114—Regulation of Railways Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119), s. 19.

Certain locomotives belonging to the appellants emitted black smoke for three minutes on various occasions.

Evidence was given that the coal used was smoky coal, and that it was unnecessary for a locomotive to emit smoke for longer than one minute, but no evidence was given that the locomotives were not constructed on the principle of consuming their own smoke.

Held, that an offence had been committed within sect. 114 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 as amended by sect. 19 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868.

CASE stated on five informations laid by the respondents. They were all in the same form, and charged that the appellants did (upon the day and at the place in each of the informations respectively mentioned) use upon their railway (at the place in the information mentioned) a locomotive steam engine using coal or other similar fuel emitting smoke, and not then constructed on the principle of consuming and so as to consume its own smoke, and which did not then consume its own smoke.

By sect. 114 of the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845 (8 Vict. c. 20) it is provided as follows:

Every locomotive steam engine to be used on the railway shall, if it use coal or other similar fuel emitting smoke, be constructed on the principle of consuming and so as to consume its own smoke, and if any engine be not so constructed, the company or party using such engine shall forfeit 5*l.* for every day during which such engine shall be used on the railway.

By sect. 19 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. 119) it is provided:

Where proceedings are taken against a company using a locomotive steam engine on a railway on account of the same not consuming its own smoke, then if it appears to the justices before whom the complaint is heard that the engine is constructed on the principle of consuming its own smoke, but that it failed to consume its own smoke as far as practicable at the time alleged in the complaint through the default of the company or any servant in the employment of the company, such company shall be deemed to be guilty of an offence under the Railway Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, s. 114.

The respondents did not call any evidence to show that the engines in question were not constructed on the principle of consuming and so as to consume their own smoke, but called an inspector in their employ as a witness, who stated that he had seen the five engines when hauling trains up a rising gradient between the certain points emit black smoke in each case for three minutes on the dates charged in the informations.

The same witness gave it as his opinion that the coal which he had seen in the tenders of the engines complained of as they were passing was "North Country coal," and that the North Country coal was a "smoky" coal in the sense that it made more smoke than Welsh coal, but not so much as Staffordshire coal. The witness had had several years' experience in the coal trade, and had special knowledge of different kinds of coal.

The respondent then called a second witness, who had been in the employment of the Midland Railway Company as an engine driver and stoker for upwards of twenty years. He had not seen the occurrence spoken to by the last witness, or the appellants' engine or coal; but stated as his opinion that it was as a general rule unnecessary for a locomotive to emit smoke for a longer period than one minute.

The appellants called no evidence, but contended that the only offence, the commission of which was charged in the information, was the offence described in the aforesaid sect. 114 of the Railways Clauses Consolidation Act 1845, and that there was no evidence in support of such charge. Secondly, that if the information should be held to charge commission of the offence mentioned in sect. 114 as amended by sect. 19 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, then there was no evidence that the engines had at the time and places failed to consume their own smoke as far as practicable or that such failures arose through any default on the part of the company or any servant of the company.

The respondents contended that the statement of their witnesses was evidence that the engines had at the times and places failed to consume their own smoke as far as practicable and also that such failure had arisen either through the default of the company, or through the default of a servant of the company, and that the commission of such offence was respectively charged in the information.

The magistrate was of opinion that the respondents contention was correct and convicted the defendants in each case.

James Fox (C. A. Cripps, K.C. with him) for the appellants.—It has been held, under sect. 114 of the Railway Clauses Act 1845, in the case of Manchester, Sheffield, and Lincolnshire Railway Company v. Wood (2 El. & El. 344) that where an engine is properly constructed, but through the carelessness of the persons using it, smoke is emitted and not consumed, there is no liability to the penalty imposed by the section. That liability only arises when the engine is so made as not to consume its smoke when sued with proper care and under ordinary circumstances. The amending section, sect. 19 of the Regulation of Railways Act 1868, does not make the emitting of smoke or black smoke an offence. There was no evidence here of any default on the part of the company or its servants, and such evidence must be given before a conviction can be obtained.

[K.B. Div.]

Avory, K.C. (Dumas with him) for the respondents.—The whole question here is whether there was any evidence from which the magistrate could infer that the engines failed to consume their own smoke through the default of the company or its servants. That there was black smoke is prima facie evidence, but apart from that there is ample evidence. If the engine was constructed so as to consume its own smoke, then the fact that black smoke was issuing shows that the default must be either in the coal or the stoking.

Fox in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am of opinion that we cannot interfere in this case. I do not assent to the major proposition submitted on the part of the county council that the mere fact of smoke issuing is sufficient of itself without any evidence to show that there was default of the company or default of a servant, but I do think the statute meant under ordinary circumstances no smoke should come out. In this case it appears that between certain stations twice on the same day, and on the next day and in another place on two consecutive days, smoke, and it appears to have been black smoke—although I do not know that very much turns on that, except for one point I will mention in a moment—issued for three minutes. The magistrate had before him the evidence of not only the issue of black smoke, which would point to a smoky coal being used, but of an expert who said that it was not necessary for an engine to smoke so long a time, and the company elected to leave the case there. They gave no explanation. Even if gradients could enter into consideration, they have given no explanation at all. Therefore the magistrate had before him evidence, either that it was caused by smoky coal, which might or might not be a default of the company, or that it was caused by something which according to the evidence called before him was unnecessary, and the company called no evidence to rebut it, or gave any explanation. Under these circumstances I do not think the magistrate was wrong in acting on the evidence, however slight it may have been, which satisfied his mind. We cannot say there was no evidence on which he could come to that opinion. I think this appeal should be dismissed.

IGOE (app.) v. SHANN AND OTHERS (resps.). (a)

Licensing—Premises licensed before the 10th Aug. 1872—Break in licence—Exemption as to value—Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94), s. 45.

A beerhouse, originally licensed in 1868, had its licence renewed down to 1886.

On the 8th Oct. possession was given to a new tenant who did not then obtain any licence or transfer.

On the 10th Oct. the current licence expired, and on the 12th Oct. the new tenant obtained from the justices a licence for which she had applied pursuant to sect. 14 of 9 Geo. 4, c. 61. That licence was continuously renewed to the 21st Sept. 1900.

In 1900 the justices refused to renew the licence on the ground that the premises were not of the value required by sect. 45 of the Licensing Act 1872.

Held, that although there had been a break in the licence of two days the qualification as to value in sect. 45 did not apply, as the house had been licensed 1868.

CASE stated by quarter sessions.

The appellant was and is the tenant and occupier of the Council inn, Council-street, Hulme, Manchester, and was licensed in respect thereof for the sale of beer by retail to be consumed on or off the premises.

On the 9th Aug. 1900 notice of the objection to the renewal of the appellant's licence was served upon him, and the grounds of objection, so far as the same are material to this case, were that the premises were not of the necessary annual value.

At the general annual licensing meeting for the city of Manchester, held on the 23rd Aug. 1900, the justices then and there present adjourned the consideration of the objection until the 6th Sept. 1900, and on that day the same was partially considered and evidence heard, and again further adjourned until the 21st Sept. 1900 when the justices refused to renew the licence of the appellant upon the ground that the premises were not of the necessary annual value.

The Council inn was originally licensed for the sale of beer by retail to be consumed on or off the premises in the year 1868, and the licence was continuously renewed down to the year 1886.

At the general annual licensing meeting for the City of Manchester, held in Aug. 1886, the renewal of the licence to Edwin Wade, the then licensee, was objected to, and the consideration of the objection adjourned until some day in September of that year, when the renewal of the licence to him was refused. He continued to carry on business and to sell beer by retail in the house until the 8th Oct. 1886, upon which day he yielded up possession thereof to Jane Jackson, who became the new tenant and occupier thereof, but did not then obtain any licence or transfer of a licence to continue the business. The licence for the current year expired in the course of law on the 10th Oct. 1886. Jane Jackson commenced to carry on business and to sell beer by retail therein on the 8th Oct. 1886, but not under a justice's licence, and she continued to do so. On the 12th Oct. 1886 Jane Jackson, pursuant to 9 Geo. 4, c. 61, s. 14, applied to the justices for the city sitting in special sessions for the licensing purposes mentioned in the section for a grant of a licence to her, which was granted, and the licence was thenceforward continuously renewed until the 21st Sept. 1900.

The annual value of the premises on the 21st Sept. 1900 exceeded the sum of 15*l.* but was less than the sum of 30*l.*

The premises are situate within the City of Manchester, the population of which, according to the last Parliamentary census, exceeded 100,000.

It was contended before the Court of Quarter Sessions on behalf of the appellant that, inasmuch as the house was on the 10th Aug. 1872 licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquors for consumption thereupon, the qualification in respect of annual value prescribed by sect. 45 of the Licensing Act 1872—viz., 30*l.*—did not apply thereto, but that the qualification in respect of the annual value which did apply thereto was that prescribed by 3 & 4 Vict. c. 61. s. 1—viz., 15*l.*

K.B. Div.]

[K.B. Div.]

It was contended on behalf of the respondents that the licence held in respect of the house at the time of the passing of the Licensing Act 1872 having lapsed in 1886, the house thereupon ceased to be qualified to receive any other or new licence except upon the conditions as to annual value required by the Licensing Act 1872, s. 45, and that upon the true construction of that section of the Licensing Act 1872, the conditions therein prescribed as to annual value applied to all licensed premises of which the licence had not been in existence continuously from the 10th Aug. 1872 down to the application for the renewal thereof, or to which a licence other than that existing on the 10th Aug. 1872 had been granted since that date.

The Court of Quarter Sessions decided that the value qualification prescribed by sect. 45 of the Licensing Act 1872 did apply to the house, and dismissed the appeal upon the ground that the house was not of the necessary annual value as required by the last-named statute.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether or not the decision of the Court of Quarter Sessions was right.

Joseph Walton, K.C. (Randolph with him) for the appellants.—The point raised by this case is whether the provisions of sect. 45 of the Licensing Act of 1872, which provides that certain premises shall not be qualified to receive a licence unless certain conditions as to value are satisfied applies to this particular inn. In this case there is no doubt that there was a two days' break. By sect. 45 of the Licensing Act 1872 it is enacted that: "Premises to which at the time of the passing of this Act no licence under the Acts recited in the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869 authorising the sale of beer or wine for consumption thereupon is attached, shall not be subject to any of the provisions now in force prescribing a certain rent or value or rating as a qualification for receiving any such licence." This section only applies to on-licences in three classes. The first class consists of houses licensed under the Wine and Beerhouse Acts which were licensed on the 10th Aug. 1872. The second class are alehouses which had a licence on the 10th Aug. 1872 under 9 Geo. 4. With regard to the first class there were existing statutory requirements as to value, but not as to the second class. The third class are those premises which were not licensed at all. The final words of sect. 45: "Premises not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of any intoxicating liquor for consumption thereupon shall not be qualified to receive a licence authorising such sale" unless certain conditions are fulfilled, only apply to premises which were not licensed at the passing of the Act. It is said that there were two days' break from the 10th Oct. to the 12th Oct. 1886. This section, however, says nothing about a break or continuity. It applies to the state of things existing on the 10th Aug. 1872. It disqualifies certain premises, and it excepts from that disqualification premises which on the 10th Aug. 1872 had a licence. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The breaking of the licences does not seem to be dealt with at all.] This disqualification applies to the premises and is not a personal one.

Byrne for the respondent.—This sect. 45 is a limiting one. It is intended to prevent justices from granting any licence to any person after the date unless it can be shown in a town or city of over 100,000 inhabitants that the public-house is of the annual value of 30*l.* All that is done by the section is this that an existing licence on the 10th Aug. 1872 shall be saved, and that is all. It does not touch or say anything about a beerhouse being then and before that date licensed. It leaves those houses alone. The licence that existed in 1872 ceased to exist, and so the saving provided by the section disappeared. The language is silent as to this house altogether, and there are no words dealing with a case of this description. That being so, you must look back at the Beerhouse Act 1840 (3 & 4 Vict. c. 61). He referred to Freer v. Murray, 71 L. T. Rep. 444; (1894) A. C. 635.

The house itself cannot have any licence or any privilege apart from the existing licence. The Beerhouse Act 1840 deals with the licence in respect of the premises, but the licence belongs to the individual and not to the house, and so soon as the individual ceases to hold the licence, the house ceases to be a licensed house.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The only point we have to decide in this case is, where premises have been licensed substantially continuously, I say substantially continuously, because I will call attention to the break in a moment, from the year 1868, whether an objector who gives notice against a renewal under sect. 42 of the Act of 1872, can raise the point as to the annual value which is required for certain premises under that Act. Now we must take it that in this case there was a break of two days, and I assume for the purposes of my judgment that Mrs. Jackson got a new licence in respect of the premises on the 12th Oct. 1886. She has had that licence down to 1900; the refusal in this case was upon a renewal. Now we have no question here as to general jurisdiction so as to raise any points which arose in the Wakefield case. We have simply to consider the question upon a particular objection as to the annual value of this particular house. If Mr. Byrne is right in saying that the provisions of sect. 45 apply to the licence granted to a person, and that once a licence has ceased to that person in respect of any particular premises, they become new premises for the purpose of licensing, of course the justices would be right, and his argument would be well founded. But we have to consider what the language of the statute says. Now for reasons which it is not for us to consider, the statute (and the language of it I do not think is at all difficult to construe, but only requires some amount of intelligence) thought fit to draw a distinction between premises which were in fact licensed under the Beerhouse Act prior to the date of the 10th Aug. 1872, when this Act came into force, and others. Accordingly premises to which at the time of the passing of this Act, no licence under the Acts recited in the Wine and Beerhouse Act 1869, authorising the sale of beer and wine for the consumption thereon was attached, were not to be subject to the provisions now in force. It was a curious way of doing it. They might have saved the existing provision with regard to existing houses, but they have thought that they have done it by saying that houses which have got no licence shall not be subject to the existing conditions. Then they went on to put the other class which were subject to the new conditions, and the Act said, "premises not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor, shall not be qualified to receive a licence unless the following conditions are satisfied." In my opinion, when the section is looked at reasonably, though at the first look of it is put in an awkward way, because it exempts new houses not licensed in order to authorise the justices to give any effect to this objection, the house must come within the class that is mentioned in the second sub-section—that is to say, "premises which were not at the time of the passing of this Act licensed for the sale of intoxicating liquor shall not be qualified to receive a licence." Therefore, I think that when the section is read to endeavour to give it an intelligible meaning, it was to draw a distinction between the class of premises which were licensed at the time of the passing of the Act and the class that were not. This particular objection cannot be raised as an objection to a renewal, but if the licence is going to be refused it must be done upon the general grounds of the magistrate's discretion. The special grounds raised by the objection do not prevail, having regard to the language of sect. 45. I think this refusal must be reversed.

Adulteration—Arsenic in beer—Liability of retailer—"Not of nature, substance, and quality demanded"—Sufficiency of certificate—Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 3, 6, 18, 20.

Beer in the course of its brewing became contaminated with arsenic owing to the presence of that substance in one of the ingredients used. The beer having been purchased from the brewer by the retailer, he sold the same to a customer, being unaware and having no reason to suspect that the beer contained arsenic.

Held, that there being evidence to support the finding of the justices that the beer was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser, a conviction was proper under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875.

Semble, that the accidental accumulation of deleterious matter, or its presence, does not of necessity make the article different in nature, substance, and quality from that demanded.

The certificate of the analyst, under sect. 18 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 ought to contain in it sufficient materials to enable the justices to form a judgment on its face that an offence has been committed.

The certificates stated: "We are of opinion that the said sample contains arsenic"; and "We are of opinion that the said sample contained a serious quantity of arsenic."

Held, that the certificates were bad.

GOULDER v. ROOK.

CASE STATED upon the hearing of a certain information and complaint preferred by the respondent against the appellant under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63) that the appellant did sell to the prejudice of the purchaser a certain article of food, to wit, beer, which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, the same containing arsenious acid to the extent of not less than one-eighth of a grain per gallon.

The following facts were either proved or admitted by both parties:—

The appellant is a retailer of beer, and the respondent is an inspector under the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts for the city of Manchester.

The sample of beer taken by the purchaser contained arsenious acid to the extent of not less than one-eighth of a grain per gallon, the analyst's certificate being as follows:

Sample marked No. 1269 B.—City of Manchester.—To Mr. A. T. Rook.—I the undersigned, Public Analyst for the City of Manchester, do hereby certify that I received on the 21st day of Nov. 1900, from Inspector Holland, a sample of beer marked No. 1269 B. for analysis (which then weighed), and have analysed the same and declare the result of my analysis to be as follows: I am of opinion that the said sample contained the parts as under of foreign ingredients, viz., arsenious acid to the extent of not less than one-eighth of a grain per gallon. No change had taken place in the constitution of this sample that would interfere in any way with the analysis. As witness my hand this 30th day of November 1900.—C. ESTCOURT, F.I.C., at Manchester.

The appellant did not mix the arsenic in the beer herself, and did not know of its existence in the beer, nor could she be expected to know of or suspect the existence of such an admixture.

Arsenic was an ingredient injurious to health, and the quantity of arsenic in the beer was such as to render the same injurious to health, but did not form one of the constituents of beer.

The arsenic had been unknowingly mixed with the beer by the brewer through having been improperly introduced in the manufacture of some substance used in brewing.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the proceedings were wrongly brought under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, but ought, if any, to have been brought under sect. 3 of the Act, and that there was no offence under sect. 6 aforesaid, the article sold being really beer into which, through no fault of the appellant and without her knowledge, the arsenic had been introduced, and that sect. 6 did not apply to such accidental contaminations.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B.] GOULDER v. ROOK; BENT v. ORMEROD; LEE v. BENT; BARLOW v. NOBLETT. [K.B.]

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the proceedings were rightly brought under sect. 6, and that an offence had been committed under that section.

The magistrate found as a fact that the beer sold by the appellant as aforesaid was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser, and he thereupon convicted the appellant.

By the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 3:

No person shall mix, colour, stain, or powder, or order or permit any other person to mix, colour, stain, or powder any article of food with any ingredient or material so as to render the article injurious to health, with intent that the same may be sold in that state, and no person shall sell any such article so mixed, coloured, or stained, or powdered, under a penalty in each case not exceeding fifty pounds for the first offence; every offence shall be a misdemeanour for which the person, on conviction, shall be imprisoned for a period not exceeding six months with hard labour.

And by sect. 6:

No person shall sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food or any drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser, under a penalty not exceeding twenty pounds; provided that an offence shall not be deemed to be committed under this section in the following cases, that is to say: (1) Where any matter or ingredient not injurious to health has been added to the food or drug because the same is required for the production or preparation thereof as an article of commerce in a state fit for carriage or consumption, and not fraudulently to increase the bulk, or conceal the inferior quality thereof. (2) Where the drug or food is a proprietary medicine, or is the subject of a patent in force, and is supplied in the state required by the specification of the patent. (3) Where the food or drug is compounded as in this Act mentioned. (4) Where the food or drug is unavoidably mixed with some extraneous matter in the process of collection or preparation.

F. Moulton, K.C. (M. Lush with him) for the appellant.—In this case the summonses were taken out under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, which makes it an offence if the article is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded, and ignorance is no defence. I contend that in a case of what we may call contamination, where the article sold is the article asked for, but where there is a contamination making it injurious to health, then it is a case which comes under sect. 3, where want of knowledge is a defence. Sect. 6, which makes knowledge immaterial, applies to the case of a man who is in the position of vendor of an article, and sells an article not of the nature, substance, or quality demanded, and the reason why the Legislature dispenses with any question of knowledge is that if a person puts himself in the position of selling an article, he ought to ascertain that the article he sells is the one demanded. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—But that argument would apply to watered milk.] No; because a person who sells milk ought to be able to distinguish between milk and watered milk, or, if he sells butter, between butter and margarine. He referred to Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 3, 4, 5, 6. The adulteration under sect. 6 is adulteration where something has been substituted for a portion of the article sold and forms part of the bulk, such as the case of milk where water has been put into it. It is intended to meet what I may call trade adulteration—that is, adulteration for a purpose, such as an intention to sell not the article demanded, but an inferior article. If sect. 6 has the application which it is now sought to place upon it, it must cover every case which would come within sect. 3. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—But you must show that what has been done here is excluded from sect. 6. The fact that offences under both may overlap is not sufficient.] What we say that the Legislature has done is, that in a case of accidental contamination a man is allowed to show that he had no knowledge, or he could not reasonably have acquired that knowledge, but when the adulteration comes under sect. 6, where it changes the nature, substance, or quality, then want of knowledge was not permitted to be proved. Sect. 3 deals with the case where a man really sold the article, but the article was contaminated; sect. 6 where he did not sell the article owing to some change which made it not the article. The difference is between contaminated beer and that which is not beer. He referred to Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 8, 24, 25.

Lawson Walton, K.C. (Byrne with him) for the respondent.—Sect. 3 deals solely with mixing so as to affect the wholesomeness of the article and with the intent that it shall be sold. So far as the mixing is concerned, there is no relief, but under sect. 5 there is a relief of the seller who does not know the article is so mixed. In this case there has been no mixing within sect. 3. I say that sect. 6 is amply sufficient to cover a case of this sort. The wholesomeness of an article is clearly one of its most important qualities if it is sold as an article of food or drink. What is really contended for by the appellant is that you may make a thing as poisonous as you like and escape from the operation of sect. 6. [PHILLIMORE, J.—Is it not really that the section is directed to substitution and not to addition?] There is good reason why the operation should not be limited. Sect. 6 is intended to meet the case of a seller who is selling an article of food without protecting himself by getting a warranty from the wholesale dealer, when he would be protected by sect. 25. Cases can come within both sects. 3 and 6. The object of the statute is to ensure pure food. He referred to

BENT v. ORMEROD.

Case stated upon the hearing of an information and complaint preferred by the appellant against the respondent, under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, that the respondent did sell to the prejudice of the purchaser a certain article of food—to wit, beer—which was not of the nature, substance, and quality of article demanded by such purchaser, the same containing arsenic.

The following facts were proved:—

The appellant is a superintendent of police and an inspector for the Sale of Food and Drugs Act in the Salford Hundred of the county of Lancaster, and the respondent is a licensed victualler who keeps the Wellington inn in Bolton-road, Pendlebury.

On the 5th Dec. 1900 an inspector of police for the county, acting under the instructions of the appellant, purchased from the respondent at the Wellington-inn six quarts of fourpenny beer for analysis.

Upon the making of the purchase all the provisions in that behalf of the Sale of Food and Drugs Acts were complied with.

Upon analysis the sample of beer taken by the purchaser was found to contain arsenic, the analyst's certificate being as follows:

County of Lancaster.—Sale of Foods and Drugs Acts 1875 to 1899.—To Mr. Superintendent Bent.—We, the undersigned public analysts for the county of Lancaster, do hereby certify that we received on the 7th day of December 1900 from P.O. Chipchase a sample of beer for analysis (which was then marked No. 848), and have analysed the same, and declare the result of our analysis to be as follows: We are of opinion that the said sample contains arsenic. Observations: No change had taken place in the constitution of the sample that would interfere with the analysis.

By the agreement of the parties no question was or is to be raised as to the form or sufficiency of the certificate.

The county analyst was called and proved that the beer contained arsenic to the extent of one-ninth of a grain per gallon at least.

Arsenic does not form one of the constituents of beer, and the quantity of arsenic in the beer was such as to render the same injurious to health.

No evidence was given as to the constituent parts of pure beer, but it was admitted by the respondent and the justices found as a fact that pure beer does not contain the quantity of arsenic contained in the sample sold to the inspector.

The respondent did not mix the arsenic in the beer and did not know of its existence in the beer, nor could he be expected to know of or suspect the existence of arsenic in the beer, nor could he with reasonable diligence have obtained that knowledge.

The arsenic had been introduced into the beer by the brewer using glucose or invert sugar, a substance often used in brewing, which improperly contained arsenic.

The brewer did not know when he used it that the glucose or invert sugar was contaminated with arsenic.

On the part of the appellant it was contended that the proceedings were rightly brought under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, and that an offence had been committed under that section.

On the part of the respondent it was contended that the proceedings were wrongly brought under sect. 6 of the Act, and ought, if any, to have been brought under sect. 3, and that there was no offence under sect. 6, the arsenic having been introduced into the beer through no fault of the respondent and without his knowledge, and that he could not with reasonable diligence have obtained that knowledge, and that sect. 6 did not apply to such a case.

The justices found as a fact that the beer sold by the respondent as aforesaid was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanding by the purchaser, in that there had been mixed with it an ingredient prejudicial to the purchaser, and they dismissed the information.

J. Walton, K.C. (Pickford, K.C., E. Sutton, and Mellor with him) for the appellant.—The point raised here is the same as in Goulder v. Rook. As I understand this Act it creates two different kinds of offences. One is under sect. 3, and that is of knowingly, with the intent that the food may be sold, mixing it with some injurious ingredient. The other is under sect. 6, which is selling to the prejudice of the purchaser any food which is not of the nature, substance, or quality demanded by such purchaser. That is an offence whether done knowingly or unknowingly. An offence may fall under both sections, as I think was pointed out by Phillimore, J. in Dickins v. Randerson (84 L. T. Rep. 204; (1901) 1 Q. B. 442). It was argued in that case that, as the drug in question was a compounded drug, proceedings ought not to have been taken under sect. 6, but under sect. 7, and for this purpose some observations of Wright, J. in Houghton v. Taplin (13 Times L. Rep. 386) were invoked, and Phillimore, J. said: "We think that these observations have been misunderstood. In any case it is quite clear from the definition clause that a compounded drug is none the less a drug, which shows that proceedings can be taken under sect. 6, though it may be that in the case of a compounded drug they can also be taken under sect. 7." [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Overlapping is no answer.] That is so. He referred to Hoyle v. Hitchman, 40 L. T. Rep. 252; 4 Q.B. Div. 233.

M. Lush (Moulton, K.C. with him) for the respondent.—If the view taken by the other side is right, it is perfectly obvious and necessary that every single case that comes under sect. 3 should be an offence under sect. 6. We find here two groups of sections, the first group consists of 3, 4, and 5, dealing with cases like this, where there has been some injurious ingredients mixed in the article of food. The other class of cases are dealt with by sect. 6, where either the vendor, or somebody through whom the vendor has got the article, is selling an adulterated article of food by substituting some other substance for what the buyer was intending to buy.

J. Walton, K.C. in reply.

LEE v. BENT.

Case stated on an information charging the appellants with an offence under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875.

The respondent having purchased from the appellants a quantity of beer, and having complied with all the requirements of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, caused part thereof to be analysed by the public analysts.

The public analysts duly delivered their certificate as follows:

... We ... certify that we received ... a sample of beer for analysis ... and have analysed the same and declare the result of our analysis to be as follows: We are of opinion that the said sample contains arsenic. Observations: No change had taken place in the constitution of the sample that would interfere with the analysis.

[K.B.] GOULDER v. ROOK; BENT v. ORMEROD; LEE v. BENT; BARLOW v. NOBLETT. [K.B.]

At the hearing of the information the certificate was tendered as evidence on behalf of the respondent, but it was contended on behalf of the appellants that it was bad on the following grounds: That the certificate was not in the form prescribed by sect. 18 of the Act of 1875, and as set forth in the schedule thereto; that it did not state the constituent parts of the sample analysed.

One of the analysts who signed the certificate gave oral evidence on behalf of the respondent.

It was proved to the satisfaction of the justices that the sample contained arsenic to such an extent as to be injurious to health, and that absolutely pure beer does not contain arsenic.

The justices were of opinion that the certificate complied with the requirements of the Acts on the ground that it contained such statements as enabled them to come to a conclusion themselves that the sample was adulterated with arsenic. They therefore admitted the certificate.

They found as a fact upon the evidence brought before them that the article purchased contained arsenic to such an extent as to render it injurious to health, and was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser—to wit, beer—and they convicted the appellants.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the giving of a certificate by the public analyst in the form set forth in the schedule to the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 was a condition precedent to the institution of proceedings under sect. 6 of the Act, and that the certificate set forth above was not in the form set forth in the schedule nor to the like effect, and that the information was therefore bad and should be dismissed.

By the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 18:

The certificate of the analysis shall be in the form set forth in the schedule hereto, or to the like effect.

By sect. 20:

When the analyst having analysed any article shall have given his certificate of the result, from which it may appear that an offence against some of the provisions of this Act has been committed, the person causing the analysis to be made may take proceedings for the recovery of the penalty therein imposed for such offence before any justices in petty sessions assembled having jurisdiction in the place where the article or drug sold was actually delivered to the purchaser in a summary manner.

And by sect. 21:

At the hearing of the information in such proceedings the production of the certificate of the analyst shall be sufficient evidence of the facts therein stated, unless the defendant shall require that the analyst shall be called as a witness, and the parts of the articles retained by the person who purchased the article shall be produced, and the defendant may, if he think fit, tender himself and his wife to be examined on his behalf, and he or she shall, if he so desire, be examined accordingly.

M. Lush (F. Moulton, K.C. with him) for the appellant.—The point raised by this case on behalf of the appellant is that under the statute the certificate is bound to state what the ingredients are, and what the proportion is of the foreign substances. As it stands it discloses no offence. He referred to Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), s. 18. In Fortune v. Hanson (74 L. T. Rep. 145; (1896) 1 Q. B. 202) the certificate was held bad where it said: "The sample contained the percentage of foreign ingredients as under: Five per cent. of added water." That case goes a good deal further than the present one. In Newby v. Sims (70 L. T. Rep. 105; (1894) 1 Q. B. 478) the certificate said: "I find the sample contained an excess of water over and above what is allowed by Act of Parliament. I estimate the excess at 13 per cent. of the entire sample. In my opinion the sample was not a sample of genuine rum." It was there held that the certificate ought to have stated the proportion of water mixed with the rum, and so was insufficient, and a conviction could not be supported.

J. Walton, K.C. (Pickford, K.C., E. Sutton, and Mellor with him) for the respondent.—In this case evidence was called, as of course it may be under the statute. With regard to Fortune v. Hanson, which has been cited by the other side, the analyst did not merely state the fact, but he stated that the sample contained 5 per cent. of added water, that is to say, 5 per cent. of water more than milk without adulteration should contain, and therefore the analyst expressed an opinion which is not a matter of fact at all, but a matter which was for the justices to decide. The analyst should have said that the milk contained such a percentage of water. Practically the certificate should state what is the result of the analysis, as Kennedy, J. points out in Fortune v. Hanson. The same principle is adopted in Newby v. Sims. In Bakewell v. Davies (69 L. T. Rep. 832; (1894) 1 Q. B. 296) it was held that the certificate given by a public analyst of the result of an analysis made by him need not set out the constituent parts of the sample analysed, and where the case is not one of adulteration it need only state the result of the analysis. [PHILLIMORE, J.—But the certificate here is open to the same objection as in Newby v. Sims (sup.), namely, that the analyst has taken upon himself to decide what is natural, and has not given the magistrate the materials to decide that point.] In Bridge v. Howard (75 L. T. Rep. 300; (1897) 1 Q. B. 80), which was a case of adulterated milk, the certificate stated that the sample submitted contained 6 per cent. of added water, and went on to say: "This opinion is based on the fact that the sample contained 7.97 per cent. solids not fat, whereas genuine milk contains not less than 8.5 per cent. solids not fat." That was held to be good. The certificate of the analyst is not conclusive evidence; it is not evidence of an offence at all. The analyst must certify the result of this analysis, but at the most his certificate is merely evidence, and although it may not contain facts sufficient to convict, yet it may be a good certificate. It must not contain a judgment. In this case the certificate says that the beer contains arsenic; that must mean arsenic in some appreciable quantity. [LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—That is just my difficulty.] The certificate, however, here is a good one, and, although standing alone it may not be enough to allow the justices to convict, that cannot make it bad.

BARLOW v. NOBLETT.

In this case the facts were the same, and the case in the same form as Lee v. Bent (sup.), except that in the certificate the words were:

We are of opinion that the said sample contains a serious quantity of arsenic.

[K.B.] GOULDER v. ROOK; BENT v. ORMEROD; LEE v. BENT; BARLOW v. NOBLETT. [K.B.]

M. Lush (F. Moulton, K.C. with him) for the appellant.—The addition of the words "serious amount," which is the only distinction between the certificate in this case and the one in Lee v. Bent, cannot get over the difficulty pointed out by Hawkins and Kennedy, JJ. in Fortune v. Hanson (74 L. T. Rep. 145; (1896) 1 Q. B. 202). I submit that in this case the section has not been complied with.

J. Walton, K.C. (Pickford, K.C., E. Sutton, and Mellor with him) for the respondents.—This certificate must be good unless it be the fact that proceedings can never be taken where the analyst cannot define by a percentage or arithmetical statement the parts of the added ingredient. [PHILLIMORE, J.—In my opinion the analyst is not bound to state the exact quantity, but if he says there ought not to be a one-hundredth part of a grain, and there is certainly not less than one-eighth of a grain, that would be enough.] He says something more definite here I submit, and what he states satisfies the condition precedent, and it is evidence. Whether it is enough to justify a conviction is a different matter, but it can be supplemented by other evidence.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—Perhaps it would be convenient, in the first place, to deal with the points raised in the two last appeals of Lee v. Bent and Barlow v. Noblett. In the first of these cases the analyst had certified that the sample contained arsenic, and in the second case that it contained a serious quantity of arsenic. Now, we are all of opinion that those two certificates are not sufficient. It is very important that the practice should be uniform, and we do not think it possible, after the series of decisions which have been given, to say that the condition precedent is other than a document which must be issued in proper form before proceedings for a prosecution are instituted, and that that certificate ought to contain in it sufficient materials to enable the magistrates to form a judgment on the face of the certificate that the offence had been committed. Although the judgment is the judgment of the magistrates, yet the certificate should contain sufficient information to enable them to come to a decision. We need not consider whether a certificate would be bad which went further, but we think at least it should contain that. There are many cases in which the only evidence is a certificate. Nothing is said as to what ordinary beer—I will not say absolutely pure beer, but ordinary beer—contains, and nothing is said as to the degree or amount of arsenic. All that is said in one case is that arsenic was there; and, in the other case, that there was a serious quantity. We think, having regard to the necessary protection of the person charged, the certificates ought to contain further particulars to enable the magistrates to have before them the materials on which they can come to a conclusion. I think we could not decide otherwise without overruling several decisions which seem to us to be founded in good sense. We need not consider whether or not in every particular case it is absolutely necessary to say that the certificate must set out all the ingredients contained in the sample, but we think we are justified in saying that these certificates are not sufficient. That disposes of the two cases of Lee v. Bent and Barlow v. Noblett, in which cases the convictions must be quashed. I now come to the more important and more difficult point which was raised in Bent v. Ormerod and in Goulder v. Rook. I am of opinion that the conviction in the latter case should be supported, and that the case of Bent v. Ormerod, in which there has been a dismissal, should go back with an expression of our opinion for a conviction. I think a great deal of the difficulty disappears if you look at the language of sect. 6 and consider it by itself for a moment. I quite agree that if you can see clearly that one group of sections seems to deal with one class of offence, and another group of sections to deal with another class of offence, you may get very material assistance by considering the language in the one case and in the other. On the other hand, it has not been disputed by the able counsel who have argued for the brewers in this case that the fact that the sections which create offences overlap does not show that a case is not within one of them. It may very likely be that some facts afford grounds for prosecuting under more than one section. There are numerous instances of that in our criminal statutes. But I think the question of sect. 6 is whether or not a person has sold an article of food or a drug which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by such purchaser. In my opinion sect. 6 starts at the sale, if I may use the expression, and ends at the sale. You have not to consider how that which makes it otherwise than of the nature, substance, and quality demanded has got into it, but whether, in fact, it is there, so that it is different. I think it would be cutting the section down unwisely, and cutting it down without sufficient direction in the statute, if we were to hold that you were to enter into an examination of the stage at which or the precise process by which that which makes it different has found its place in the article which is being sold. Now, applying that test, the magistrates in this case have found as a fact that the beer sold by the appellant was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser. They have found as a fact, or rather the certificate shows, that arsenious acid, to the extent of not less than one-eighth of a grain per gallon was there, and they find "that arsenic is an ingredient injurious to health, and the quantity of arsenic in the beer was such as to render the same injurious to health and did not form one of the constituents of beer." I read these words as it is agreed by both the learned counsel that they are meant to be read—that arsenic does not form one of the constituent parts of beer in any substantial degree under ordinary circumstances. It is plain that, if I am right in the view I have expressed as to the primâ facie meaning of sect. 6, the magistrates have certainly found as a fact that this article was not of the nature, substance, and quality of that demanded by the purchaser; and if there is any evidence that they can come to that conclusion the conviction must stand. I have already indicated that, the magistrates having before them a case in which a dangerous foreign body to the extent of one-eighth of a grain per gallon which is injurious to health is there, it seems to me that if they have drawn the conclusion that the beer sold was not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded, it is not possible for us to say they were wrong. Mr. Moulton has suggested that if what is in the article is the result of some ingredient put in in the course of its manufacture, which in fact makes it injurious to health, that it can only be "mixing" under sect. 3, and the offence can only fall within the terms of sect. 3. The penalty is very much more severe under sect. 3, and knowledge is made of the essence of the offence; that is to say, the defendant can show there is no offence if he proves that he did not know and had no means of knowledge. Under sect. 6 the penalty is far less, and it has been expressly decided in two or three cases that the knowledge of the person is immaterial; that is to say, however innocent, however little he may have known, yet he may be convicted under sect. 6. In the second case that was argued before us—that is to say, Bent v. Ormerod—the finding was the same, although the summons was dismissed. "We found as a fact that the beer sold by the respondent aforesaid was not of the nature, substance, and quality of the article demanded by the purchaser in that there had been mixed with it under the circumstances mentioned . . . an ingredient prejudicial to the health of the purchaser." Then, if you go back to the analysis, you find that it was proved there was arsenic to the extent of one-ninth of a grain per gallon at least. Then the case continues practically in the same terms as the other case, although it is more clearly stated: "Arsenic does not form one of the constituents of beer, and the quantity of arsenic in the beer was such as to render the same injurious to health." Under these circumstances I come to the conclusion that there was evidence on which the magistrates could find as a fact that there was an article sold different in nature, substance, and quality from that demanded, and that the conviction in the one case ought to stand, and in the other case there ought to be a conviction. I only desire to add that I must not be understood as suggesting that any accidental accumulation of deleterious matter or the accidental presence of deleterious matter in an article sold of necessity makes it different in nature, substance, and quality to the article demanded. It will be for the magistrate in each case, as was decided in the Scotch case—and, I think, rightly decided—as a question of fact to find, as they have here, whether or not the article of food or drug is not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded by the purchaser.

LAWRENCE, J.—I am of the same opinion, and I have nothing to add.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree. I will only say I equally lay stress, with my Lord, on the proviso which he has made at the end of his judgment.

REX v. NORFOLK COUNTY COUNCIL;
Ex parte GREEN. (a)

Local government—Public right of way—Obstruction—Removal by private persons—Action against them—Right of county council to contribute to costs of defence—Local Government Act 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73), s. 26 (1), (3), (4).

By sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1894, it is enacted that it shall be the duty of every district council to protect all public rights of way, and to prevent, as far as possible, the stopping or obstruction of any such right of way, where the stoppage or obstruction thereof would, in their opinion, be prejudicial to the interest of the district; by sub-sect. 3 of the same section: "A district council may, for the purpose of carrying into effect this section, institute or defend any legal proceedings, and generally take such steps as they deem expedient;" and by sub-sect. 4 the parish council may represent to the district council that a public right of way has been stopped, and if the district council fail to act on such representation may petition the county council, and, if the county council so resolve, the powers and duties of the district council under sect. 26 shall be transferred to the county council.

Held, that sect. 26 (1) imposed a public duty upon the district council to protect public rights of way, where the obstruction would be prejudicial to the district; that sect. 26 (4) transferred this duty under the circumstances therein stated to the county council; and that sect. 26 (3) was wide enough to render it legal on the part of the county council not merely to take and defend proceedings in their own name, but to spend public money in contributing to the cost of the defence of private persons against whom proceedings had been taken for removing an obstruction of what was alleged to be a public right of way within sect. 26 (1).

RULE nisi for a certiorari.

It appeared that a dispute had arisen as to whether or not a public right of way existed over certain land at Snettisham, of which Sir Edward Green was the owner and Mr. Lycett Green the occupier. Two persons called Ellis and French, in order to bring the dispute to an issue, removed an obstruction which these gentlemen had placed across the alleged way, and thereupon the latter commenced an action in the Chancery Division against Ellis and French for (inter alia) a declaration that no such right of way existed over the land in question.

After the Chancery action had been commenced, the Rural District Council of Snettisham, on the representation of the parish council interested, passed a resolution to contribute to the costs of Ellis and French in defending the action, and to take such other steps in the matter as seemed expedient. Subsequently the council rescinded this resolution, and thereupon the parish council interested in the matter petitioned the County Council of Norfolk to take up Ellis and French's defence. Thereupon, the county council passed a resolution that the powers and duties of the district council, under sect. 26 of the Local Government Act 1894 in respect of the alleged unlawful obstruction of the path in question, should be transferred to the county council, and that the county council should contribute towards the defendants' costs in the Chancery action, and take any other steps that should seem expedient. It was agreed that for the purpose of testing the point raised in this rule, that this resolution should be regarded as an order for the payment of such costs, so that it could be removed by certiorari under sect. 80 of the Local Government Act 1888.

The material part of sect. 26 of the Local Government Act 1894 (56 & 57 Vict. c. 73) is as follows:

Sect. 26.—(1) It shall be the duty of every district council to protect all public rights of way and to prevent as far as possible the stopping or obstruction of any such right of way, whether within their district or in an adjoining district in the county or counties in which the district is situate where the stoppage or obstruction thereof would in their opinion be prejudicial to the interests of their district and to prevent any unlawful encroachment on any roadside waste within their district. (3) A district council may, for the purpose of carrying into effect this section, institute or defend any legal proceedings and generally take such steps as they deem expedient. (4) Where a parish council have represented to the district council that any public right of way within the district, or an adjoining district in the county or counties in which the district is situate, has been unlawfully stopped or obstructed . . . it shall be the duty of the district council, unless satisfied that the allegations of such representation are incorrect, to take proper proceedings accordingly; and if the district council refuse or fail to take any proceedings in consequence of such representation, the parish council may petition the county council for the county within which the way . . . is situate, and if the council so resolve, the powers and duties of the district council under this section shall be transferred to the county council.

Russell, K.C. (Fleetwood Pritchard with him) for the county council showed cause.—The question is whether the district council, or, when they have refused to act, the county council, have power under sect. 26 not merely to bring an action themselves to maintain a public right of way, but to undertake to pay the costs of a person who has taken steps to maintain it, and against whom an action has in consequence been brought. I maintain that they have. That section clearly lays a duty upon the district council to protect public rights of way within their district, and when they refuse to carry out that duty then, on the parish council petitioning the county council, the duty is transferred to the county council. And the sole condition precedent to the duty becoming binding in law upon the county council is that they shall not be satisfied that the representations of the parish council are incorrect. Then when the duty does arise, there is no limit set to the mode in which they are to take steps to protect the right of way. Sub-sect. 3 expressly enables them not merely to institute or defend legal proceedings, but also "generally take such steps as they deem expedient." Here the most expedient way of protecting this public right of way was by assisting Ellis and French to defend the Chancery action, which sought a declaration that no such right of way existed.

Bawlinson, K.C. (C. Gordon with him) for Ellis and French.—I associate myself with the argument for the county council. I am prepared to argue that it was the duty of the district council, after the representation from the parish council, to take steps to protect this right of way, and when the district council failed to do so, then, on the petition of the parish council, it became the duty of the county council to do so. And in discharging this duty the county council could take any steps an individual would be justified in taking. An individual might have agreed to pay a share or all of the costs of the defendants in the Chancery action, since, this being a public matter, no question of maintenance arises, and so, I submit, could the county council.

McCall, K.C. and North (Swanson with them).—The real question is, Has the Legislature given the county council power to intervene in an action without becoming a party to it and so making themselves liable in costs if they fail? Prima facie, this seems not to be the sort of provision the Legislature would be likely to make—enabling as it does a public authority to use the public money to harrass a private individual from behind the back of someone else; and, before the courts adopt this view of the statute, I submit it should be quite clear that the Legislature intended it to be adopted. The true interpretation of sect. 3 is, I submit, that contained in the memorandum of the Local Government Board, dated Jan. 1895. There it is laid down that where an alleged public right of way is obstructed, the district or county council have three courses open to them: (1) To direct the removal of the obstruction; (2) to indict the person who has caused the obstruction for a misdemeanour; (3) to proceed by way of action in the name of the Attorney-General, for which his fiat must be obtained in the usual way. [Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—If the council directed the surveyor to remove the obstruction, and the landowner then brought an action against the surveyor without joining the council, would the county council be justified under sect. 3 in paying the surveyor's costs in the action? Yes; because in that case they are defending their own act. The evil that may arise here could not arise there. By instructing their surveyor to remove the obstruction they made themselves liable for his act, and if the landowner does not choose to sue them, he cannot complain that they are encouraging litigation without incurring liability for its costs. If the construction contended for is adopted, two considerable evils may arise: (1) Men of straw may be put up to fight actions, and when the landowner has succeeded he will find he can recover no costs; (2) public money will be spent in litigation over which the public authority has no control, for of course the private defendant has the conduct of his defence.

Russell, K.C. in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This is a point not altogether free from doubt, but, in my opinion, this rule must be discharged. It is important in considering the question before us to note that sect. 26 (1) of the Local Government Act 1894 makes it the duty of every district council to protect all public rights of way, and to prevent, as far as possible, the obstruction of any such right of way. For the purpose of discharging the

K.B. Div.]

ROBERTSON v. KING.

[K.B. Div.]

duty thus placed upon them, district councils may, by sub-sect. 3 of the same section, institute or defend any legal proceedings, and generally take such steps as they may deem expedient. I do not say that it would not be possible to construe the words of this sub-section as meaning merely that a district council can take or defend proceedings in their own name; but, at the same time, I am of opinion that this would be too narrow a reading of it. To begin with, there are many proceedings taken in the name of the Attorney-General which in reality are proceedings by and on behalf of local authorities. And again, actions may be brought against the servants of local authorities. During the argument I asked Mr. McCall did he contend that the district council could not, under sect. 26 (3), provide funds for the defence of a servant of theirs who was sued for removing an obstruction from a public way? and he hesitated long before he answered, as he well might. An action could, of course, be brought against the surveyor of the district council for removing such an obstruction by order of the council, and if such an action were brought I cannot but think that the council might, in the discharge of the duty in relation to obstruction of public rights of way which is imposed on them by sect. 26 (1), defray the costs of such an action. But to cover the present case we must go a step further. The obstruction here has been removed by persons who were not servants or officers of the district council. Even under these circumstances I think the council may, under sect. 21 (3), provide funds for defending the action, if they think that such a course is expedient. This being the position of the district council, is that of the county council the same after the district council have declined to take action? That depends on sect. 26 (4). That sub-section is not drafted in language so precise as the earlier sub-sections, but the present case does not appear to me to be one where any conclusion can be based on any difference in the language. I think that, as far as this case is concerned, the county council are in the same position as the district council were before they refused to interfere, and that consequently the county council can lawfully contribute to the costs of the defendants in the action, because, upon the resolution for the transfer of powers from the district to the county council, the latter became entitled to the rights given to the district council by sect. 26 (3). It has been argued that the language of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 26, which relates to the aiding of persons in maintaining rights of common, does not give a county council a general right to commence litigation, but seems to indicate that they may contribute to the costs of persons maintaining rights of common. It is said that the presence of this sub-section shows that it is only with regard to these particular rights that the council are justified in giving such aid. Whether the right as to commons is really so limited I will not decide, but I am satisfied that since, under sub-sects. 1, 3, 4, and 5, a duty is imposed on as well as a power given to the district council and to the county council in their place to defend a right of way and rid it of obstruction, we cannot properly limit that power upon the ground that in the instance of the maintenance of common rights, under sub-sect. 2, the duty to aid other people in the assertion and defence of their rights may possibly be of a permissive character.

ROBERTSON v. KING. (a)

Local government—Public health—Dwelling-houses—Unfit for human habitation—Uninhabited—Closing order—Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70), ss. 29, 32.

By sect. 32 (1) of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890, every local authority is put under a duty to ascertain whether any dwelling-house in its district is in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation, and if on the representation of the medical officer of health any dwelling-house appears to them to be in such a state, to forthwith take proceedings against the owner or occupier for closing the dwelling-house. By sub-sect. 2 of the same section, such proceedings may be taken whether the dwelling-house be occupied or not. By sect. 29, "dwelling-house" in the Act means "any inhabited building."

At the hearing of an application for an order under sect. 32 for closing certain houses, it was proved that the houses in question were in such a state that if they had been inhabited they would have been so dangerous to health as to be unfit for habitation, but that, though built and formerly used as dwelling-houses, they had not in fact been occupied for the past five and a half years, and there was no evidence to show that the owner intended to permit them to be occupied again:

Held, that a closing order should be made, and that non-occupancy did not in itself prevent the application of the powers given by sects. 32 and 33 to what was in the ordinary sense a dwelling-house.

CASE stated by the stipendiary magistrate of Sheffield on appeal from a refusal by the learned magistrate to make a closing order under sect. 32 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70).

Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890:

Sect. 32 (1) It shall be the duty of every local authority to cause to be made from time to time inspection of their district with a view to ascertaining whether any dwelling-house therein is in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation, and if on the representation of the medical officer . . . any dwelling-house appears to them to be in such state to forthwith take proceedings against the owner or occupier for closing the same . . . (2) Any such proceedings may be taken for the express purpose of causing the dwelling-house to be closed whether the same be occupied or not, and upon such proceedings the court of summary jurisdiction may . . . make a closing order.

By sect. 29 the expression "dwelling-house" in the second part of the Act (which is the part which contains sect. 32) means, unless the context otherwise requires, "any inhabited building."

The appellant in the case stated was the medical officer of health for the city of Sheffield. He had applied under sect. 32 for a closing order in respect of three dwelling-houses, of which the respondent was owner, on the ground that they were used as dwelling-houses and were in a state so injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation. A summons being issued, it appeared at the hearing that the premises, which were described in the medical officer's complaint as three dwelling-houses situate in a corner of a court in Sheffield, and as being used as dwelling-houses, were old buildings with their appurtenances, and that for a long time after they were built they had been occupied or inhabited, and had been dwelling-houses within the definition of that expression in sect. 29 of the Act. It was proved and admitted that in their present condition they were unfit for human habitation within the meaning of the Act, inasmuch as they were in a filthy, ruinous, and dilapidated state, and that there were filthy and other accumulations upon them which might probably be a nuisance, as to which proceedings might have been taken by the corporation under sects. 91, 94, and 97 of the Public Health Act 1875.

It appeared, however, that about five and a half years previously the houses had been closed to all purposes of human habitation by the then owner, and had not since then been used or reopened for such purposes.

Evidence was called that during the five and a half years the premises had never been used for purposes of human habitation except possibly by a chance person or vagrant creeping in for a sleep, and even this had never been actually known to happen.

It further appeared that the respondent had no intention of having the premises used for human habitation in their present condition; but it did not appear whether he had formed any intention as to rebuilding or repairing them or turning them to other purposes.

In support of the application for the closing order it was contended that the premises the subject of the complaint were dwelling-houses within the meaning of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890, Part 2; that sect. 29, which defines a dwelling-house in that part as "any inhabited building," provides that such definition shall apply "unless the context otherwise provides"; that under sect. 32 (2) the context otherwise requires and provides that the provisions of sect. 32 shall apply whether the premises be occupied or not; that in the present case the buildings had been inhabited dwelling-houses, and that there was no evidence of permanent abandonment of the buildings as dwelling-houses, inasmuch as the evidence showed that they had not been adapted for any other purpose, and might at small cost and in the course of a day or two be made fit for human habitation.

The learned magistrate refused to make a closing order. He was of opinion that as the premises had been so long closed to human habitation, and placed in a position in which a closing order would place them, whatever nuisance proceedings the respondent might be liable to, there was a want of foundation for a closing order, though he thought that if the owner had caused or allowed them to be reopened for purposes of human habitation a closing order might be made whether they were occupied or not.

The question for the opinion of the court now was whether the learned magistrate was right in refusing the closing order.

Reginald Brown, K.C. for the appellant.—I submit that the contention for the appellant in the court below is unanswerable. It is true sect. 29 defines "dwelling-house" as "any inhabited building," but that definition is made expressly subject to the nature of the context. Here the context is clear. Sect. 32 is to apply to dwelling-houses whether occupied or not. Here we have houses which were built for and used for dwelling-houses, and have never been used for anything else, and there is no evidence the owner has definitely abandoned the intention of ever again using them as dwelling-houses. I submit therefore they are still dwelling-houses though not occupied, and that they come within the precise words of sect. 32 (2). Moreover, the learned magistrate was mistaken in thinking that the mere ceasing to use the houses as human habitations has the same effect as a closing order. By sect. 33 of the Act the corporation may after a closing order direct under certain circumstances the demolition of the houses; and see sched. 4 of the Act as to varying order.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I am of opinion that the learned magistrate ought to have made the closing order which was here applied for. While in no way straining the words of the Act the object of the Act should be carried into effect, and the object of the Act is that if after due notice the owner does not put the houses complained of into a proper state of repair, the powers given by the Act are to be exercised. The view of the learned magistrate seems to have been that because for five and a half years the premises had not in fact been inhabited they were therefore not inhabited buildings within sect. 29 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890. But that definition was never intended to limit the ordinary meaning of the expression "dwelling-house," and sect. 32 expressly includes dwelling-houses which are unoccupied. Here the houses were prima facie dwelling-houses, and the fact that they have been for five and a half years uninhabited does not prevent the court from making an order for closing them. It is not necessary to consider what length of non-occupancy would be sufficient to prevent a house being looked upon as a dwelling-house within sects. 32 and 33. Certainly there appears to me to be in this case no objection to the closing order. Practically it amounts to this, that if the owner does not want the houses pulled down he must put them in order. The appeal must be allowed.

LAWRENCE, J.—I agree.

Fishery Acts—Fishery district—Definition of limits of district by Board of Trade certificate—“All waters within the limits of the Act”—Reservoir—Salmon Fishery Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 21), s. 35—Freshwater Fisheries Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 39), ss. 6, 7.

Sect. 6 of the Freshwater Fisheries Act 1878 extends the provisions of the Salmon Fishery Acts with regard to the formation and alteration of fishery districts and the powers of conservators, to “all waters within the limits of the Act frequented by trout or char,” and sect. 7, read in conjunction with sect. 35 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1865, imposes a penalty upon any person fishing in any fishery district with a rod and line for trout or char without the licence of the conservators:

Held, that an artificial reservoir geographically situated within a fishery district and stocked with trout brought from a distance, but not communicating with a river in the fishery district or any of its tributaries except by a valve, is not a “water within the limits of the Act frequented by trout or char,” and the conservators have no power to require a person fishing for trout therein to obtain a licence from them.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the West Riding of the County of York.

At a petty sessions held at Rotherham in the West Riding on the 15th Oct. 1900, an information was preferred by Stead (the appellant) who was the chief water bailiff of the Yorkshire Fishery Board, against Nicholas (the respondent), under sect. 35 of the Salmon Fishery Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 121), as extended to “trout or char” by sects. 6 and 7 of the Freshwater Fisheries Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 39), for that he, the respondent, on the 29th Sept. 1900, at Thrybergh, in the Riding aforesaid, after the time appointed by law in that behalf in the fishery district of Yorkshire, there unlawfully did fish with a rod and line for trout without a proper licence in that behalf.

This information was heard and determined by the justices, who dismissed the same. On the hearing of the information the following facts were admitted or proved:

Thrybergh Reservoir is the property of the Corporation of Doncaster, constructed under the powers conferred by the Doncaster Water Works Act 1873, and is the storage reservoir referred to in sect. 7 of that Act as Storage Reservoir No. 1.

The waters of a small brook, known as Silverwood Brook, are impounded in the reservoir, and conveyed thence by pipes for domestic use in the borough of Doncaster.

Two other subsidiary reservoirs in an adjoining valley supply compensation water for the use and benefit of riparian owners whose water supply was interfered with by the construction of the Thrybergh Reservoir.

In the event of failure to supply compensation water from the subsidiary reservoirs referred to, such water can be, and occasionally is, supplied from the Thrybergh Reservoir. When such supply is necessary from the Thrybergh Reservoir it is effected by means of a valve. No fish can enter the Thrybergh Reservoir from the old course or channel of the brook below the reservoir, and no water passes from the reservoir into the ancient course or channel of the brook unless allowed to pass through the valve under the circumstances referred to.

The channel or old course of the brook below the reservoir joins the Hooton Brook, which latter flows into the river Don. The river Don flows into the river Ouse.

The Thrybergh Reservoir has been stocked with trout brought from a distance by the corporation of Doncaster. Persons fishing therein must obtain a ticket from the corporation, for which payment is made.

The proceeds arising from the sale of the tickets are devoted to the purchase of trout, which are placed in the reservoir, by which means the stock is maintained.

The limits and bounds of the Yorkshire Fishery District were originally defined and declared by the Home Secretary by certificate, given by virtue of the powers given by the Salmon Fishery Acts 1861 to 1873, and in such certificate were then declared to comprise (inter alia) “so much of the rivers Derwent, Wharfe, Nidd, Ure, Swale, Ouse, and Humber, and their tributaries as lies within the county of York,” but the limits of this Yorkshire Fishery District were subsequently, by certificate dated the 21st Jan. 1896 of the Board of Trade acting under the powers conferred by the 3rd section of the Salmon and Freshwater Fisheries Act 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c. 39), altered, extended, and defined as follows:

The limits of the rivers Derwent, Wharfe, Nidd, Ure, Swale, and Ouse, and of the fishery district of the said rivers, include all such estuaries, rivers, streams, brooks, lakes, ponds, canals, dykes, cuts, drains, channels, water-courses, and waters, and all such portions of the sea and sea coast as lie within the following limits.

Namely, the limits defined by certain lines and boundaries in the above certificate set forth and described.

The Thrybergh Reservoir is situate in that part of the West Riding which is within the limits of the Yorkshire Fishery District as defined by the lines and boundaries in the certificate of the Board of Trade, as above set forth and described.

On the 29th Sept. 1900 the respondent was found fishing for trout in the Thrybergh Reservoir by the appellant, who was the duly appointed water bailiff of the Yorkshire Fishery Board.

The respondent was duly authorised to fish therein by ticket granted by the corporation of Doncaster, but was not in possession and had not obtained any licence authorising him to fish for trout from the Yorkshire Fishery Board within the district under the jurisdiction of that board.

It was submitted by the appellant that such licence was requisite, and that any person fishing for trout in the Thrybergh Reservoir, or in any inclosed waters within the limits of the district of the board, without having previously obtained such licence from the board, was liable to the penalty imposed by the 25th section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 121).

It was contended on behalf of the respondent that the Yorkshire Fishery Board had no power

K.B. Div.]

STEAD (app.) v. NICHOLAS (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

or jurisdiction over the Thrybergh Reservoir; that no licence from the board was required for any person fishing for trout therein; and that even if the certificate of the Board of Trade of the 21st Jan. 1896 did in terms include such reservoir within the Yorkshire Fishery District, which the respondent denied, then such certificate was ultra vires, and not authorised by any of the Acts of Parliament under or by virtue of which the certificate was issued and given.

The justices thereupon dismissed the information, and the question of law for the opinion of the court was whether they were right in law in dismissing it.

The Salmon Fishery Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 121), provides:

Sect. 35. From and after a time to be appointed as aforesaid in a fishery district, any person fishing in that district with a rod and line for salmon without a proper licence shall be liable to a penalty of not less than double the amount to be paid for the requisite licence, and not exceeding five pounds.

The Freshwater Fisheries Act 1879 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 39), provides:

Sect. 6. The provisions of the Salmon Fishery Acts 1865 and 1873, which relate to the formation, alteration, combination, and dissolution of fishery districts, and to the appointment, qualification, proceedings, and powers of conservators, shall extend and apply to all waters within the limits of this Act frequented by trout or char; and the term "salmon river," in the fourth and nineteenth sections of the Salmon Fishery Act 1865, and in the twenty-sixth section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873, shall mean any river frequented by salmon, trout or char.

Sect. 7. In any fishery district subject to a board of conservators, the conservators shall have power to issue licences for the day, week, season, or any part thereof, to all persons fishing for trout or char, and in the event of the power being exercised in any fishery district, the provisions of the thirty-third, thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, thirty-sixth, and thirty-seventh sections of the Salmon Fishery Act 1865, and of the twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-fourth, and twenty-fifth sections of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873 (relative to licences) shall, with respect to such district, be construed as if the words "trout or char" were inserted throughout after the word "salmon." Provided as follows: (1) A licence to fish for salmon shall have effect as a licence to fish for trout and char; (2) The fee payable for a licence to fish for trout or char exclusively of salmon in any district shall not exceed one-third of the maximum amount chargeable for fishing for salmon under the provisions of the twenty-first section of the Salmon Fishery Act 1873.

Avory, K.C. and H. T. Waddy, for the appellant. —The justices ought to have convicted the respondent. They were influenced in their decision by the case of George v. Carpenter (68 L. T. Rep. 714; (1893) 1 Q. B. 505); but that case has really no application here, as the words of the certificate given by the Secretary of State in that case were wholly different from the very wide words used in the certificate in the present case. It is found in the case that this reservoir is at all events situate within the geographical limits or geographical district of the Yorkshire Fishery Board, and the question is whether it is within the fishery district within the meaning of the Acts as defined by the certificate given by the Board of Trade. Our contention is that it comes within the limits as defined by that certificate, and that the certificate is not ultra vires. The first of the Salmon Fishery Acts is the Salmon Fishery Act 1861 (24 & 25 Vict. c. 109), which is limited entirely to salmon, and there is no definition of "river" or of the jurisdiction of the board as to rivers, but there are certain provisions as to taking salmon. Then by the amending Act, the Salmon Fishery Act 1865 (28 & 29 Vict. c. 121), in sect. 3, the word "river" is defined as including "such portion of any stream or lake, with its tributaries, and such portion of any estuary, sea, or sea coast, as may from time to time be declared, in manner hereinafter provided, to belong to such river." Under these words there have been several decisions as to the meaning of "tributaries," and it was in consequence of those decisions that we have the wider view now given to these words. By sect. 5 "the limits of a river" were to be defined by a Secretary of State (now the Board of Trade), and it entitles the secretary to include tributaries. The Salmon Fishery Act 1873 (36 & 37 Vict. c. 71) does not carry this matter any further. Then we come to the Freshwater Fisheries Act 1878 (41 & 42 Vict. c. 39), which (by sect. 3) does not "extend to Scotland or Ireland, nor . . . to the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk and the county of the city of Norwich." Sect. 5 of this Act provides that sects. 8 and 9 of the Act of 1861 and sect. 64 of the Act of 1865 (which provides a close time for trout or char), "shall . . . apply to trout and char in all waters within the limits of this Act"—that is, in England. Sect. 64 of the Act of 1865 had provided for the partial application of the Salmon Acts to trout in salmon rivers. The important section in this case is sect. 6 of the Act of 1878, which enacts that the provisions of the Salmon Fishery Acts which relate to the formation &c., of fishery districts and powers of conservators shall extend and apply to "all waters within the limits of this Act frequented by trout or char," and the term "salmon river" shall mean "any river frequented by salmon, trout, or char." Then sect. 7 gives a board of conservators in a fishery district power to issue licences, and provides that sect. 25 of the Act of 1865, which imposes a penalty upon any person fishing in a fishery district with a rod and line for salmon without a licence, shall be construed to include "trout or char." The result therefore is that any person fishing in a fishery district with rod and line for salmon, trout, or char, without a licence from the board of conservators, is liable to the penalty imposed by sect. 35 of the Act of 1865. There is no definition of the words "all waters within the limits of this Act" other than that contained in sect. 3, that the Act is not to extend to Scotland or Ireland, or to the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk or to Norwich. There are decisions as to the meaning of the word "tributary." In George v. Carpenter (ubi sup.), the certificate of the Secretary of State defined the fishery district to be a river and "its tributaries," and upon that it was held that reservoir was not a tributary of the river within the meaning of the certificate, and was therefore not within the jurisdiction of the board. In consequence of that decision the certificate of the Board of Trade in this case was given in much wider form, and includes in this fishery district "estuaries, rivers, streams, brooks, lakes, ponds, canals, dykes, cuts, drains, channels, watercourses, and waters"; and these words are wide enough to include this reservoir, although there is no decision either way as to whether a reservoir is a

"river or waters" within the Act. The respondent therefore ought to have been convicted.

T. Willes Chitty for the respondent. — The justices were clearly right in refusing to convict the respondent. Sect. 6 of the Act of 1878 says that the provisions of the Salmon Fishery Acts in certain respects shall extend and apply to "all waters within the limits of this Act" frequented by trout or char. The case therefore depends on the meaning of the word "waters" in this Act, and to get at this we must look at the meaning in the earlier Acts. Some limit must clearly be put on the phrase "waters," and the meaning as set out in the certificate given by the Board of Trade, is too large; it is outside the Act altogether. This reservoir is not a "water" within the meaning of the certificate at all; and if it does come within the certificate then the certificate is too large and wide, and is ultra vires. The words of the Act are simply "waters," and in no section is the word "ponds" mentioned, and there is no provision in the Act which defines "waters." The nearest approach to a definition is in sect. 11 (3), which says that if any person during the close season fishes for any freshwater fish "in any river, lake, tributary, stream, or other water connected or communicating with such rivers," he shall be liable to a fine. That is the only approach to a definition of "waters" given in the Act of 1878, and I rely on that definition. It does not refer to, and does not include "ponds." In sect. 4 of the Act of 1861, we have a definition of "tidal waters" and "inland waters," but not of "waters." The word "waters" clearly would not apply to an artificial lake, and therefore this reservoir is not a "water" within the meaning of the Act at all. The board would therefore have no power to require a person fishing in the reservoir to obtain a licence from them. [He was stopped.]

Avory, K.C. in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J. — Speaking for myself, I should have been glad if I could have adopted the view presented to us by counsel for the appellant as to this section. It would be a very good thing if, for the purposes of a fishery district, any water frequented by trout or char came within the provisions of the Act of 1865, as amended by the Act of 1878. It seems to me, however, that the course of the legislation has made that view impossible. There was a well-known code with regard to salmon fishery waters, and trout were protected to a certain extent if they happened to be in a salmon river. The Act of 1878 does not make any fresh enactment in sect. 6, but merely extends the provisions of the Salmon Fishery Acts 1865 and 1873, with regard to the formation and alteration of fishery districts to all waters within the limits of the Act frequented by trout or char. I quite agree that it is possible to construe these words as meaning any waters within England other than Norfolk and Suffolk and the county of the city of Norwich, which are excepted from the operation of the Act of 1878 by sect. 3 of that Act; but I think that would give to the word "limits" a very unusual meaning. I think that the real answer to the argument for the appellant is this: The Acts of 1865 and 1873, which are applied to the Act of 1878 by sect. 6 of the latter Act, contain regulations as to the formation of districts; and I think for the purpose of this question the previous decisions apply, by which it was held that the waters which may be included in the district of a river must be tributaries of the river or communicate with the river. I further think that the district is not something separate from the river; but that a fishery district under the Act of 1865 is a district which is formed of more than one river. If that is so, the course of legislation was to apply to trout and char rivers—that is, rivers in which there need not be salmon, but in which there are trout or char—all the provisions of the previous Salmon Fishery Acts. It would, in my opinion, be too strong to say that the restrictions on what could be included in a fishery district, were done away with by legislation by incorporation. Therefore, with regret I come to the conclusion that the refusal of the justices to convict was right, and that this reservoir is not, and cannot at present be, included in the words in sect. 6 of the Act of 1878, "all waters within the limits of this Act."

LAWRENCE, J. — I have unwillingly come to the same conclusion. It seems to me that what was intended by the statute of 1878, was to extend to trout and char the same protection that had been extended to salmon by the Salmon Fishery Acts. The intention of the Legislature evidently was to protect rivers frequented by salmon and to prevent them from being interfered with; but the difficulty was considerably extended in the case of trout, and the same difficulty arose as to whether the limit should be extended further than the river or some tributary of the river. The object was to protect trout and any small streams they might go up for the purpose of breeding, and so forth, and it was on that ground that the case of George v. Carpenter (ubi sup.) was decided. I think the magistrates were right in the view they took.

BROADBENT v. SHEPHERD. (a)

Local government — Public health — Nuisance — Abatement — "Owner" — Person who has ceased to be owner before order — Jurisdiction to make order — Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55), ss. 4, 94, 95, 96, 98, 104.

An order under sect. 94 of the Public Health Act 1875 to abate a nuisance existing on certain premises is not merely a remedy against the person against whom it is made personally, but is also a step in the process which in case the nuisance is not abated, confers the right upon the local authority to enter on the premises and abate the nuisance themselves. Accordingly the fact that the person on whom the notice to abate was served, and against whom the complaint for neglect of such notice was laid, ceases after the complaint comes before the court, but before the order is made, to be owner of the premises within sect. 4 of the Act, does not deprive the court of jurisdiction to make an order to abate against him.

APPEAL by case stated from the decision of the justices of the West Riding of Yorkshire dismissing a complaint laid by the appellant Broadbent on behalf of the Castleford Urban District Council against the respondent as the statutory owner of certain premises in the district, and alleging failure on the part of the respondent to comply with a notice served on him under sect. 94 of the Public Health Act 1875 requiring him to abate certain nuisances on the said premises.

The complaint originally came on for hearing before the justices on the 27th June 1900. It was then proved that the nuisances existed as alleged, but it appeared that the respondent was not the proprietor of the premises in question, but merely the agent and rent collector of the proprietor, a Mr. Donkersley. The justices dismissed the complaint on the ground that the respondent was not the owner of the premises within sect. 94.

On appeal by case stated a divisional court (consisting of Lord Alverstone, C.J. and Kennedy, J.), on the 15th Nov., held, that the respondent as agent was owner of the premises for the purposes of sect. 94 of the Public Health Act, and remitted the case to the justices with an intimation to this effect.

On the 25th Dec. the complaint, having been reinstated in accordance with the decision of the High Court, came on for hearing before the justices. It then appeared that the respondent was no longer agent or rent collector for the premises in question, he having since the previous hearing resigned his agency; and it was admitted that the actual owners of the property had recently been served with notice to abate the nuisance, and that they had actually commenced and carried through part of the work. It was proved, however, that part of the premises was still in a state dangerous to the lives of the tenants, and it was urged on behalf of the appellant that the justices should make an order on the respondent ordering him to abate the nuisance complained of. The justices, however, held that they had no power to make an order on the respondent on the ground that such an order can only be made on a person who is an "owner" of the premises when the order is made.

From this decision the appellant again appealed.

Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55):

Sect. 4. In this Act, if not inconsistent with the context, the following words and expressions have the meanings hereinafter respectively assigned to them—that is to say . . . "Owner" means the person for the time being receiving the rackrent of the lands or premises in connection with which the word is used, whether on his own account or as the agent or trustee for any other person, or who would so receive the same if such lands or premises were let at a rackrent.

Sect. 94. On the receipt of any information respecting the existence of a nuisance, the local authority shall, if satisfied of the existence of a nuisance, serve a notice . . . on the owner or occupier of the premises on which the nuisance arises, requiring him to abate the same.

Sect. 95. If the person on whom a notice to abate a nuisance has been served makes default in complying with any of the requisitions thereof . . . the local authority shall cause a complaint relating to such nuisance to be made before a justice, and such justice shall thereupon issue a summons requiring the person on whom the notice was served to appear before a court of summary jurisdiction.

Sect. 96. If the court is satisfied that the alleged nuisance exists . . . the court shall make an order on such person, requiring him to comply with all or any of the requisitions of the notice.

Sect. 98. Any person not obeying an order to comply with the requisition of the local authority or otherwise to abate the nuisance shall, if he fails to satisfy the court that he has used all due diligence to carry out such order, be liable to a penalty . . . ; moreover, the local authority may enter the premises to which any order relates and abate the nuisance and do whatever may be necessary in execution of such order, and recover in summary manner the expenses incurred by them from the person on whom the order is made.

Sect. 104. All reasonable costs and expenses incurred in making a complaint, or giving notice, or in obtaining any order of the court or any justice in relation to a nuisance under this Act, or in carrying the same into effect, shall be deemed to be money paid for the use, and at the request of the person on whom the order is made . . . and in case of nuisances caused by the act or default of the owner of premises, such costs and expenses may be recovered from any person who is for the time being owner of such premises.

Macmorran, K.C. (Scholefield with him) for the appellant.—If the respondent was owner at the time the notice was given and the complaint was laid and came on for hearing, the justices had jurisdiction to make the order. The fact that when the order was made the person was not in a position to carry it out does not take away such jurisdiction:

Parker v. Inge, 55 L. T. Rep. 300; 17 Q. B. Div. 584.

No doubt the cases of Mayor of Scarborough v. Rural Sanitary Authority of Scarborough (34 L. T. Rep. 768; 1 Ex. Div. 344) and Reg. v. Trimble (36 L. T. Rep. 508) seem to be contrary to the contention, but they must be regarded as overruled by Parker v. Inge (sup.) where (at p. 302 L. T. Rep.) Cave, J. expresses his inability to understand the former of them and his doubts as to the accuracy of the reports. Reg. v. Trimble merely followed Mayor of Scarborough v. Rural Sanitary Authority of Scarborough (sup.). Moreover, this case is distinguishable from these decisions since the respondent was owner within the Act when the complaint first was heard and when the order should have issued. The real point to be remembered is, that this order is not merely a personal order on the respondent; it is a step necessary to give the local authority the right to enter on the premises under sect. 98 and do the work itself. A penalty is under that section only to be imposed when it is shown that the respondent did not use due diligence to carry out the order, and if he could not legally carry it out of course no penalty could be inflicted. Under sect. 104 the owner for the time being and not the respondent would be liable for the costs of the repairs.

The respondent did not appear.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—When the case was originally before the court, which consisted of my brother Kennedy and myself, in November last, we held that the justices ought to have made the order because the person against whom it was sought was the "owner" of the premises in question within the definition of that word contained in sect. 4 of the Public Health Act 1875. For the purposes of the present case I must assume that the order that the justices would have made would have been an order for the abatement of the nuisance within a certain number of days. What happened is that at some time after the first hearing of the case by the justices the respondent, who was then the agent for the true owner of the property, resigned his agency. If the sole object of the application against him were a personal remedy against the individual either by fine or by the imposition of a personal responsibility, different considerations would arise, and it might be said that the court ought not to make an order which would in effect be futile. However, I do not desire to express any opinion on the point. But when sects. 96, 98, and 104 are considered it appears to be plain that the point of the order is in the right which it gives the local authority to enter the premises, and themselves abate the nuisance if necessary, and recover the expenses from the person who is responsible. The justices had originally jurisdiction to make the order against the respondent as owner within the meaning of sect. 4, and therefore, in my opinion, when the case went back to them from my brother Kennedy and me they ought to have made the order which they would have made in the first instance had they then properly construed the Act—that is to say, an order on the respondent to abate the nuisance. That order being disobeyed, the local authority have power under sect. 98 to enter upon the premises and do whatever may be necessary in execution of the order, and then by sect. 104 there is power given them to recover the costs and expenses from the owner for the time being of the premises. I am for these reasons of opinion that the justices ought to have made this order upon the respondent notwithstanding that he had ceased to be the agent for the property when the case was actually determined. The case must be remitted to the magistrates with this expression of our opinion.

CASE stated by justices of the peace for the county of Middlesex sitting as a court of summary jurisdiction at Highgate.

An information was preferred on behalf of the Hornsey Urban District Council (the respondents) under the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34) against William Collins (the appellant) for that he (the appellant), on the 27th Nov. 1900, at the parish of Hornsey, did counsel and procure the defacing of the name of a certain street—to wit, Collingwood-avenue, Muswell Hill, within the district of the council—which had been put up by the council on a conspicuous part of a building near the end of such street, contrary to the provisions of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847.

This information was heard by the justices on the 5th Nov. 1900 and the 2nd Jan. 1901, when the justices convicted the appellant and ordered him to pay a fine of 1s. and costs.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved:—

The appellant in the year 1899 was the owner of the Fortismere building estate at Fortis Green, in the Hornsey urban district, and was still the owner of a large portion of it.

Early in 1899 he submitted to the respondents plans showing the positions and names of certain proposed new streets on this building estate, together with notice of his intention to lay out and construct the same.

One of the proposed new streets shown on these plans was named "Midhurst-avenue" thereon; and the appellant received from the respondents a notice of approval thereof dated the 19th July 1899.

The appellant in Aug. 1899 submitted to the respondents plans and descriptions of sixty-two dwelling-houses to be erected in this street, which was named "Midhurst-avenue" on the plans also, and he received from the respondents notice of approval thereof dated the 14th Aug. 1899, and in this notice of approval they state that they "approve of certain intended works which you propose to execute at Muswell Hill—namely, building sixty-two dwelling-houses in Midhurst-avenue—of which a notice, plan, and description were deposited by you at the above offices, and have this day been laid before us. This approval is subject in all things to the several conditions of the bye-laws and regulations of the council," &c.

The appellant in Sept. 1899 commenced to erect dwelling-houses in the street, which had not then been formed, but was only marked out with stakes. The street was subsequently formed.

At the date of the information ten of the houses had been completed, and twenty-six were in course of erection.

In an agreement entered into in July 1899 by the appellant and the respondents as to sewerage and other works on the building estate, the proposed new streets were referred to as "the intended new roads shown on the said plan," but in one clause "Midhurst-avenue," was mentioned, and in a number of written communications addressed to the appellant by the respondents subsequently to the 13th Sept. 1900, the street was referred to as "Midhurst-avenue," and, referring to this street, the following passages "alter the existing name," "the question of the renaming," and "the proposed new name" occurred therein.

The name "Midhurst-avenue" was put up by the appellant in the street at or near one end of it by means of a notice board affixed to a post. The street had not been known by any other name than that of "Midhurst-avenue" when the respondents proposed to name it "Collingwood-avenue," but it had been referred to as "Midhurst-avenue" in leases and agreements of tenancy relating to houses therein.

Adjoining this building estate was a large house known for many years as "Midhurst," and on the 13th Sept. 1900 the owner of this house objected to the street in question being called "Midhurst-avenue."

There is no street in the district called "Midhurst" other than this street called "Midhurst-avenue"; and no confusion or inconvenience arose from the street being so named.

The respondents on the 24th Sept. 1900 wrote to the appellant in reference to Midhurst-avenue, and, after adverting to an interview in the matter, desired to have at the earliest date the name that the appellant would desire to substitute for "Midhurst-avenue" in the event of their committee deciding to alter the existing name; and the respondents subsequently suggested that the street should be called "Collingwood-avenue." The appellant objected to it being called "Collingwood-avenue," and gave notice in writing of his objection to the respondents.

After failing to agree with the appellant as to the name of the street, the respondents on the 5th Nov. 1900 resolved that it should be called "Collingwood-avenue," and informed the appellant of their intention to put up that name in the street.

The appellant disputed the right of the respondents so to do, and repeated his objection to the intended alteration, and informed the respondents that he would at once remove the name of "Collingwood-avenue" if affixed to his property in the street.

The respondents on the 27th Nov. 1900 affixed a board, with the name of "Collingwood-avenue" thereon, to a house at the end of the street of which the appellant was the owner.

The appellant on the same day caused the board bearing the name of "Collingwood-avenue," which had been attached to his building by the respondents, to be painted over and the name obliterated.

A petition signed by all the owners of property in the street was presented to the respondents after the information was preferred, objecting to the street being called "Collingwood-avenue" instead of "Midhurst-avenue."

The respondents contended: (1) That they were entitled to determine the name by which a new street in their district was to be known; (2) that they determined that the street was to be known by the name of "Collingwood-avenue," and were entitled accordingly to cause such name to be put up on the appellant's house; (3) that they never determined that the street was to be known by the name of "Midhurst-avenue"; (4) that if they had determined that the street was to be known by the name of "Midhurst-avenue" (which they did not admit), they were entitled to alter such name if they thought proper, and to cause another name to be put up; (5) that the appellant was not entitled to pull down or deface the name put up by the respondents.

The appellant contended: (1) That the name of the street was "Midhurst-avenue," and not "Collingwood-avenue"; (2) that the respondents assented to and acquiesced in the name of "Midhurst-avenue," approved plans and descriptions of the proposed street and houses bearing that name, and determined, so far as any determination was necessary, that the name of the street should be "Midhurst-avenue"; (3) that the respondents had no power to alter the name of the street from "Midhurst-avenue" to "Collingwood-avenue," either contrary to the wishes of the owners of property in the street or at all; (4) that the action of the respondents in putting up the name of "Collingwood-avenue" in the street as the name by which it should be known, and for that purpose affixing a board bearing that name to the property of the appellant, was ultra vires of the respondents and an illegal act on their part; (5) that the appellant was therefore not guilty of any offence under the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, or at all, in causing the board bearing the name "Collingwood-avenue" to be removed from his house.

The justices were of opinion that the respondents had power under sect. 64 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 to determine that the street should be known by the name of "Collingwood-avenue," and for that purpose to put up a board bearing that name upon the appellant's house notwithstanding the objections of the appellant thereto, and notwithstanding their previous approval of the plans and description and the other facts herein mentioned, and, further, that, notwithstanding the fact that the street had been named "Midhurst-avenue" by the appellant, the respondents had power to alter that name, and that the appellant was guilty of an offence under the Act in causing the name to be defaced.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the justices, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct determination and decision in point of law. If the court should answer the question in the affirmative, then the conviction was to stand; if in the negative, the conviction was to be quashed or the case remitted to the justices with the opinion of the court thereon.

COLLINS (app.) v. HORNSEY URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

The Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847 (10 & 11 Vict. c. 34) provides, with respect to naming the streets and numbering the houses :

Sect. 64. The commissioners shall from time to time cause the houses and buildings in all or any of the streets to be marked with numbers as they think fit, and shall cause to be put up or painted on a conspicuous part of some house, building, or place at or near each end, corner, or entrance of every such street the name by which such street is to be known; and every person who destroys, pulls down, or defaces any such number or name, or puts up any number or name different from the number or name put up by the commissioners, shall be liable to a penalty not exceeding forty shillings for every such offence.

The Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 55) provides :

Sect. 160. The provisions of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, with respect to the following matters; that is to say (1) with respect to naming the streets and numbering the houses . . . shall, for the purpose of regulating such matters in urban districts, be incorporated with this Act.

Sect. 316. All penalties incurred under the provisions of any Act incorporated with this Act shall be recovered and applied in the same way as penalties incurred under this Act.

Naldrett for the appellant.—Sect. 160 of the Public Health Act 1875 incorporates the provisions of sects. 64 and 65 of the Towns Improvement Clauses Act 1847, with respect to the naming of streets, and sect. 316 of the Act of 1875 provides as to the recovery of penalties, and sect. 157 gives the urban authority power to make by-laws as to the giving of notices and the submitting of plans by persons laying out new streets. Sect. 87 of the Metropolis Management Act 1862 contains—with respect to the metropolis—provisions as to the naming of streets by vestries and district boards, and it is observable that there is given in the section an express power to alter the name of a street to any other name. There is no such express power to alter the name of a street given in sect. 64 of the Act of 1847. The facts stated in the case show that the appellant had put up the name "Midhurst-avenue" as the name of the street; that it had been so described in the plans and in communications with the respondents, and in leases relating to houses therein, and that the respondents had acquiesced in that name; that it had been known by that name, and had never been known by any other name. That being the name of the street, the respondents had no power to alter it. The power of the urban district council to determine the name must depend upon statute; and in sect. 64 the council have power merely to put up the name, but they have no power to alter the name when once put up. The principles applicable in such a case are clearly laid down by Chatterton, V.C. in the Irish case of Anderson v. Lord Mayor and Corporation of Dublin (15 L. Rep. Ir. 410, at p. 419). In that case the householders in a certain street in Dublin brought an action for an injunction to restrain the corporation of Dublin from carrying into effect a resolution passed by them to change the name of the street, and in this action it was held by the Vice-Chancellor that the corporation had no power, either by statute or at common law, to change the name of the street, and that, even if they possessed such power, the court had jurisdiction to restrain them from so doing if satisfied that the change would be injurious to the owners or occupiers of houses in the street. As pointed out by the Vice-Chancellor, the question must depend altogether on statute, and every owner of property has a common law right to call his property by any name he pleases, and the local authority have no power to change it unless such power is given in express terms by statute, which is not so in this case. The acts of the council were in the nature of a trespass to the appellant's property, and, according to the judgment of Chatterton, V.C., the appellant was justified in doing what he did.

Alexander Glen for the respondents.—The conviction by the justices was right. The question is whether when the local authority put up this name, the appellant had a right to pull it down. Under the latter part of sect. 64, the appellant clearly committed an offence in pulling down and defacing the name. The respondents' contention is, first, that the local authority is the proper authority to determine the name of a new street; secondly, this local authority did not accept the name given to the street by the owner; and, thirdly, even if on the facts they may be taken to have accepted the name given by the appellant, they have a right to change it. The local authority did nothing to concur in the name of the street being called "Midhurst-avenue" before they put up their own name. A person has no legal right to the exclusive use of any name he chooses to affix to his property, whether consisting of a house or land; and such a right is not known to the law: (per Jessel, M.B. in Day v. Brownrigg, 39 L. T. Rep. 553; 10 Ch. Div. 294). Therefore the appellant had no such common law right as is contended for to the exclusive use of the name. Sect. 64 itself says that the commissioners shall cause to be put up in each street the name by which the street is to be known, and in this case the respondents merely carried out this provision, a provision which is followed in other Acts dealing with the same subject, as in sect. 145 of the City of London Sewers Act 1848 (11 & 12 Vict. c. cxliii.) and in sects. 33 & 34 of the London Building Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. cccxiii.). Sect. 64 deals with the numbering of the houses as well as the naming of the streets, and provides that such numbering is to be done "from time to time"; and the reason for this is obvious from sect. 65. The Irish case of Anderson v. Lord Mayor and Corporation of Dublin (ubi sup.) is not in point. This was a new street, and the naming of it was the naming of a new street, whereas in that case there was no question as to the naming of a new street, but the question was as to the change of an old name. Chatterton, V.C. there says (15 L. Rep. Ir., at p. 422): "I express no opinion as to the naming of new streets, which plainly involves a different consideration." The appellant had no right to take the law into his own hands and pull down the name after the local authority had put it up. He cannot pull down or deface the name, and by so doing he committed an offence under the latter part of sect. 64. If he objects to the name, he must take the proper proceedings to enforce his objection. The real question is the right to name the street in the first instance. The section gives the local authority that right, and therefore what they did in putting up the name was not a trespass. The case is quite distinguishable from the Irish case, as here there is no question of the change of name as there was in that case. Both on the wording of the statute and on grounds of convenience the local authority were right.

Naldrett in reply.

LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J.—In my opinion the Irish case of Anderson v. Lord Mayor and Corporation of Dublin (ubi sup.) is in no way an authority upon the point that is now before us. As has been pointed out by counsel for the respondents, the Vice-Chancellor there expressly said that he was not dealing with the case of new streets, as to which very different considerations might apply. When you are dealing with the case of altering the name of an old street, one can see at once that very great inconvenience and difficulty may arise if an alteration in the name is forced upon persons when they do not want it. Therefore, if this case had rested on a right claimed by the local authority to change the well-known name of an existing street, speaking for myself, I do not think they have the right to do so, although I do not suppose it is absolutely necessary to decide that point. The language in sect. 64, with which we are now dealing, is very different from the language used in other sections of other Acts, such as sects. 33 and 34 of the London Building Act 1894, to which our attention has been called. In those sections there is a power given to the local authority to alter the name; but I do not see under sect. 64 of this Act of 1847 any right to change the name of an existing street. The facts of this case, however, are very different, but I do not think, as I have said, that if the local authority were claiming to alter an existing name, the section gives them the right to do so. In this case, in the year 1899 the owner, the present appellant, was intending to lay out his estate for building purposes, and on his plans he called the street in question "Midhurst-avenue." That was brought to the knowledge of the local authority, but they exercised no judgment upon the matter as to that name. Some questions have been raised as to objection having been taken by some person, but we must take it that the local authority determined, and that they bona fide determined, that the street ought to be called "Collingwood-avenue." Having come to that determination, they then put up the board with the name of "Collingwood-avenue" thereon. Now, having regard to the duty put upon the commissioners by sect. 64, of putting up the name of the street, and having regard to the words in the latter part of the section that every person who pulls down or defaces the name so put up shall be liable to a penalty, I think it was not open to the appellant to do what he has done in this case—namely, deface the name of the street, and then say that he wished another name given to the street. I think, if he had a right as owner or proprietor to call this street "Midhurst-avenue," that he should have enforced his right by taking proper proceedings to restrain the local authority from putting up the board. I think that the statute does put upon the local authority in the first instance the duty to put up the name, and it imposes a penalty upon persons who pull down or deface that name. I do not think that the question whether the name was a rightful name, or was a wrongful name, should be decided in proceedings like the present for defacing the name put up, prima facie lawfully, by the local authority. This was really a new street, and one can well imagine cases where, if there were several owners or occupiers of land or houses in a street, serious difficulty might arise as to what would be the proper name of the street. Although I think it would be better if the matter were made clear with regard to this particular class of district, by words which would be analogous to those used in the later Acts, such as the Metropolis Management Act 1862 or the London Building Act 1894, yet I do not think we can say, as matter of law, that the local authority were wrong in putting up the name, and that the appellant was justified in painting it out when they had put it up. I think, therefore, that the justices were right, and that this appeal must be dismissed.

Metropolis—House let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family—Bye-laws—Public Health (London) Act 1891 (54 & 55 Vict. c. 76), s. 94.

A block of artisans' dwellings was divided into double and single roomed tenements, each of which were occupied by one family. A w.c., sink, water, and dust shoot were furnished on each floor for the use in common of three or four tenements. The landlord did not live on the premises, but there was a caretaker who (inter alia) cleaned the common passages, staircases, and w.c.'s.

Held, that the block was not a house let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family within sect. 94 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891.

CASE stated on a summons on a complaint preferred by the appellant under bye-laws made by the vestry with respect to houses let in lodgings or occupied by members of more than one family, pursuant to sect. 94 of the Public Health (London) Act 1891, charging the respondent that he, being the landlord of the lodging-house, Artisans' Dwellings, Gun-street, failed to furnish the sanitary authority after notice with particulars with respect to such house, contrary to the bye-laws.

Upon the hearing of the complaint the following facts were proved:—

Artisans' Dwellings, Gun-street, consist of two blocks of buildings, the fronts of which abut on Gun-street and the backs on another street. No. 2 block, the subject of the summons and complaint, is entered directly from Gun-street by a single entrance. There is a front door to the entrance, but no means of fastening the same beyond a Norfolk latch. The figure 2 is affixed to the transom of the door frame. The entrance passage branches into two passages about the centre of the building, and there are two double-duty thus placed upon them, district councils may, by sub-sect. 3 of the same section, institute or defend any legal proceedings, and generally take such steps as they may deem expedient. I do not say that it would not be possible to construe the words of this sub-section as meaning merely that a district council can take or defend proceedings in their own name; but, at the same time, I am of opinion that this would be too narrow a reading of it. To begin with, there are many proceedings taken in the name of the Attorney-General which in reality are proceedings by and on behalf of local authorities. And again, actions may be brought against the servants of local authorities. During the argument I asked Mr. McCall did he contend that the district council could not, under sect. 26 (3), provide funds for the defence of a servant of theirs who was sued for removing an obstruction from a public way? and he hesitated long before he answered, as he well might. An action could, of course, be brought against the surveyor of the district council for removing such an obstruction by order of the council, and if such an action were brought I cannot but think that the council might, in the discharge of the duty in relation to obstruction of public rights of way which is imposed on them by sect. 26 (1), defray the costs of such an action. But to cover the present case we must go a step further. The obstruction here has been removed by persons who were not servants or officers of the district council. Even under these circumstances I think the council may, under sect. 21 (3), provide funds for defending the action, if they think that such a course is expedient. This being the position of the district council, is that of the county council the same after the district council have declined to take action? That depends on sect. 26 (4). That sub-section is not drafted in language so precise as the earlier sub-sections, but the present case does not appear to me to be one where any conclusion can be based on any difference in the language. I think that, as far as this case is concerned, the county council are in the same position as the district council were before they refused to interfere, and that consequently the county council can lawfully contribute to the costs of the defendants in the action, because, upon the resolution for the transfer of powers from the district to the county council, the latter became entitled to the rights given to the district council by sect. 26 (3). It has been argued that the language of sub-sect. 2 of sect. 26, which relates to the aiding of persons in maintaining rights of common, does not give a county council a general right to commence litigation, but seems to indicate that they may contribute to the costs of persons maintaining rights of common. It is said that the presence of this sub-section shows that it is only with regard to these particular rights that the council are justified in giving such aid. Whether the right as to commons is really so limited I will not decide, but I am satisfied that since, under sub-sects. 1, 3, 4, and 5, a duty is imposed on as well as a power given to the district council and to the county council in their place to defend a right of way and rid it of obstruction, we cannot properly limit that power upon the ground that in the instance of the maintenance of common rights, under sub-sect. 2, the duty to aid other people in the assertion and defence of their rights may possibly be of a permissive character.

Local government—Public health—Dwelling-houses—Unfit for human habitation—Uninhabited—Closing order—Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890 (53 & 54 Vict. c. 70), ss. 29, 32.

By sect. 32 (1) of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890, every local authority is put under a duty to ascertain whether any dwelling-house in its district is in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation, and if on the representation of the medical officer of health any dwelling-house appears to them to be in such a state, to forthwith take proceedings against the owner or occupier for closing the dwelling-house. By sub-sect. 2 of the same section, such proceedings may be taken whether the dwelling-house be occupied or not. By sect. 29, "dwelling-house" in the Act means "any inhabited building."

At the hearing of an application for an order under sect. 32 for closing certain houses, it was proved that the houses in question were in such a state that if they had been inhabited they would have been so dangerous to health as to be unfit for habitation, but that, though built and formerly used as dwelling-houses, they had not in fact been occupied for the past five and a half years, and there was no evidence to show that the owner intended to permit them to be occupied again:

Held, that a closing order should be made, and that non-occupancy did not in itself prevent the application of the powers given by sects. 32 and 33 to what was in the ordinary sense a dwelling-house.

Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890:

Sect. 32 (1) It shall be the duty of every local authority to cause to be made from time to time inspection of their district with a view to ascertaining whether any dwelling-house therein is in a state so dangerous or injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation, and if on the representation of the medical officer . . . any dwelling-house appears to them to be in such state to forthwith take proceedings against the owner or occupier for closing the same . . . ROBERTSON v. KING.

[K.B. Div.]

same be occupied or not, and upon such proceedings the court of summary jurisdiction may . . . make a closing order.

By sect. 29 the expression "dwelling-house" in the second part of the Act (which is the part which contains sect. 32) means, unless the context otherwise requires, "any inhabited building."

The appellant in the case stated was the medical officer of health for the city of Sheffield. He had applied under sect. 32 for a closing order in respect of three dwelling-houses, of which the respondent was owner, on the ground that they were used as dwelling-houses and were in a state so injurious to health as to be unfit for human habitation. A summons being issued, it appeared at the hearing that the premises, which were described in the medical officer's complaint as three dwelling-houses situate in a corner of a court in Sheffield, and as being used as dwelling-houses, were old buildings with their appurtenances, and that for a long time after they were built they had been occupied or inhabited, and had been dwelling-houses within the definition of that expression in sect. 29 of the Act. It was proved and admitted that in their present condition they were unfit for human habitation within the meaning of the Act, inasmuch as they were in a filthy, ruinous, and dilapidated state, and that there were filthy and other accumulations upon them which might probably be a nuisance, as to which proceedings might have been taken by the corporation under sects. 91, 94, and 97 of the Public Health Act 1875.

It appeared, however, that about five and a half years previously the houses had been closed to all purposes of human habitation by the then owner, and had not since then been used or reopened for such purposes.

Evidence was called that during the five and a half years the premises had never been used for purposes of human habitation except possibly by a chance person or vagrant creeping in for a sleep, and even this had never been actually known to happen.

It further appeared that the respondent had no intention of having the premises used for human habitation in their present condition; but it did not appear whether he had formed any intention as to rebuilding or repairing them or turning them to other purposes.

In support of the application for the closing order it was contended that the premises the subject of the complaint were dwelling-houses within the meaning of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890, Part 2; that sect. 29, which defines a dwelling-house in that part as "any inhabited building," provides that such definition shall apply "unless the context otherwise provides"; that under sect. 32 (2) the context otherwise requires and provides that the provisions of sect. 32 shall apply whether the premises be occupied or not; that in the present case the buildings had been inhabited dwelling-houses, and that there was no evidence of permanent abandonment of the buildings as dwelling-houses, inasmuch as the evidence showed that they had not been adapted for any other purpose, and might at small cost and in the course of a day or two be made fit for human habitation.

The learned magistrate refused to make a closing order. He was of opinion that as the premises had been so long closed to human habitation, and placed in a position in which a closing order would place them, whatever nuisance proceedings the respondent might be liable to, there was a want of foundation for a closing order, though he thought that if the owner had caused or allowed them to be reopened for purposes of human habitation a closing order might be made whether they were occupied or not.

The question for the opinion of the court now was whether the learned magistrate was right in refusing the closing order.

Reginald Brown, K.C. for the appellant.—I submit that the contention for the appellant in the court below is unanswerable. It is true sect. 29 defines "dwelling-house" as "any inhabited building," but that definition is made expressly subject to the nature of the context. Here the context is clear. Sect. 32 is to apply to dwelling-houses whether occupied or not. Here we have houses which were built for and used for dwelling-houses, and have never been used for anything else, and there is no evidence the owner has definitely abandoned the intention of ever again using them as dwelling-houses. I submit therefore they are still dwelling-houses though not occupied, and that they come within the precise words of sect. 32 (2). Moreover, the learned magistrate was mistaken in thinking that the mere ceasing to use the houses as human habitations has the same effect as a closing order. By sect. 33 of the Act the corporation may after a closing order direct under certain circumstances the demolition of the houses; and see sched. 4 of the Act as to varying order.

The respondent did not appear.

Lord ALVERSTONE, O.J.—I am of opinion that the learned magistrate ought to have made the closing order which was here applied for. While in no way straining the words of the Act the object of the Act should be carried into effect, and the object of the Act is that if after due notice the owner does not put the houses complained of into a proper state of repair, the powers given by the Act are to be exercised. The view of the learned magistrate seems to have been that because for five and a half years the premises had not in fact been inhabited they were therefore not inhabited buildings within sect. 29 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act 1890. But that definition was never intended to limit the ordinary meaning of the expression "dwelling-house," and sect. 32 expressly includes dwelling-houses which are unoccupied. Here the houses were prima facie dwelling-houses, and the fact that they have been for five and a half years uninhabited does not prevent the court from making an order for closing them. It is not necessary to consider what length of non-occupancy would be sufficient to prevent a house being looked upon as a dwelling-house within sects. 32 and 33. Certainly there appears to me to be in this case no objection to the closing order. Practically it amounts to this, that if the owner does not want the houses pulled down he must put them in order. The appeal must be allowed.

LAWRENCE, J.—I agree.

POLL v. DAME. (a)

Merchant shipping—Foreign ship in British port—Desertion of foreign seaman—Inducing such desertion—Merchant Shipping Act 1894 (57 & 58 Vict. c. 60), s. 236 (1).

Sect. 236 (1), which makes it an offence to persuade or attempt to persuade "a seaman or apprentice to . . . desert from his ship," does not apply to the persuading or attempting to persuade a foreign seaman to desert a foreign ship lying in a British port.

P. was a foreign sailor serving on board a Russian ship. While the Russian ship was lying in a British port, A. persuaded him to desert. A. was afterwards prosecuted for an offence under sect. 236 (1) and convicted.

Held, that the conviction was wrong.

CASE stated by the stipendiary magistrate for the county borough of Cardiff.

The respondent was the master of the Russian ship Lennox, which at the time of the alleged offence was lying at the West Dock at Cardiff. The Lennox was not registered or owned in the United Kingdom, and was not a British ship but a foreign ship.

On the 25th Dec. 1900, one Johannes Pilder, who was then a foreign seaman lawfully engaged on the Lennox, met the appellant Poll, a boarding master living at Cardiff. At this interview the appellant persuaded Pilder to desert from the Lennox and to join another ship where he would receive better wages. Pilder did then desert from the Lennox, and on the following day was taken to the railway station at Cardiff by the appellant, who, after providing him with a ticket, saw him leave the station in a train for Bristol in the company of five other sailors and an agent of the appellant. Pilder was subsequently arrested, on a warrant, as a deserter from the Lennox.

Upon the hearing of the information, charging the appellant, under sect. 236 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, with having unlawfully persuaded Pilder to desert from his ship, it was contended on behalf of the appellant that the magistrate had no jurisdiction to hear and determine the case, the offence being charged in respect of a foreign seaman engaged on a foreign ship, and that by sects. 260 and 261 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, Part 2 of the Act (under which head the section creating the offence is classified), was restricted in its application to those ships mentioned in those sections—viz., sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom and sea-going British ships registered out of the United Kingdom.

The magistrate was of opinion that sect. 236 was applicable to foreign ships, that the words "his ship" in that section were as general as the words "any ship in the United Kingdom" in sect. 111, and that, as both sections are classified under Part 2 of the Act, the present case was governed by Reg. v. Stewart (80 L. T. Rep. 660). He therefore convicted the appellant, and fined him 5*l.* and costs, but stated this case for the opinion of the High Court.

June 13.—PHILLIMORE, J. read the following judgment of the court.—This is a case stated by the stipendiary magistrate for Cardiff, and upon it we have to determine whether it is an offence under the Merchant Shipping Act of 1894 to persuade in England a foreign seaman to desert from a foreign ship when such ship is lying in an English port. The language of sect. 236, subsect. 1, is as follows: "If a person by any means whatever persuades or attempts to persuade a seaman or apprentice to neglect or refuse to join or proceed to sea in or to desert from his ship, or otherwise to absent himself from his duty, he shall for each offence in respect of each seaman or apprentice be liable to a fine not exceeding 10*l.*" By sect. 742 "seaman" includes every person (except masters, pilots, and apprentices, duly indentured and registered) employed or engaged in any capacity on board any ship. The language of the Act is thus wide enough to cover this case; but it is contended on behalf of the appellant that Part 2 of the Merchant Shipping Act, in which this section is found, applies only (except in certain specified places) to British ships, and the word "ship" in sect. 236 must be read as meaning British ship. Sect. 236, making it criminal to persuade desertion, may be looked upon as supplementary to the earlier sections, which made desertion itself punishable. They are sects. 221 to 224, both inclusive, and sect. 238. Sects. 221 to 224 are in equally general terms, and they follow upon sect. 220, which contains express words limiting its own application to the crews of British ships; there is, therefore, some ground for supposing that sects. 221 to 224 were not intended to be so limited. The sections as to the application of Part 2 are sects. 260 to 266, both inclusive. By sect. 260 this part "shall, unless the context or subject-matter requires a different application, apply to all sea-going ships registered in the United Kingdom, and to the owners, masters, and crews of such ships," with certain qualifications as to lighthouses, vessels, yachts, and fishing-boats, which are dealt with in sects. 262 and 263. By sect. 261 this part shall, unless as aforesaid, apply to all sea-going British ships registered out of the United Kingdom, and their owners, masters, and crews in respect of certain specified matters, one of which is discipline. It will be important to note that this specification of details occurs only in the section which deals with British ships registered out of the United Kingdom, and that there is the same arrangement in sect. 109 of the Act of 1854, which in substance corresponds with the two sects. 260 and 261 of the Act of 1894. This is not unimportant in view of some observations of Blackburn, J. in the case of Leary v.

Lloyd (3 E. & E. 178). Sect. 264 enables colonial Legislatures to adopt any provisions of this part which do not otherwise apply, and sect. 265 provides for the case of an apparent conflict of laws "in any matter relating to a ship or to a person belonging to a ship." This section would meet the case of a conflict between the laws of different parts of His Majesty's dominions; but it might have a wider application in the case of any sections of Part 2 of the Act which apply to foreign ships. Sect. 266 is not material to this case. It is clear, therefore, that as a general rule this part of the Act is not to apply to foreign ships—that is to say, it is not to be enforced against foreign ships or owners of foreign ships, or persons on board foreign ships, or as to matters done or to be done on foreign ships. But it does not, therefore, necessarily follow that it does not apply to persons who have deserted from foreign ships or to English subjects who in England have abetted such desertion. A formidable argument, however, against the application of the section as to desertion from foreign ships is derived from sect. 238. By this section, where it appears to the Crown "that due facilities are or will be given by the Government of any foreign country for recovering and apprehending seamen who desert from British merchant ships in that country," the Crown may by Order in Council direct that this section shall apply, and where it applies and a seaman deserts when within any of the king's dominions from a merchant ship belonging to a subject of that country, "any court, justice, or officer that would have had cognisance of the matter if the seaman had deserted from a British ship shall, on application of a consular officer of a foreign country, aid in apprehending the deserter," and may "order him to be conveyed on board his ship or delivered to the master . . ." It is said that it is only under this section that desertions from foreign ships can be dealt with by an English court, and also that this section would be unnecessary if the general provisions of sects. 221 to 224 applied to foreign as well as British ships. The third sub-section of sect. 238 inflicts a penalty not exceeding 10*l.* for harbouring or secreting a deserter who is liable to be apprehended under this section. This is said to overlap the second sub-section of sect. 236. There is no sub-section in sect. 238 corresponding with sub-sect. 1 of sect. 236, under which the information in the present case is laid. The weight of this argument is to a certain extent lessened by the consideration that the Act of 1894 is a consolidating Act, and includes not only the Act of 1854, but several other Acts. Sect. 238 is a re-enactment of the Foreign Deserters Act 1852 (15 & 16 Vict. c. 26), an earlier Act than the Act of 1854. It may well be that the Act of 1854 did make that of general application which had only limited application by the Act of 1852; and in some respects the special provisions of the Act of 1852, as reproduced in sect. 238, are different from the general provisions in the Act of 1894. Still, in our opinion, having regard to the terms of sect. 221, the general sections as to deserters, 221 to 224, do not apply to cases which come, or may come by the operation of an Order in Council, under sect. 238. The procedure is different; the seaman to whom sect. 222 applies is to be conveyed on board his ship, not by warrant of the court, but by the master or certain other persons, with or without the assistance of a police constable, and may require to be taken before a court to be dealt with according to law. More complicated provisions are applied to cases under sect. 223. But under sect. 238 there is to be a warrant under which the man is to be conveyed on board his ship, and when the warrant has been issued the seaman apparently has no direct right to have recourse to the court which issued it. The penalty for harbouring is different, and in sect. 238 there is a significant proviso to which we have not yet referred excepting the case of a seaman who is a slave. There is no such proviso in sects. 221 to 224. We therefore come to the conclusion that sects. 221 to 224 apply only to British ships, and that the offence of desertion from a foreign ship is punishable only under sect. 238, and where that section has been applied by Order in Council. Similarly, we must hold that the offence of harbouring a deserter from a foreign ship comes, if at all, under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 238, and does not come under sub-sect. 2 of sect. 236. Holding this, can we hold that sub-sect. 1 of 236 applies in respect of foreign ships? We think it is impossible so to hold. The words "seaman" and "ship" in sub-sect. 1 must have the same limited meaning as the same words in sub-sect. 2. This view is in accordance with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the year 1860 in the case of Leary v. Lloyd (sup.) upon the parallel section (257) of the Act of 1854. We have, however, not held ourselves concluded by that decision, but have reconsidered the matter upon the following grounds: First, the case was only argued on one side; secondly, Blackburn, J. who delivered the judgment of the court, seems to have thought that there was something special in the sections about discipline limiting their application, though possibly not the application of the other section in the other part of that Act, to British ships, and we think this is not so. Thirdly, we think the case of The Milford (Swabey, p. 362) was not brought to the notice of the court. Now, the case of The Milford is certainly an authority for not restricting Part 3 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 to British ships. Dr. Lushington, in dealing with the argument that the 109th section of the Act of 1854 restrained the application of sect. 191, says, "The language there used, however, is affirmative, stating the cases to which the third part of the Act shall extend; there are no negative words which extend to show that the court should not apply sect. 191 to foreign masters and seamen." This observation is perfectly general, and the authority of Dr. Lushington on shipping matters and on the construction of Acts was so high that it is unfortunate that The Milford case was not brought before the Court of Queen's Bench before it decided Leary v. Lloyd (sup.). It should be added that the law as decided in The Milford case has been accepted ever since, and that the remedies given by sect. 191 were, and those of the corresponding section (sect. 167 (1) of the Act of 1894 are, always afforded in proper cases to masters of foreign ships. On the other hand, it may be said Dr. Lushington's judgment may well be supported on other grounds as well, and that he relied on other grounds as well. The decision may rest upon the ordinary rule as to the application of the lex fori. Again, the effect of sect. 191 was to enable the master to sue in the Admiralty Court and thereby to obtain process in rem against the ship. By the ordinary maritime law as administered in the other countries he had this right always, just as a seaman had. The English law had been exceptional in denying him this remedy, and in denying it to him because of a point of internal jurisdiction. When sect. 191 brought the maritime law of this country into line with that of other countries it would have been absurd that the anomaly thus removed from municipal cases should have been left for foreign ones. These considerations certainly affect the weight of The Milford case as an authority in the present case. On the other hand, the case of Cope v. Doherty (2 De G. & J. 614) and the class of cases represented by The Zollverein (Swabey, 96) show that there were other parts of the Merchant Shipping Act 1854 which our courts have declined to hold to be applicable to foreign ships. We do not, however, decide this case upon the ground that no sections in Part 2 of the Act of 1894 apply to foreign ships. We agree with our brethren Darling and Channell in the case of Reg. v. Stewart (80 L. T. Rep. 660; (1899) 1 Q. B. 964) that there may be acts done in relation to foreign ships which when done by English subjects in England come as much under the present provisions of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894 as if they were done in relation to English ships. We think that the case they had to deal with was one of such cases. We ground our decision upon the fact that this part of the Act (Part 2) contains a special provision for the case of desertion from foreign ships, and has thus shown that its general provisions are limited to desertion from British ships. We hold, therefore, the appellant was not liable to conviction under sect. 236 of the Merchant Shipping Act 1894, and that the appeal must be allowed with costs.

Conviction quashed.

BARNETT v. POPLAR BOROUGH. (a)

Tramway—Highway—Obligation to repair—Contract with road authority—Transfer of obligation—Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), ss. 28, 29, 55.

By sect. 28 of the Tramways Act 1870 the promoters of a tramway are placed under statutory liability to keep in repair in such manner as the road authority shall direct so much of the road as lies between the rails of the tramway, and for 18in. beyond the rails on each side of the tramway.

By sect. 29 they may enter into agreements with the road authority with respect to the paving and keeping in repair of the whole or any portion of the roadway of any road on which they lay any tramways.

By sect. 55 they and their lessees are liable in damages for any accidents happening in consequence of any of their works.

(a) Reported by J. ANDREW STRAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

Held, that when a tramway company enters into an agreement with the road authority by which the latter undertakes to keep in repair the roadway of the roads on which the tramway lies, the liability of the company for accidents arising through such roadway not being kept in repair is thereby transferred to the road authority along with the liability of the company to keep such roads in repair.

Dictum of Lord Coleridge, C.J. in Howitt v. Nottingham Tramways Company (50 L. T. Rep. 99; 12 Q. B. Div. 16) approved and applied.

APPEAL from a decision of the judge of Bow County Court.

On the 6th Sept. 1900 the plaintiff's van while proceeding along the Bow-road struck against the rail of the tramway belonging to the North Metropolitan Tramways Company, and sustained injury. It was alleged that the rail projected an inch and a half above the level of the street owing to failure on the part of the defendants to keep the street in proper repair.

By sect. 28 of the Tramways Act 1870 (33 & 34 Vict. c. 78), the promoters of tramway companies are put under a liability to maintain and keep in good condition and repair in such manner as the road authority shall direct so much of the road as lies between the rails of the tramway and for 18in. beyond the rails on each side of the tramway.

By sect. 29 the road authority on the one hand and the promoters on the other hand may from time to time enter into and carry into effect "contracts, agreements, or arrangements, with respect to the paving and keeping in repair of the whole or any portion of the roadway of any road on which the promoters shall lay any tramway. . . ."

By sect. 55:

The promoters or lessees . . . shall be answerable for all accidents, damages, and injuries happening through their act or default, or through the act or default of any person in their employment, by reason or in consequence of any of their works or carriages, and shall save harmless all road and other authorities, companies, or bodies collectively and individually . . . from all damages and costs in respect of such accidents, damages, and injuries.

In pursuance of sect. 29 of the above Act, the North Metropolitan Tramways Company had contracted with the defendants (the corporation of Poplar Borough), as the road authority of the district, that the latter should keep in proper repair that part of the road which the company were liable to repair under sect. 28.

The plaintiff brought this action in the County Court for damages for the injury to his van, and put in the contract between the tramway company and the defendants, but the judge nonsuited the plaintiff.

The plaintiff appealed.

Abinger for the plaintiff.—When the road authority took over under the contract the obligation of the company to repair the road, it also took over the liability of the company to compensate persons injured through neglect to repair. An agreement under sect. 29 frees the tramway company from liability for non-repair. That was decided in Howitt v. Nottingham Tramways Company (50 L. T. Rep. 99; 12 Q. B. Div. 16). In delivering judgment in that case Lord Coleridge,

K.B.] MAYOR, &C., OF BOROUGH OF HUNTINGDON, &C. v. HUNTINGDON COUNTY COUNCIL. [K.B.]

C.J. expressed a strong opinion that the road authority took over the liability of which the company had become freed. This case has since been followed by the Court of Appeal in Aldred v. West Metropolitan Tramways Company (65 L. T. Rep. 138; (1891) 2 Q. B. 398), when Lord Coleridge's decision was approved without any limitation or qualification as to this dictum.

Chester Jones for the defendants.—As public authorities the defendants were not liable at common law for non-repair:

Cowley v. Newmarket Local Board, 67 L. T. Rep. 486; (1892) A. C. 345.

Nothing but express statutory enactment could alter their position in this respect:

Municipality of Pictou v. Geldert, 69 L. T. Rep. 510; (1893) A. C. 524.

There was no express provision in the Tramways Act 1870 making a road authority who took over the repair of the road under sect. 29 liable for non-repair, and Lord Coleridge's opinion, to the effect that the liability of the tramway company went over under a contract within that section, was merely obiter dictum. Though the decision in Howitt v. Nottingham Tramways Company (sup.) was approved by the Court of Appeal in Aldred v. West Metropolitan Tramways Company (sup.), nothing was there said as to Lord Coleridge's dictum.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—I think that the County Court judge was premature in nonsuiting the plaintiff. But for the decisions in Howitt v. Nottingham Tramways Company (sup.) and in Aldred v. West Metropolitan Tramways Company (sup.), there would be much that could be said in favour of the view that the action could be brought against the tramway company, for the liability imposed upon the tramway company is a statutory liability, and it might, I think, be reasonably contended that, being statutory, it was a liability it could not rid itself of. But in Howitt v. Nottingham Tramways Company (sup.) it was expressly laid down that where, as here, the tramway company enter into a contract with the road authority under sect. 29 of the Tramways Act 1870, and the road authority undertake the repair of the road on which the tramway is laid, the tramway company are exonerated from liability under the Act. The judgment of Lord Coleridge goes further, and declares that the liability is transferred to the road authority by the contract under sect. 29. It is said that this opinion was not necessary to the decision. Nevertheless, it seems to me more than a mere dictum; it is very material to the decision, since it would be a very strong thing to say that this liability being imposed by Parliament the tramway company can get rid of by an agreement which does not impose it on any other body. That would be the result if the tramway company could divest themselves of liability without the road authority becoming liable instead. When Howitt v. Nottingham Tramways Company (sup.) came before the Court of Appeal in Aldred v. West Metropolitan Tramways Company with the express object of having that decision reviewed, it was affirmed. If the Court of Appeal differed from the dictum of Lord Coleridge it certainly seems surprising under the circumstances that it did not say so.

I think, therefore, that the County Court judge stopped the case too soon, and that the nonsuit is wrong. The case must, therefore, go back for a new trial.

LAWRENCE, J.—I agree.

MAYOR, &C., OF THE BOROUGH OF HUNTINGDON AND OTHERS v. HUNTINGDON COUNTY COUNCIL. (a)

Local government—Borough without separate commission of the peace—Justices' clerk—Proper authority to appoint—Payment of clerk's salary—Unappropriated fines and fees in borough—County Council entitled to receive—Justices' Clerks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 43), s. 5—Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50), ss. 154, 159.

Sect. 159 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, which imposes upon the justices of a borough the duty of appointing their clerk, applies only to boroughs which have a separate commission of the peace, and therefore the mayor and ex-mayor of boroughs which have no separate commission of the peace are not entitled under that section to appoint a justices' clerk.

In the case of boroughs having no separate commission of the peace, a justices' clerk cannot be appointed either by the mayor and ex-mayor, acting in conjunction with the county justices, usually acting for the petty sessional division in which the borough is situated, or by such county justices themselves, to perform solely the duties of clerk in matters arising within the borough; and if a petty sessions court be held in the borough, it must be held for the petty sessional division.

The county justices of the petty sessional division in which such a borough is situated (including the mayor as a county justice under sect. 22 of the Local Government Act 1888) are the proper persons to appoint a clerk for that division; and, if they bring themselves within the provisions of sect. 5 of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877, by appointing more than one place for holding petty sessions in the petty sessional division, they may appoint a second clerk for that division; but the clerk or clerks so appointed are clerks for the petty sessional division and not for the borough; and the salaries of such clerks are payable by the county council, who are entitled to receive the unappropriated fines and fees imposed in petty sessions held within such borough.

SPECIAL CASE stated by consent in an action pursuant to Order XXXIV., r. 1.

The plaintiffs were the Mayor, Aldermen, and Burgesses of the Boroughs of Huntingdon, Godmanchester, and St. Ives respectively, and the defendants were the County Council of Huntingdonshire.

The following statement of facts and questions to be submitted to the court were agreed upon by

(a) Reported by W. W. ORR, Esq., Barrister-at-Law

the above-named borough councils and county council:

The boroughs of Huntingdon, Godmanchester, and St. Ives are all situate in the county of Huntingdon, and each of them has a population of less than 10,000. The several parishes in and forming part of the boroughs are assessed to the county rate levied for the county in like manner as other parishes within the county.

The two first-named boroughs are very ancient boroughs. The borough of St. Ives was incorporated in the year 1874. All three boroughs are governed by the provisions of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, and are policed by the county force.

None of these boroughs has a separate commission of the peace, and the jurisdiction of the Quarter Sessions of the county extends to all three.

The county of Huntingdon is divided into four petty sessional divisions. The boroughs of Huntingdon and Godmanchester are situate within the Leightonstone petty sessional division, and the borough of St. Ives is situate within the Hurstingstone petty sessional division. There is one salaried clerk to the justices for each of the Leightonstone and the Hurstingstone petty sessional divisions. Each of such clerks is appointed by the justices acting in and for the petty sessional division in which he is clerk, and his salary is paid by the Huntingdonshire County Council.

The justices acting in and for the Leightonstone petty sessional division hold the special and petty sessions for the division in the petty sessional court house, in the county hall, within the borough of Huntingdon. At such sessions the justices deal with all matters cognisable by a court of special or petty sessions arising within the petty sessional division other than those arising within the boroughs of Huntingdon and Godmanchester.

The justices acting in and for the Hurstingstone petty sessional division hold the special and petty sessions for the division in the petty sessional court house within the borough of St. Ives. At such sessions the justices deal with all matters cognisable by a court of special or petty sessions arising within the petty sessional division other than those arising within the borough of St. Ives.

From the passing of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 up to the present time petty sessional courts have been regularly held in the boroughs of Huntingdon (in the town hall) and Godmanchester, and in the borough of St. Ives from the time of its incorporation, but on days different from those on which the special or petty sessions for the Leightonstone and Hurstingstone petty sessional divisions are held.

The mayor and ex-mayor of each borough as justices for such boroughs by virtue of the provisions of sect. 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, and any county justices who choose to attend form the petty sessional court for each borough respectively, and deal with all matters cognisable by a court of special or petty sessions arising within each borough respectively, except in licensing matters, in which the mayors and ex-mayors, unless themselves county justices, do not act.

Salaried clerks to perform the duties of clerk of special sessions, petty sessions, and of the justices, acting in and for the respective boroughs, have been appointed as to Huntingdon and Godmanchester since 1835 by the mayor and ex-mayor of such boroughs respectively, as justices for such boroughs and the county justices usually acting in each of such boroughs, and as to St. Ives in the case of the present clerk and his predecessor by the county justices for the Hurstingstone petty sessional division, but the appointment of the present clerk was, immediately after his appointment by county justices, confirmed by the mayor and ex-mayor at the borough petty sessions. For the borough of Huntingdon the clerk is not, but for the borough of Godmanchester he is, the same person as the clerk for the Leightonstone division, and for the borough of St. Ives the clerk is the same person as the clerk of the Hurstingstone division, separate salaries being paid in each case.

Up to the passing of the Local Government Act 1888 the salaries of the clerks referred to in the last preceding paragraph so appointed as aforesaid, were paid out of the borough fund of the respective boroughs and the fines and fees imposed and taken at the special and petty sessions holden in and for the boroughs respectively, which were not by the statutes imposing and authorising the same specially directed to be paid to any other person (in this case referred to as the "unappropriated fines and fees") were paid to the treasurers of the respective boroughs and credited by them to the borough fund of their respective boroughs.

None of the boroughs had any scale of fees peculiar to its own borough, but the county scale was and is treated as applicable and acted upon in each borough court and all fines imposed at such borough petty sessions were imposed in respect of offences against the general law and not under local statutes.

After the passing of The Local Government Act 1888 until May 1899 the county council paid the salaries of the clerks so appointed for the boroughs and a return was made by the clerks of all unappropriated fines and fees, and the amounts thereof were paid over to the treasurer of the county.

After May 1899, in consequence of the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of Theftford Corporation v. Norfolk County Council (79 L. T. Rep. 315; (1898) 2 Q. B. 468), the auditor objected to such salaries being paid by the county council and threatened to surcharge the same if continued, and the county council have from that date declined to make any further payments in respect of such salaries, and such salaries have since been paid out of the respective borough funds of the boroughs, and the unappropriated fines and fees have in the cases of the boroughs of Godmanchester and St. Ives been paid into the borough funds of these respective boroughs, while in the case of the borough of Huntingdon the unappropriated fines imposed by the court of that borough, and the fees payable in respect of proceedings in such court, have continued to be paid to the county treasurer.

In June 1900 the clerk of the county council applied for a return of the unappropriated fines and fees imposed and taken in the borough courts, and for payment thereof to the county treasurer on the ground that the same were payable to the treasurer of the county, notwithstanding that the salaries of the justices' clerks acting in and for the boroughs and other expenses connected with the holding of the petty sessions in the respective boroughs had been since May 1899 paid out of the borough funds and not by the county, but payment thereof has not been made to the treasurer of the county by the boroughs of Godmanchester and St. Ives.

The plaintiffs contended that: (1) The mayor and immediate ex-mayor of the respective boroughs of Huntingdon, Godmanchester, and St. Ives are entitled to appoint a clerk for the borough for which they are justices respectively pursuant to sects. 155 and 159 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882. (2) All unappropriated fines or penalties and fees imposed and received in the courts held in the boroughs are payable to the treasurer of such boroughs respectively, and the town council of such boroughs are liable to pay the salary of the justices' clerk acting in and for each of such boroughs and the expenses of and incidental to holding special sessions and petty sessions of the peace in and for each of such boroughs.

Alternatively: (1) The mayor and immediate ex-mayor of each of the boroughs are entitled, in conjunction with the justices usually acting for the petty sessional division in which such boroughs are respectively situated, to appoint a salaried clerk to perform the duties of clerk of petty sessions, special sessions, and of the justices acting in and for such borough or place pursuant to sect. 155 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 and sect. 5 of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877. (2) If the unappropriated fines or penalties and fees imposed and received in the courts held in the boroughs are payable to the county council, the county council are liable to pay the salaries of the several justices' clerks and the expenses of and incidental to holding special sessions and petty sessions of the peace in and for each of the boroughs.

The defendants contended that: (1) The mayor and immediate ex-mayor of the respective boroughs of Huntingdon, Godmanchester, and St. Ives, are not entitled to appoint a justices' clerk. (2) If they are entitled to appoint such clerk, all unappropriated fines or penalties and fees imposed and received by and in the special and petty sessional courts held in and for each of the boroughs are nevertheless payable to the county treasurer, and the county council is under no liability to pay the salary of such clerk, or the expenses of or incidental to the holding of special and petty sessions in and for any of the boroughs. (3) The mayor and immediate ex-mayor of each of the boroughs, in conjunction with the justices of the county usually acting for the division in which such borough is situate, are not entitled to appoint a salaried clerk to perform only the duties of clerk of the special and petty sessions held in and for such borough and of clerk of the justices acting in and for such borough. (4) If they are entitled to appoint such salaried clerk, all unappropriated fines or penalties and fees imposed and received by and in the special and petty sessional courts held in and for each of the boroughs are nevertheless payable to the county treasurer, and the county council is under no liability to pay the salary of such clerk or the expenses of or incidental to the holding of special and petty sessions in and for any of the boroughs.

The questions for the opinion of the court were: (1) Are the mayor and immediate ex-mayor of the respective boroughs of Huntingdon, Godmanchester, and St. Ives entitled to appoint a justices' clerk? (2) If they are entitled to appoint such clerk, to whom should be paid all unappropriated fines or penalties and fees imposed and received by and in the special and petty sessional courts held in and for such boroughs, and who is liable to pay the salary of such clerk and the expenses of and incidental to the holding of special and petty sessions in and for the boroughs? (3) Are the mayor and immediate ex-mayor of each of the boroughs, in conjunction with the justices of the county usually acting for the division in which such borough is situated, or are the justices of the county usually acting for the division in which such borough is situated, by themselves entitled, if it seem fit, to appoint a salaried clerk to perform solely the duties of special and petty sessions held in and for such borough and of the justices acting in and for such borough? (4) If such mayor and immediate ex-mayor, in conjunction with such county justices, or if such county justices by themselves are entitled to appoint such salaried clerk, to whom should be paid all unappropriated fines or penalties and fees imposed and received by and in the special and petty sessional courts held in and for each of the boroughs, who is liable to pay the salary of such clerk and the expenses of and incidental to the holding of special and petty sessions in and for each of the boroughs?

The Municipal Corporations Act 1882 (45 & 46 Vict. c. 50) provides, under the heading "County Justices":

Sect. 154. (1) Where a borough has not a separate court of quarter sessions, the justices of the county in which the borough is situate shall exercise the jurisdiction of justices in and for the borough as fully as they can or ought in and for the county.

Borough Justices.

Sect. 155. (1) The mayor shall, by virtue of his office, be a justice for the borough, and shall, unless disqualified to be mayor, continue to be such justice during the year next after he ceases to be mayor.

Sect. 156. It shall be lawful for the Queen, on the petition of the council of a borough, to grant to the borough a separate commission of the peace.

Sect. 157. (1) It shall be lawful for the Queen, from time to time, to assign to any persons Her Majesty's Commission to act as justice in and for each borough having a separate commission of the peace.

Sect. 158. (1) A justice for a borough shall, with respect to offences committed and matters arising within the borough, have the same jurisdiction and authority as a justice for a county has under any local or general Act with respect to offences committed and matters arising within the county; except that he shall not, by virtue of his being a justice for the borough, act as a justice at any court of gaol delivery or quarter sessions, or in making or levying any county or borough rate.

Sect. 159. (1) The justices for a borough shall, from time to time, appoint a fit person to be their clerk, to be removable at their pleasure.

Sect. 160. (1) The council of a borough having a separate commission of the peace shall provide and furnish a suitable justices' room, with offices, for the business of the borough justices.

K.B.] MAYOR, & C., OF BOROUGH OF HUNTINGDON, & C. v. HUNTINGDON COUNTY COUNCIL. [K.B.]

The Local Government Act 1888 (51 & 52 Vict. c. 41) provides:

Sect. 84. (1) The salaried clerk of every petty sessional division shall be from time to time appointed, and removed, as heretofore. (2) The county council shall pay to the salaried clerks of petty sessional divisions such salaries as may be fixed under the enactments relating to those clerks, and all fees and costs payable to such clerks which are not excluded in the fixing of their salaries shall be paid into the county fund, and in the enactments relating to such salaries and fees the standing joint committee shall be substituted for the quarter sessions justices and the local authority respectively.

The Justices' Clerks Act 1877 (40 & 41 Vict. c. 43) provides:

Sect. 5. In each petty sessional division there shall, after the first day of February one thousand eight hundred and seventy-eight, or any later date at which an order for the payment of a clerk by salary in lieu of fees comes into operation in the division, be only one salaried clerk in the division to perform the duties of clerk of petty sessions, clerk of special sessions, or clerk of any justice or justices of the peace: Provided that: (1) Where special or petty sessions are usually held at more than one place appointed for the purpose in a petty sessional division, there may, if it seem fit, be a separate salaried clerk appointed in respect of each such place . . . and (4) A Secretary of State, on the application of the local authority, may, if he thinks fit, authorise in any case the appointment of more than one salaried clerk. The salaried clerk (in this Act referred to as a clerk of a petty sessional division) shall be appointed from time to time by the justices acting in and for the petty sessional division in which he is clerk assembled in special sessions, and shall hold his office during the pleasure of those justices.

Asquith, K.C. (W. W. Mackenzie with him) for the plaintiffs.—Two questions arise, first, by whom, in case of certain boroughs, the salaried clerk to the justices in petty sessions ought to be appointed; and, secondly, by whom the salary of the clerk should be paid. These questions depend on certain sections of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, the Local Government Act 1888, and the Justices' Clerks Act 1877, and particularly on the series of sections of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, ss. 155 to 159. The point is whether sects. 158 and 159 of the latter Act apply to boroughs which have no separate commission of the peace. If they do so apply, then the power of the justices to appoint a clerk is clear. Sect. 154 deals with the jurisdiction of county justices in a borough which has no separate court of quarter sessions, and gives such justices jurisdiction to act in the borough as in the county. Then we have a series of sections, by the first of which (sect. 155) the mayor and ex-mayor of every borough are, by virtue of their office, justices. Then the next two sections—sects. 156 and 157—deal with boroughs having a separate commission of the peace and are interpolated sections. Then sects. 158 and 159 must be read as applying to boroughs not having a separate commission of the peace, and sect. 159 says that the justices of a borough—that is, if this be the correct reading, of a borough not having a separate commission of the peace—shall have power to appoint their clerk, and by the 5th schedule amongst the payments out of the borough fund, which may be made without order, is the remuneration of the clerk to the justices. The statutory authority for appointing a clerk to justices outside boroughs is contained in sect. 5 of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877, by which the salaried clerk of a petty sessional division is to be appointed by the justices acting for that division. We have, therefore, two sets of salaried clerks, those for the county and those for the borough. Sect. 158 must apply to the mayor and ex-mayor as justices for the borough, as well when there is no separate commission of the peace as where there is a separate commission. It is perfectly general and there is nothing in it to limit it to boroughs having a separate commission. The natural interpretation, therefore, of sect. 158 is that it applies to boroughs generally, and it cannot be argued that sect. 159 is necessarily dealing with boroughs with a separate commission because there is an interposed section (sect. 158) which deals with boroughs generally. Then the crux of the whole question is whether sect. 159 applies only to boroughs having a separate commission of the peace. It is necessary to bear in mind that this is a consolidating Act, and that the corresponding section in the Municipal Corporations Act 1835 (5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76), s. 102, provided that justices of every borough to which a separate commission of the peace had been granted should appoint the clerk. The power to appoint the clerk was thus expressly granted to boroughs "to which a separate commission of the peace shall be granted." In sect. 159 of the Act of 1882, these words are omitted, thus showing that the section is general, and is not limited to boroughs having a separate commission. Whoever appoints the clerk ought to pay him, and whoever pays him ought to receive the fees. That is a logical position and a common-sense view, and it was the position adopted till the payment was disallowed by the auditor. Under sect. 5 of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877 the county justices have power, where the sessions are held at more than one place, to appoint a clerk for each place. Therefore, if the appointment rests with them, as regards two of the places (Huntingdon and Godmanchester), there would be power to have two clerks, because the sessions are held at two places; and as regards St. Ives there might also be the same power under sub-sect. 4 if the Secretary of State consented. By sect. 84 (1) of the Local Government Act 1888, the salaried clerk of every petty sessional division is to be appointed as heretofore; so that that Act makes no change in the appointment of clerks. The case on which the auditor objected to the salaries being paid by the county council—namely, Thetford Corporation v. Norfolk County Council (79 L. T. Rep. 315; (1898) 2 Q. B. 468)—has very little bearing on the case, as the borough in that case had a separate commission of the peace, and the decision throws no light on this case.

C. A. Russell, K.C. (Brooke Little with him), for the defendants.—The clerks for these boroughs ought not to exist at all. In the case of the petty sessional divisions of the county of Huntingdon no occasion exists for exercising the power given by sect. 5 of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877, and there is therefore no justification for imposing on the county the burden of paying two salaries for duties which can properly be performed by one person. The clerks for these boroughs are not clerks for the petty sessional divisions, nor were they appointed as clerks under sect. 5, sub-sect. 1, of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877. The clerks for these boroughs could not have been lawfully appointed under sect. 159 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882, unless that section applies to boroughs which have no separate commission of the peace; and they could not have been appointed under sect. 5, sub-sect. 1, of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877 except by county justices at special sessions, if petty sessions were held at more than one place. These clerks were not appointed in that way under the Act of 1877, and in the case of St. Ives the second clerk could not be appointed there, as the petty sessions are not held for that division in more than one place. The question is, could they have been appointed under sect. 159 of the Act of 1882, and the answer to that depends on whether all the sections from sect. 156 to sect. 159 are governed by the consideration of the borough being a borough having a separate commission of the peace. The borough which is spoken of in sect. 159 is a borough which is not part of the county and which has a separate commission of the peace. The two preceding sections deal in terms with boroughs which have a separate commission of the peace, and sect. 159 forms one of the same group of sections and is governed by the same consideration. The position of the mayor and ex-mayor of a borough which has no separate commission of the peace was considered in the case of Mayor of Reigate v. Hart (18 L. T. Rep. 237; L. Rep. 3 Q. B. 244), and it was there held that where the borough has no separate commission of the peace, the mayor and ex-mayor act as county justices. That decision was under sect. 57 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1835, which is about identical with sect. 155 of the present Act of 1882. So sect. 160 in terms applies to a borough having a separate commission of the peace. Therefore with regard to sect. 159—coming as it does in a series of sections referring to boroughs with a separate commission of the peace—it would be extraordinary if that section were held to apply to boroughs other than those having a separate commission. Sect. 159 applies only to boroughs having a separate commission of the peace. These clerks for the boroughs, therefore, had no legal existence at all; the mayor and ex-mayor were not entitled to appoint them. The case of Mayor of Reigate v. Hart (ubi sup.) also shows that the fines ought to be paid to the county treasurer, and not to the borough treasurer.

Asquith, K.C. in reply.—I do not now contend that sect. 159 applies to this case; on the contrary, I think that that section was intended to apply to boroughs having a separate commission of the peace. By sect. 22 of the Local Government Act 1894, the mayor, but not the ex-mayor, is a justice of the peace for the county. If a second clerk has to be appointed, the mayor (as being a justice for the county) and the county justices are the appointing body, and in that view we have to consider sect. 5 (1) of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877. The question is one, not of jurisdiction, but of the convenient administration of justice; and the justices could say with regard to offences arising in district A. that they should be tried in that district, and those arising in district B. should be tried in that district. They could thus have two places and two clerks.

KENNEDY, J.—The questions submitted to us in this case are four in number. The first question is, Are the mayor and immediate ex-mayor of these three boroughs entitled to appoint a justices' clerk. My answer to that question is that the mayor and ex-mayor are not entitled to appoint a justices' clerk, because, in my opinion, sect. 159 of the Municipal Corporations Act 1882 has no application except to the case of a borough with a separate commission of the peace. Then with regard to the second question, it does not arise after the answer given to the first question. Then the third question is, Are the mayor and ex-mayor of the boroughs, in conjunction with the justices of the county usually acting for the division in which the borough is situated, or are the justices of the county usually acting for the division in which such borough is situated, by themselves entitled to appoint a salaried clerk to perform solely the duties of special and petty sessions held in and for such borough? In my opinion, the power to appoint a salaried clerk rests with the justices of the petty sessional division. Then I answer that question in this way. Those justices, who are justices for the petty sessional division, may appoint a salaried clerk for the division, and they may also appoint a second clerk for the division, provided they can bring themselves within the power given by sect. 5, sub-sect. 1, of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877, but not otherwise. My answer, therefore, to the third question is that clearly they could not so appoint a clerk. The justices could not themselves appoint a clerk to perform duties solely as to matters arising within the borough. What they can do is this: If the case comes within sect. 5, sub-sect. 1, of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877, then they can appoint, under and as prescribed by that sub-section, a second clerk for the whole of the petty sessional division, if special or petty sessions are usually held at more than one place in that petty sessional division; and further, with regard to the "places" at which petty sessions are held, the two places may be places both within the borough, and not necessarily one within and one without the borough. That will be for the determination of the justices of the particular petty sessional division. Then with regard to the fourth question that does not arise after the answers we have given to the other questions. What, however, we can say, in answer to that question, is, that the moneys referred to in that question should be paid—as the county justices are alone entitled to appoint the clerk—to the county treasurer; and with regard to the payment of the salary of the clerk, that question is determined by sub-sect. 2 of sect. 84 of the Local Government Act 1888, which provides that: "The county council shall pay to the salaried clerks of petty sessional divisions such salaries as may be fixed under the enactments relating to those clerks." That provision will apply whether there is one clerk only appointed, or whether a second clerk is appointed under the power given by sect. 5 of the Justices' Clerks Act 1877.

PHILLIMORE, J.—I agree, and I will only add this: When we say that the mayor has no power to appoint, we mean that he has no power as mayor to appoint; but the mayor is, under and by virtue of sect. 22 of the Local Government Act 1894, a county justice, and he does not lose his privilege as a county justice because he is mayor.

OVERSEERS OF BOOTLE (apps.) v. LIVERPOOL WAREHOUSING COMPANY (resps.); SAME (apps.) v. J. AND T. WEBSTER (resps.). (a)

Rating—Empty warehouse—Occupation—Intention—Liability to rates.

From a date prior to the making of certain rates the respondents gave notice to the appellants that they intended to keep certain warehouses unoccupied during the current overseers' year, and to claim exemption from the rates in respect thereof.

All goods had been removed before the making of the rate, and the warehouses had not been used since that date, though they were advertised in the list of warehouses to let belonging to the respondents. Each warehouse was one of a block, through which continuous shafting passed, and at the end of the block was a notice: "For storage, apply to the L. W. Company."

A warehouse in respect of which notice had been given to the appellants was still advertised on the cards issued by the respondents, and they had tried to let it by notice affixed on the warehouse.

Held, that the justices were justified in coming to the conclusion that there was no occupation of these warehouses so as to render the respondents liable to be rated in respect thereof.

Mayor of Southend-on-Sea v. White (ante, p. 18; 83 L. T. Rep. 408) considered.

OVERSEERS OF BOOTLE v. LIVERPOOL WAREHOUSING COMPANY.

CASE stated upon a complaint preferred on behalf of the appellants against the respondents for that they, being duly rated and assessed to the relief of the poor of the borough of Bootle and to the maintenance of the police in that borough by certain rates made the 26th March 1900, had not paid the same, but had neglected or refused to do so.

Upon the hearing of the complaint it was admitted that the respondents carried on the business of warehouse owners and warehouse keepers at (among other places) five warehouses in Bedford-place, fourteen warehouses in Effingham-street, four warehouses in Princes-street, and six warehouses in Globe-road, all in the borough.

The rate-book showing the rating of the respondents in respect of all the premises and the allowance by the justices was duly produced, and the allowance and the due publication of the rate and the demand for and nonpayment of the rates were duly proved. Each warehouse was separately assessed.

It was admitted that on the 26th March 1900, when the rate was made, the respondents were in occupation of all the warehouses with the exception of the three which were described as follows: Warehouse "L," in Globe-road; warehouse "E," in Bedford-place; and warehouse "D," in Bedford-place, in the borough.

In June 1900 the respondents gave notice by two letters to the appellants that it was the intention of the respondents to keep the three warehouses above referred to unoccupied during the whole of the current overseers' year, and to claim exemption from all rates in respect thereof.

The following are copies of the letters:

The Liverpool Warehousing Company Limited, 19, Brunswick-street, Liverpool, June 15, 1900.—The Collector, Poor Rate Office, Bootle.—Dear Sir,—On behalf of the Liverpool Warehousing Company Limited I beg to give you notice that the warehouses as enumerated below have not been occupied from the end of March last, and, owing to the present state of the warehousing business, it is our intention to keep these warehouses out of occupation for the whole of the current year, and to claim exemption from all rates and taxes.—"J, K, and L," three warehouses, Globe-road; "R, S, T, and U," four warehouses, Effingham-street; "C and D," two warehouses, Princes-street.—Yours faithfully, A. SLER.

The Liverpool Warehousing Company Limited, 19, Brunswick-street, Liverpool, 19th June 1900.—The Collector Poor Rates, Bootle.—Dear Sir,—Referring to my letter of the 15th June, I find that "C" warehouse, Princes-street, was put on the list in error, and would be obliged if you would kindly correct my list as follows: "D," one warehouse, Princes-street; "D and E," two warehouses, Bedford-place; these having been empty from the beginning of April.—Yours truly, A. SLER.

It was proved to the satisfaction of the justices that warehouse "L" had been empty since the 14th March 1900, that warehouse "D" had been empty since Oct. 1899, and warehouse "E" since the 20th March 1900, and it was also proved that all goods of every description had been removed therefrom at the dates respectively, and that from the dates respectively the three warehouses had been looked up and had not been used by the respondents for the purposes of their business. It was also proved that each of the warehouses was one of a block of warehouses belonging to the respondents in which they carried on their business as aforesaid, and at the end of each block there was a notice to this effect: "For storage, apply to the Liverpool Warehousing Company"; that in their business the respondents issued lists of their warehouses, that the lists included the three warehouses "L," "D," and "E," and that no alteration was made in the lists at or since the time when the warehouses became empty as aforesaid. It was also proved that the warehouses contained shafting and hoists for use in the warehousing business, the shafting being continuous throughout each block of warehouses. That there was nothing to prevent goods being moved from one warehouse to another, but that there was no internal connection between the warehouses in each block. That the warehouse "L," in Globe-road, is insured, and that since it became empty it had been inspected by the insurance company's agent who was accompanied by a man in the employ of the respondents.

It was contended on behalf of the appellants that the proved and admitted facts showed that the respondents were liable to be rated as occupiers of each of the three warehouses on the 26th March 1900.

(a) Reported by W. DE B. HERBERT, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B.] OVERSEERS OF BOOTLE v. LIVERPOOL WAREHOUSING CO.; SAME v. J. & T. WEBSTER. [K.B.]

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that the facts did not show any occupation of the three warehouses, or any of them, by the respondents on the date such as would make them liable for the rates.

The justices were of opinion that no occupation of the warehouses "L," "E," and "D" by the respondents had been proved, and that the respondents were not liable to be rated therefor, and, in so far as the complaint applied thereto, they dismissed the same.

The question for the court to decide was whether, under the circumstances, there was such occupation of the warehouses "L," "E," and "D" by the respondents proved as to make them properly rateable to the relief of the poor and for the maintenance of the borough police in respect thereof.

Pickford, K.C. (Greer with him) for the appellants.—The justices here have missed the point of the case, for they have considered the question of profit from the premises. In Mayor of Southend-on-Sea v. White (ante, p. 18; 83 L. T. Rep. 408) the respondent held certain premises on a lease or licence for years, and entered into possession and used the premises as a shop. At the end of the summer, as the business then ceased to be remunerative, he locked up the shop and left it, with the intention of not reopening the same for business until the beginning of the following summer. During this interval he did not return to the premises, and no one lived there. All the stock was removed, but fixtures and some other articles were left there. A general district rate was made for the half year, during the whole of which the shop was closed, and it was held that the respondent was in occupation of the premises during the time they were so closed, and was liable therefore to pay this half year's rate. That case is an authority here. [RIDLEY, J. referred to Tyne Coal Company v. Wallsend Overseers, 35 L. T. Rep. 854.] The only thing that prevented these warehouses being used was that there was no trade or custom to use them. It is just the same as if no customers came into a shop. They are ready to be used at any moment. [BIGHAM, J.—But is not that the same with an empty house?] Yes. But occupation is a question of fact, and taking away all the furniture would show that there was no occupation, but these warehouses are naturally kept empty. Of course I agree that unless there is an occupation, a rate cannot be made. The facts that the boards were not taken down or the circular altered are important as showing intention. [BIGHAM, J.—But do the facts show an intention to use the premises?] I submit, yes. This is the case of a place that must be kept empty. The fact that there are no chattels here is no element in this case. [BIGHAM, J.—The question seems to be whether the mere expression of intention not to use is sufficient.] I submit that is so, and the intention expressed here is not any more than that in Mayor of Southend-on-Sea v. White (sup.), which was to go away and not occupy for six months.

Danckwerts, K.C. (Tobin with him) for the respondents.—The point to be decided here is whether the magistrates were justified in finding as they did. In Holywell Union v. Halkyn Drainage Company (71 L. T. Rep. 818; (1895) A. C. 117), Lord Herschell says, at p. 125: "The question whether a person is an occupier or not within the rating law is a question of fact, and does not depend upon legal title. The person legally possessed may not occupy. On the other hand, a person may be occupier either with or without the consent of the owner." [RIDLEY, J.—But that does not show that there can be no question of law upon a question of occupation.] The point here is as to the state of affairs on the 26th March, and whether the facts were such as to justify the justices in coming to the conclusion that they did. I say that there was evidence to justify this conclusion, as all the goods were cleared out, and the premises were locked up. In the case of Mayor of Southend-upon-Sea v. White (sup.), the justices, having found certain facts, held that in law the respondent was not in occupation of the premises during the period in question. In that case everything was left in the shop in the way of fixtures. Lush, J. in Willing v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee (37 L. T. Rep. 126; 2 Q. B. Div. 581) says: "It is not easy to give an accurate and exhaustive definition of the word 'occupier.' Occupation includes possession as its primary element, but it also includes something more. Legal possession does not of itself constitute an occupation. The owner of a vacant house is in possession, and may maintain trespass against anyone who invades it, but as long as he leave it vacant he is not rateable for it as an occupier."

Greer in reply.

RIDLEY, J.—In this case we come to the conclusion that the decision of the magistrates was the correct one. The question seems to shape itself in the following way: Certain facts are set out in the case, from which facts, which are not in dispute, the magistrates came to the conclusion that there was not any occupation of these three warehouses. Then they ask us to decide whether under the circumstances there was such an occupation of the warehouses as to make the respondents properly rateable to the relief of the poor. Now, I think that means, "Is there a principle of law according to which we were compelled to find in the opposite way from what we do find and what we did find? That is to say, upon these facts we came to the conclusion that there was not an occupation; but if the law says that upon these facts legally and as a matter of law there was, why then the decision must be reversed." So far as it is a finding of fact, it is not for us to interfere with them. If there be a principle of law which says that upon such facts as the present the warehouses were still in occupation for the purpose of the poor rate, we should reverse their decision, but not otherwise. Now, it lies on the appellants to make out that there was this principle of law, and also it lies upon them to show that there was occupation. Upon both the grounds it lies upon Mr. Pickford to make out this matter. I do not think he has succeeded in doing so. Perhaps it is unnecessary for me to run through the facts which are stated in this case, but shortly stated it comes to this, that three of the warehouses had been empty for a considerable period, one from the 14th March 1900, the other from Oct. 1899, and the third from the 20th March 1900. In June 1900 a notice was given that there was no intention of using these three warehouses for the full year to elapse from the end of March 1900. It seems that upon the days in question which I have now mentioned, all the goods of every description had been removed from the warehouses, and that from those dates they had been locked up and not used. It is true that there had been a notice which had been there before, which had been left at the end of each block of warehouses, which was this: "For storage, apply to the Liverpool Warehousing Company"; that there was but one pile of buildings, of which these three warehouses were portions; and upon that fact reliance is placed by the appellants in seeking to make out that there was an occupation; but I think, as a matter of fact, the proper inference from these facts is that from the date at which the goods had been removed there was a bona fide intention by the warehousing company not to use these three particular warehouses during the year. A difficulty may arise upon that part of the case in this way, that I think we ought to infer that, if the trade had required it, they would have resumed the occupation and use of these warehouses. But that is an indefinite date. What we have to see is what the state of things was at that time, and I think the proper inference is that then and at that time there was an intention to abandon and not to use these three warehouses for that particular time. A distinction may be drawn, perhaps, in that respect between this case and the one of Mayor of Southend-on-Sea v. White (ante, p. 18; 83 L. T. Rep. 408), but that case is distinguishable also upon another ground, not only that at the return of the season it was certain that the shopkeeper would return, but also that he had left in that shop sundry articles which were necessary for the purpose of carrying on his trade and which were not fixtures. I cannot help thinking, on looking at that decision, there may have been good reason for supposing that, if nothing had been left in the shop except the bare fixtures, there might, although I do not say there would, have been a decision the other way. Upon these facts there is any principle of law which makes it necessary for us to say that a warehouse so left intentionally empty and unused is in occupation for the purpose of the poor rate? I do not think that there is. No case exactly in point has been quoted, the nearest being that of Mayor of Southend v. White (sup.), but the principle has been quoted from a judgment of Lush, J. in Willing v. St. Pancras Assessment Committee (37 L. T. Rep. 126; 2 Q. B. Div. 581), from which it would appear, so far as I can apply that case to the present case, that that principle would not apply, and that this may be treated as vacant premises in the same way as a house which contains nothing in the way of furniture may be treated as a vacant house although there is a present intention to let it, and although there be a notice upon the door that it would be let, if persons applied to take it. In that case there would be a use and occupation if it was let to anybody. So in this case, if the intention to leave the warehouses unused were to cease upon the occasion arising, there would then and there be an occupation. That is apparently a similar condition of things to that which would arise if the vacant house was let. Under the circumstances I do not see why we should not apply it here as far as we can, and, judging from the facts found in this case, I think we ought to say there is no principle of law which on such a state of facts compels us to say the warehouses were in occupation. For these reasons I think the justices were right in finding that there was none, and that there is no occasion to send the case back.

BIGHAM, J.—I agree. The question is whether upon the 26th March these warehouses were occupied so as to make them rateable—that is to say, were they occupied by the respondents for the purpose of their business? That is, in my opinion, a question of intention—of course a bona fide intention—to be answered with reference to the circumstances of the case; in other words, it is a question of fact. Now, what are the facts here? The facts here are found in the case. I need not read them. There are facts which point to an intention not to occupy, not to carry on the business of the respondents in those particular premises. It is said that there are some facts which point the other way—namely, that a board which probably had been in existence for a very long time upon the block of the warehouses of which these particular warehouses formed part, stating that application might be made to the respondents for warehouse room, was still up. Another fact is that these particular warehouses were still left in the list on the circular issued by the respondents; and another fact is that apparently there was some shafting running through these warehouses, connected with other warehouses which were in use, used for the purpose of the hoisting gear in the warehouses, and that this shafting revolved in the unused warehouses when the shafting was being used for the purpose of the warehouses where the work was going on. But all that amounts merely to this, that there were facts on the one hand and facts on the other hand. It was for the magistrates to say what conclusion of fact they drew from all these particular circumstances. They came to the conclusion that the facts did not justify them in finding that there was any occupation of these warehouses on the 26th March. For my own part, although it is not necessary that I should say anything about it, I agree with them. I think there was no occupation in point of fact upon the 26th March, and that therefore the respondents were entitled as a matter of fact to succeed before the magistrates. But, as I say, I do not think that is a matter for us to decide. The question we have to decide is whether there were facts before the magistrates which could justify them in coming to the conclusion to which they did. In my opinion there were. There was ample evidence in the facts to show that there was in fact no occupation of these premises upon the 26th March by the respondents for the purpose of their business, and therefore I agree with my brother that this appeal must be dismissed.

OVERSEERS OF BOOTLE v. J. AND T. WEBSTER.

Case stated by justices upon a complaint claiming poor and police rates.

The respondents were the lessees of six warehouses in Bootle, the lease of which expired at the end of the year 1900, and the respondents did not at the time of the rate intend to apply for a renewal.

K.B. Div.]

PYM (app.) v. WILSHER (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

They were rated and assessed separately in respect of each of the warehouses.

The rate was made on the 26th March 1900. On the 5th Jan. 1900 the respondents gave notice to the appellants that one of the warehouses was empty and untenanted, and that they claimed to be exempt from rates in respect thereof.

In the course of the respondents' business the warehouses in question were let sometimes by space and sometimes by single tenancies for separate warehouses, and the amount of space vacant varied with the amount of storage.

The respondents carried on their usual business in the other five warehouses.

They issued cards in connection with their business, and the empty warehouse was advertised on such cards.

The warehouse had been empty since the 5th Jan. 1900, on which day the last of the goods stored therein had been removed in the ordinary course of business, and no goods had been stored therein since, but the respondents had tried to let it by notice on the warehouse, but owing, however, to the state of trade they had not succeeded in doing so.

It was contended by the appellants that by reason of the above facts, which were proved and admitted, the respondents were in occupation of the warehouse, and were properly rated in respect thereof, as well as the remaining five warehouses.

On behalf of the respondents it was contended that, inasmuch as they had closed the warehouse and had given notice to the appellants thereof before the 26th March 1900 when the rate was made, and as the warehouse remained closed and untenanted, they were not liable to be rated in respect thereof.

The justices were of opinion that these facts did not afford evidence of such occupation as would make the respondents liable in respect of this warehouse, and they dismissed the complaint so far as it referred to the same.

Pickford, K.C. and Greer for the appellants. Danckwerts, K.C. and Tobin for the respondents.

RIDLEY, J.—I think this case is the same as the other. I do not find anything to distinguish it from the former decision. Therefore the judgment must be to the same effect.

BIGHAM, J.—Perhaps it is not so strong as the other one, but the same reasoning applies.

Vaccination—Child born before the 1st Jan. 1899

—Application of statute—Condition precedent—

Vaccination Act 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 84), s. 31

—Vaccination Act 1898 (61 & 62 Vict. c. 49), ss. 1 (3), 2.

Where proceedings are taken under sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act 1867 in respect of a child born before the coming into operation of the Vaccination Act 1898, compliance with the provisions in sect. 1, sub-sect. 3, of the Act of 1898 is not a condition precedent.

The provisions of sect. 2 of the Vaccination Act 1898 apply to the case of children born before the coming into operation of that Act.

CASE stated upon an information laid by the appellant against the respondent under sect. 31 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84.

Upon the hearing of the information the following facts were proved or admitted:—

The respondent was the father of the child, which was born on the 18th Aug. 1897, and he had received on the 23rd Oct. 1900 a copy of the notice requiring him to have the child vaccinated within fourteen days, and also a prior notice to the same effect, and the child had not been vaccinated. It was also admitted that these notices were the only ones that had been given, and the notice of the public vaccinator of the district to the parent of the child to visit the home of the child as prescribed by sect. 1 (3) of the Vaccination Act 1898 had not been given, and also that the public vaccinator had not visited the home of the child and offered to vaccinate the child with glycerinated calf lymph or otherwise as required by that section.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that the child having been born before the coming into operation of the Vaccination Act 1898—i.e., the 1st Jan. 1899—the respondent did not come within sect. 1 (3) of that Act in respect of the child.

It was also contended on behalf of the appellant that under sect. 31 of 30 & 31 Vict. c. 84, unless the respondent proved some reasonable excuse to have his child vaccinated, an order to vaccinate must be made.

For the respondent it was contended that the Vaccination Acts 1867 to 1898 must be read together as one Act, and that sect. 1 (3) of the Act of 1898 applied to all children, whether born before or after the coming into operation of that Act, in all cases where the proceedings are taken alleging default to have arisen after the 1st Jan. 1899.

The justices were of opinion that the Vaccination Acts 1867 to 1898 are to be read as one Act so far as the provisions thereof are not expressly repealed, and also that the notice of the vaccination officer, dated the 23rd Oct. 1900, before mentioned, was expressed to be given under the Acts 1867 to 1898, and that in the Vaccination Act 1898 are no words which can be construed as not applying to children born before the passing of that Act except in sect. 2 (2), which contains special provisions as to children born before the passing of the Act. They were also of opinion that the provisions of sect. 1 (3) of the Act of 1898 were imperative and not optional, and were therefore a condition precedent to an application for an order under sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act 1867, and upon the facts before them they did not see fit to make an order.

They therefore dismissed the summons.

Etherington Smith for the appellant.—There is nothing in the Vaccination Act 1898 to show that the visit of the public vaccinator under sect. 1 (3) of that statute is a condition precedent

ELLIOTT (app.) v. PILCHER (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

to proceedings under sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act 1867. The respondent was in default on the 1st Jan. 1899, at which date the Vaccination Act 1898 came into operation. A notice having been served under the Act of 1867, it was not necessary to serve another, or to visit the home of the child under sect. 1 (3) of the Act of 1898. The provisions of the later statute do not apply to children born before the coming into operation of that Act.

The respondent did not appear.

RIDLEY, J.—As the case stands, although I should like to have heard an argument on behalf of the respondent, I have come to the conclusion that the justices were wrong and they might have made the order asked for by the appellant. Sect. 1 (3) of the Vaccination Act 1898 is part of the general provisions of the Act. I think that that sub-section would probably apply in the case of a child born before the passing of the Act. This seems to be likely, because sect. 2 (2) says that in the application of that section—viz., sect. 2—to a child born before the passing of the Act there shall be substituted for the period of four months from the birth of the child, the period of four months from the passing of the Act. It assumes that that section, which is the section which exempts from penalties any persons who satisfy the justices that they conscientiously believe that vaccination would be prejudicial to the health of the child, would apply in the case of a child born before the passing of the Act. It seems probable that the same would be the case as regards sect. 1. But I find a difficulty in saying that the provision of sub-sect. 3 requiring the public vaccinator to visit the home of the child is a condition precedent to proceedings taken under sect. 31 of the Vaccination Act 1867. The Act of 1898 is no doubt a statute meant to be beneficial to parents, but it does not say that before proceedings are taken under sect. 31 it must be shown that the public vaccinator has visited the home of the child. The justices seem to have thought that such a visit was a condition precedent, and in so holding I think they were wrong.

Adulteration—Milk—Warranty—Contract for future deliveries—Application of warranty to particular deliveries—Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 63), ss. 9, 25.

Sect. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875 cannot apply to the offence of abstracting from an article of food, with the intent that the same may be sold in its altered state without notice, any part of it so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, created by sect. 9 of that Act. It applies to the other offence created by that section—namely, of selling the article so altered without making disclosure of the alteration.

A general warranty in writing contained in a contract for future deliveries of milk is sufficient to satisfy sect. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875. It is not necessary to show on the face of the warranty that it applies to the particular sale of milk, as it is sufficient to show the connection by evidence. The section does not require a specific warranty with each particular sale of milk.

Laidlaw v. Wilson (1894) 1 Q. B. 74) followed.

Robertson v. Harris (82 L. T. Rep. 536) not followed.

Harris v. May (12 Q. B. Div.) dissented from.

CASE stated upon an information preferred by the appellant against the respondent, under sect. 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, charging him that he, having in his possession a certain article of food called milk, unlawfully and with intent that the same should be sold in its altered state without notice, abstracted from such article of food a part of it, so as to affect injuriously its quality.

At the hearing it was proved on behalf of the appellant that on the 20th July 1900 he purchased a pint of milk from the manager of the respondent in the prescribed manner, and submitted a third part to the public analyst, who duly gave his certificate of the analysis, which he proved.

The respondent wrote to the appellant, inclosing a copy of the warranty he had received from the persons from whom he had bought the milk, which was as follows:

To Mr. A. B. Pilcher, trading as the King-street Dairy Company, Margate.—We hereby warrant that each and every supply of milk sent by us shall be new milk unadulterated and with all its cream.—July 29, 1899.

He also sent notice of his intention to rely upon such warranty within the time prescribed by sect. 20 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875.

The vendor of the milk deposed to having made a verbal contract with the respondent in Jan. 1897 to supply him with milk for the King-street Dairy, and said that the contract had continued up to the present time without suspension, and that he had continuously supplied the dairy with daily quantities; that he had given the written warranty in July 1899 at the respondent's request; and that the warranty was still in force and applied to the milk supplied to the respondent on the 20th July.

The justices found as facts that the milk sold to the appellant on the 20th July was the milk supplied to the respondent under the contract and warranty, and, considering that the respondent had proved to their satisfaction the matters mentioned in sect. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, they discharged him from the prosecution.

A case was applied for by the appellant upon the following points of law: (1) That the warranty formed no part of the contract; (2) that there was nothing to show on the face of it that the warranty applied to the particular sale of milk on the 20th July; and (3) that there must be a specific warranty with each sale of milk.

The justices, after hearing the evidence on oath in proof of such warranty being then in force and on the admission on oath of liability thereunder being given by the wholesale dealer, came to the conclusion that the validity of such warranty was a question of fact only and that no question of law arose thereon, and that in these circumstances the wholesale dealer was liable under his warranty, and they dismissed the information on these grounds.

The question arising upon the above statement is whether the warranty was a good defence to the information.

Stuart Sankey for the appellant.

The respondent did not appear.

June 12.—BIGHAM, J.—In this case an information was laid by the appellant against the respondent under sect. 9 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875. Now, that section provides that no person shall, with the intent that the same may be sold in its altered state without notice, abstract from an article of food any part of it so as to affect injuriously its quality, substance, or nature, and no person shall sell any article so altered without making disclosure of the alteration, under a penalty in each case not exceeding 20l. It is with the first offence created by the section that the respondent is charged. The information is "that on the 20th July 1900, at the parish of St. John the Baptist, and in the said borough, having in his possession a certain article of food called milk," the respondent "unlawfully did, with intent that the same should be sold in its altered state without notice, abstract from such article of food a part of it so as to affect injuriously its quality." The section, it is to be observed, in addition to the words which are followed in the information, says that no person shall sell the article so altered without making a disclosure of the alteration. That is another offence, and with which the respondent is not charged. He is only charged under the first part of the section. The question we are here asked to decide is whether, under the circumstances set out in the case, the respondent has brought himself within the protection provided by sect. 25 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875. By that section, if the defendant in any prosecution under that Act proves to the satisfaction of the justices that he has purchased the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect; that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold it that the article was otherwise; and that he sold it in the same state as when he purchased it, then he is to be discharged from the prosecution. The only point we have to consider is whether one part of the section has been complied with—that is, that relating to the written warranty. We are to assume that the other parts of the section have been complied with. For myself I do not believe that sect. 25 has anything to do with the offence with which the respondent is charged. That section only applies to a sale, and in my opinion does not relate to the offence with which the respondent is charged here at all. The Act creates several offences. Sects. 3 and 4 prohibit the mixing, &c., of any food or drug with injurious ingredients, and the selling the same. It is to be noticed that those sections also create the offence of selling the article when mixed, and by sect. 5 it is provided that no one shall be convicted under those sections in respect of the sale of any article of food or any drug if he shows absence of knowledge, and that he could not with reasonable diligence have obtained that knowledge. In my opinion sect. 25 does not apply to offences under those sections. Sect. 6 makes it an offence to sell to the prejudice of the purchaser any article of food which is not of the nature, substance, and quality of that demanded by the purchaser. Sect. 25 does apply to that section, and also to sect. 7, which forbids the sale of any compound article of food or compounded drug which is not composed of ingredients in accordance with the demand of the purchaser. But the offences under sect. 9 are different, and here the offence charged is not selling, but abstracting from the article of food a part of it so as to injuriously affect its quality with the intent that it should be sold in its altered state. In the case stated there is nothing to show that the man did anything of the kind. Although I am of opinion that sect. 25 does not apply, I propose to deal with the case as if it did. The points raised by the appellant are: (1) That the warranty formed no part of the contract; (2) that there was nothing to show on the face of it that the warranty applied to the particular sale of milk on the 20th July; (3) that there must be a specific warranty with each delivery of milk. The facts are set out in the case. It appears that the respondent began purchasing milk from the original vendor in 1897, having milk delivered day by day probably in such circumstances that a promise to pay arose each time the milk was received. Then in July 1899 he obtained from his vendor a warranty in these terms: "We hereby warrant that each and every supply of milk sent by us to you shall be new milk unadulterated and with all its cream." It was found, as a fact, and no doubt on sufficient evidence, that the milk sold by the respondent to the appellant was milk delivered by the original vendor under the contract to which this warranty applied. The original vendor himself appears to have been called and to have stated that the milk in question was milk he intended to deliver under the contract. I agree that it is not sufficient for the vendor to come forward and say it was intended to deliver the milk under the contract containing the warranty. It must appear that the delivery was in fact under the warranty. But here that fact is found. Sect. 25 requires that the accused should prove to the satisfaction of the justices that he purchased the article as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded by the prosecutor, and with a written warranty to that effect. That the respondent has proved, for he proved that he bought under a warranty applying to the particular milk in question. No one can doubt that if the respondent had brought an action against his vendor for a breach of the warranty he would have succeeded. It is said that this is not sufficient, and certain authorities are relied on. The first one is a case of Harris v. May (12 Q. B. Div. 97), where the information was laid under sect. 6 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act 1875, a section to which sect. 25 applies. It was there proved that the milk had been supplied to the appellant under a written contract dated the 24th March 1883, and made between the vendor of the one part and the appellant of the other part, whereby the vendor agreed to sell to the appellant "eighty-six imperial gallons of new and pure milk each and every day for six months commencing the 25th March." The sale in respect of which the information was laid was on the 12th April. It is suggested there that goods to be delivered in the future are not within a former written warranty at all. There the contract and the warranty were made many days before the actual sale which was the subject of the prosecution. Lord Coleridge, C.J. in his judgment says: "I entertain no doubt on this matter. I am of opinion that the contract relied on by the appellant is not a written warranty within the meaning of the Act. . . . It seems clear that the Legislature meant that a person seeking to protect himself against the penalty, and wishing to make himself perfectly safe in respect of the sale of a specific article, must show that he had a proper specific warranty in writing in respect of that article from his vendor. The appellant here has not shown that. It is possible that he may have had a parol statement amounting to a warranty from his vendor each morning that the milk was supplied, but that would not be sufficient to comply with the requirements of the Act." The Chief Justice at the beginning of his judgment says that an action for breach of warranty could be brought on the contract, and, that being so, he must have considered it a proper warranty. It was there specific and in writing. It is suggested that the warranty should be affixed to the article or package, or at any rate must specifically refer to each article; but I ask, Where in the statute does it appear that such a cumbersome procedure is required? Who is to do it? When or how is it to be done? Is the vendor or the purchaser to affix it? I see nothing in the Act that requires anything of the sort. The Act requires that the purchaser should have bought the article in question as the same in nature, substance, and quality as that demanded of him by the prosecutor and with a written warranty to that effect, and that he had no reason to believe at the time when he sold the article that it was otherwise, and that he sold it in the same state as he purchased it. Those are all the requisites of the statute, and, those having been fulfilled, I am at a loss to understand why that case was so decided. The next case is that of Farmers and Cleveland Dairy Company v. Stevenson (63 L. T. Rep. 776), where the appellants were convicted of having sold milk not of the nature, substance, and quality demanded. They proved that they had bought the milk under a written contract with the vendor by which they were to have a daily supply for six months. By the contract the vendor warranted each and every supply of milk delivered under the contract to be pure, genuine, and new milk unadulterated and with all its cream on. The milk was delivered in London in cans, to each of which a label was attached stating the quantity in each can of "warranted genuine new milk with all its cream on." In my opinion that last fact does not make the least difference. Stephen, J. says at p. 72: "I agree that in the case before us there is such a warranty by the producer as to protect the purchaser. In the agreement there was a written warranty that the milk to be delivered was to be pure, genuine, and new milk unadulterated and with all its cream on, and the fact that the milk was not to be delivered all at one time does not, to my mind, make any difference." Stephen, J. states there what I believe the law to be. In Laidlaw v. Wilson (1894) 1 Q. B. 74) the respondent entered into a contract with the manufacturers on the 17th Dec. 1892 as follows: "We have this day sold to you three tons Kilvert's pure lard for delivery to end of Jan. 1893." A parcel of the lard was delivered on the 23rd Dec. which turned out to be adulterated. On a prosecution under sect. 6 it was held that the contract of the 17th Dec. contained a sufficient warranty of purity in respect of the specific parcel of the 23rd Dec. to satisfy sect. 25, and so the respondent was entitled to be discharged from the prosecution. It became necessary to distinguish Harris v. May (sup.), and Charles, J. attempted to do it. In my opinion they cannot be distinguished one from another because they are in direct conflict, but Charles, J. did attempt to draw a distinction. He says with reference to the invoice: "I decide the present case upon the construction which is to be put, not upon the invoice of the 23rd Dec., but upon the contract of the 17th Dec." Then he goes on to deal with Harris v. May, and says: "There, no doubt, Lord Coleridge, C.J., at the commencement of his judgment, said that, in his opinion, the contract relied on by the defendant was not a written warranty within the meaning of the Act. But on looking at his judgment as a whole, I think that what he really meant was that it was not such a warranty as would cover the specific delivery of milk on the 12th April, in the absence of some written evidence that that specific delivery was made under the contract." But what he says there is clearly not what Lord Coleridge meant. The two cases cannot be distinguished. As I have said, they are in direct conflict. Charles, J. then goes on: "In the present case there is evidence that the particular parcel of lard was delivered under the contract, the delivery having been accompanied by an invoice which describes the lard in the same terms as those contained in the contract. The invoice, however, is material, not as itself containing a warranty of purity, but as earmarking the particular parcel as having been delivered under a contract in which a written warranty of purity was contained." If by that Charles, J. meant to say that there must be something in writing to earmark the particular article, I dissent from that proposition. Wright, J. in Laidlaw v. Wilson says: "The word 'pure' in the contract of the 17th Dec. amounts to an agreement as an essential part of the contract that the lard supplied should be pure, and that is, in my opinion, a sufficient warranty of its purity within the meaning of the section." The only other case is that of Robertson v. Harris (82 L. T. Rep. 536; (1900) 2 Q. B. 117), and it was there held that, even if the written agreement amounted to a warranty within the meaning of sect. 25, there must be some evidence in writing to show that the particular milk sold to the appellant was purchased with that warranty, and that in the absence of that evidence the agreement afforded no defence, following the suggestion of Charles, J. in Laidlaw v. Wilson (sup.) as to what Lord Coleridge, C.J. meant in Harris v. May (sup.), that there must be something to identify the article with the warranty. I find nothing in the statute to justify placing such an onerous condition on either the vendor or the purchaser. The view that I take is that Laidlaw v. Wilson (sup.) is right, and that it is in direct conflict with Harris v. May, and that it is the authority that we ought to follow in the present case. Assuming sect. 25 applies to this case, I think that the respondent has brought himself within its protection. As to the specific questions we have to answer, I think that the warranty did form part of the contract; that it is not necessary to show on the face of the warranty that it applied to the particular sale of milk, as it is sufficient to show the connection by evidence; and that the statute does not require that there must be a specific warranty with each sale of milk. It requires nothing of the kind. It merely requires that the article should be sold with a warranty. I think the appeal must be dismissed.

RIDLEY, J.—I agree with my brother Bigham. It is necessary for me just to add a few words as I was a party to the decision in Robertson v. Harris (ubi sup.). In Laidlaw v. Wilson there was an invoice, and Charles, J. in dealing with it said that it could be treated as written evidence connecting the warranty found in the contract with the sale of that particular consignment. His words were: "In the present case there is evidence that the particular parcel of lard was delivered under the contract, the delivery having been accompanied by an invoice which describes the lard in the same terms as those contained in the contract. The invoice, however, is material, not as itself containing the warranty of purity, but as earmarking the particular parcel as having been delivered under a contract in which a written warranty of purity was contained." He interpreted the judgment of Lord Coleridge in Harris v. May as proceeding upon this—that there must, in order to satisfy this section of the statute, be "some written evidence that the specific delivery was made under the contract." I adopted what he said. At the present moment I think Laidlaw v. Wilson was rightly decided, and that Robertson v. Harris was not necessarily wrong. The headnote in the Law Journal report is correct in law, though possibly not so accurate a summary of the decision as the headnote in the Law Reports, which, on the other hand, in my opinion, is wrong in law, for it states as the reason of that decision the principle with which I do not agree—namely, that in order to satisfy the statute there must be some written invoice to connect the warranty contained in the contract with the particular consignment.

Appeal dismissed.

MATTHEWS (app.) v. STRACHAN (resp.).

Public Health — Drain — Effectual drainage of house — Requirements for drainage scheme — Public Health Act 1875 (38 & 39 Vict. c. 54), s. 25.

All that the local authority are entitled to consider under sect. 25 of the Public Health Act 1875, is whether the drain is constructed of such size and materials, and at such level and with such fall as is necessary for the effectual drainage of the house.

Therefore, where two drains were required, connected with the two sewers of the authority, in order to facilitate the ultimate disposal of the sewage by the council, this was held to be beyond the powers conferred on the authority by the section.

CASE stated on an information laid by the respondent against the appellant, charging him for that within the six months then last past he had newly erected a house in Lyon-road in the urban district of Harrow-on-the-Hill without constructing such covered drains thereto as on the report of the surveyor to the urban district council of the district appeared to the council necessary for effectual drainage of such house contrary to sect. 25 of the Public Health Act 1875.

The information was laid by the respondent as clerk for and on behalf of the above-mentioned urban district council of Harrow, hereinafter called the council.

The appellant erected the house referred to in the information between Aug. and Sept. 1900. The house is within the council's district, and abuts upon a street in the district called Lyon-road.

Two sewers have been laid by the council in Lyon-road, both within 100ft. of the site of the house. One of these sewers (hereinafter called the surface-water sewer") the council desire and intend to be used for the reception and conveyance of surface water only. The other of these sewers (hereinafter called "the sewage sewer") the council desire and intend to be used for the reception and conveyance of sewage only.

Bye-laws in relation (inter alia) to the drainage of buildings made under sect. 157 of the Public Health Act 1875 are in force in the council's district. These bye-laws do not require that separate drains for surface water and sewage respectively should be laid for any building.

On the 22nd Jan. 1900 certain regulations were issued by the council. These regulations purport to be made under sect. 21 of the Public Health Act 1875 with reference to the mode in which the communications between drains and sewers are made. One of these regulations purports to prohibit surface water from being permitted to enter the council's sewers without the special sanction of the council.

Before erecting the house the appellant deposited plans of the same in accordance with the requirements of the bye-laws above mentioned, showing, inter alia, the method proposed to be adopted, and afterwards in fact adopted, by him for the drainage of the house—namely, by means of a single drain, which the appellant proposed to connect with the sewage sewer intended for the discharge both of the surface water and of the sewage. These plans were at first disapproved by the council on the ground that they were not in compliance with the regulations above referred to, but were subsequently conditionally approved as hereinafter appears.

On the 21st Nov. 1900, the council's surveyor made to the council the following report with reference to the house:

Gentlemen, — Drainage of new house, Lyon-road, for Mr. H. R. Matthews. — As instructed I beg to present my report on the above. The requirements for the effectual drainage of this house are as follows: (a) One main drain of not less than 4in. internal diameter for conveying sewage only to be constructed of good sound stoneware pipes or other equally suitable material, and connected to the council sewage sewer, in Lyon-road. The pipes to be laid on a bed of good concrete at a gradient of not less than 1ft. in 60ft., and with water-tight joints (where drain passes under building, the same to be of iron with lead joints, or of stoneware completely surrounded with 6in. of good and solid concrete). Manholes to be built at every change of direction and gradient in drain; also a manhole where soil pipe is connected to drain, and a disconnecting chamber with proper disconnecting trap to be built as far distant as practicable from the building. To this main drain must be connected with suitable 4in. pipes the soil pipe taking the water-closet on the first floor. Also the drains taking the water-closet on the ground floor, the lavatories, bath and scullery waste pipes must discharge in the open air over trapped gully gratings, which gullies must be connected to this main sewage drain. The drain to be ventilated by means of a fresh air inlet pipe of 4in. diameter, connected to the disconnecting chamber on the house side of the disconnecting trap; and an outlet shaft, also of 4in. diameter, connected to the head of the drain and carried up above the roof. (b) One main drain of not less than 4in. internal diameter for conveying surface water only, to be constructed of good sound stoneware pipes or other equally good material, with water-tight joints, and laid at a not less gradient than 1ft. in 60ft., which drain is to be connected to the council's surface water sewer in Lyon-road. To this drain must be connected the whole of the rainwater pipes or gullies which carry the surface water from the roof or roofs. The whole to be tested by and laid to the satisfaction of the surveyor to the council.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, (Signed) J. PERCY BENNETTS, Engineer and Surveyor.

On the 26th Nov. 1900 the council took the report into consideration and, after considerable discussion, passed the following resolution:

That the council approve the plans submitted by Mr. H. E. Matthews subject to the requirements contained in the above report as to the drainage of the house being carried out. Mr. Marchant, Mr. Hankins. Carried; Messrs. Batchelor, Charles, and Young not voting.

On the 27th Nov. 1900 the respondent, by direction of the council, forwarded to the appellant a copy of the report of the surveyor and wrote him therewith a letter, of which the following is a copy:

Dear Sir,—New House, Lyon-road.—I am now directed by my council to inform you that they received a report from their surveyor, a copy of which is inclosed herewith, specifying what drains are necessary for the effective drainage of the house now in course of erection by you in Lyon-road, and the council call upon you to lay the drains in accordance with that report. I am also directed to state that the council have taken counsel's opinion upon the matter and are advised that they have power, under section 25 of the Public Health Act 1875, to prescribe what drains are necessary for the effectual drainage of your house and to what sewers the drains shall be connected. The council approve the plans deposited by you subject to the requirements contained in such report as to the drainage of the house being carried out.—Yours faithfully, JOHN STRACHAN, Clerk.

The appellants did not lay two drains for the drainage of the house as required by the notice and report, but laid one drain only for the drainage thereof in the manner shown in the plans deposited by him as hereinbefore stated. The drain so laid by the appellant was in all respects in accordance with the requirements of the report, and notice as regards the conveyance of surface water as required by the report and notice, such surface water being conveyed to the soil drain in direct contravention of the council's requirements.

The council's surveyor was called as a witness before the justices. He admitted that the drain laid by the appellant would have been perfectly effectual if there had been only one sewer in Lyon-road, and that his reason for reporting that separate drains ought to be laid—one for sewage only, and one for surface water—was that it was desirable with a view of facilitating the ultimate disposal of sewage by the council that sewage only should be discharged into the sewage sewer, and surface water only into the surface water sewer, and that there were separate sewers for sewage and for surface water in Lyon-road aforesaid.

It was contended for the appellant that the powers of the council under sect. 25 of the Public Health Act 1875 did not extend to requiring separate drains for surface water and sewage respectively to be laid for a house; that in exercising their powers under that section an urban authority must confine themselves to a consideration of what is necessary for the effectual drainage of the house, and cannot require the laying of drains not necessary for that purpose but required or desirable for facilitating the ultimate disposal of sewage by the urban authority; that the requirements of an urban authority under that section must be confined to the size, level, materials, and fall of the drain or drains to be constructed, and cannot extend to other matters connected with the drainage of the house; that the report of the council's surveyor was not such a report as the council could act upon under the section, inasmuch as in the first place the report was not an expression of the opinion of the council's surveyor as to what was necessary for the effectual drainage of the house, but as to what was necessary or desirable for the purpose of facilitating the ultimate disposal of the sewage, and, in the second place, the report was not confined to the size, level, materials, and fall of the drain or drains to be constructed, but extended to other matters.

It was contended for the respondent that the surveyor having made the report above set out to the council, and the council having in fact taken that report into consideration, and passed a resolution that the drains specified in the report appeared to the council to be necessary for the effectual drainage of the house; and having given notice of that resolution to the appellant, the justices were bound, in the absence of any evidence that the council had not fairly considered the facts of the particular case, to convict upon its being found that the appellant had not complied with such notice.

The justices held as a point of law that under these circumstances they had no power to question the reasonableness of the requirements for the effectual drainage of the house either as regards the house itself only or in connection with the general system of drainage in the district, and they convicted the appellant accordingly.

A. F. Jenkin (McCall, K.C. with him) for the appellant.—The question here is whether the local authority under sect. 25 of the Public Health Act 1875 can require a new house to be drained by two drains, one for sewage and one for surface water, or whether the proper method of proceeding is by making bye-laws. Under sect. 25 the local authority has absolute powers, and there is no appeal from their decision, but if bye-laws are made, they have to be approved by the Local Government Board under sect. 184, and objections can be heard against them. They have to be reasonable, and their reasonableness may be tested in a court of law. In this section, however, the words are "drain or drains be constructed . . . as on the report of the surveyor may appear to the urban authority necessary for the effectual drainage of such house." Where such words are used, the local authority are absolute. But all the local authority have to consider is what is necessary for the effectual drainage of the house if they wish to go under this section. If they wish to take into consideration what is desirable or necessary for the district at large, they must not go under the section, but must make bye-laws, which they have power to make under sect. 157 (4). As a matter of fact they have made bye-laws, but they do not deal with the question of two drains to each new house. The powers conferred by sect. 25 do not extend to requiring two drains for different purposes. The local authority here have not considered what is necessary for the effectual drainage of the house, but have taken into consideration other matters. The drains must be made of such size, materials, at such level, and with such fall, as is necessary, and those are the only four matters that are to be considered by the local authority when seeing whether the drain or drains are necessary for the effectual drainage of the house.

MATTHEWS (app.) v. STRACHAN (resp.).

S. G. Lushington (Macmorran, K.C. with him) for the respondents.—It is clear that the local authority has two sorts of powers—namely, those under sect. 25 and those under sect. 157. These are co-existent. But here they are acting under sect. 25 alone. That section says that drains are to be constructed as on the report of the surveyor may appear to the authority necessary for the effectual drainage of the house. What is necessary is within the discretion of the local authority, and all that has to be decided here is whether that discretion has been properly exercised. The report of the surveyor was before the local authority, and after discussion they came to the conclusion that what was reported was in fact necessary. The principle to be acted upon in cases like this is laid down in Smith v. Chorley District Council (76 L. T. Rep. 637; (1897) 1 Q. B. 678). [BIGHAM, J.—The section says that the drain or drains shall empty into a sewer, not sewers.] The report is in the words of the section, and that is sufficient. The discretion here was properly exercised, and the court should not interfere with the decision of the local authority which has been upheld by the justices.

RIDLEY, J.—We think that the magistrates were wrong in this case. The point arises upon sect. 25 of the Public Health Act 1875, as the appellant was convicted of newly erecting a house without constructing such covered drains thereto as on the report of the surveyor to the urban district council appeared to the council necessary for the effectual drainage of such house contrary to sect. 25. The surveyor had made a report to the council that did state on its face that the requirements for the effectual drainage of the house were as therein contained. No evidence was called before the council at the time when they considered this report, and they acted upon the report alone. When the case came before the justices the surveyor was called as a witness, and he admitted that the drain laid by the appellant would have been perfectly effectual if there had been only one sewer, and that his reason for reporting that separate drains ought to be laid was that it was desirable, with a view of facilitating the ultimate disposal of sewage by the council, that sewage should be discharged into one sewer and surface water into another. We must take that as constituting the facts in this case. It may be that the attention of the council was not called to the circumstances which caused the surveyor to make the report, but the report was founded on a misconception, and the surveyor acted on powers which were not given him by sect. 25. That section refers only to the effectual drainage of such house. If you go beyond the section, you are asking the owners to assist the council in the disposal of sewage. When the surveyor admits that the drain would have been perfectly effectual as laid by the appellant if it had not been that there were two sewers which were desirable with a view of facilitating the ultimate disposal of sewage by the council, that shows he acted upon a misconception, as the section merely contemplates the effectual drainage of the house, and not the scheme of the council for the disposal of their sewage. No doubt the council are masters of the situation so far as the powers given them by the section are concerned, but if they go beyond the limits of the discretion given them by that section it is for us to say so. Now, sect. 25 of the Public Health Act 1875 is as follows: "It shall not be lawful in any urban district newly to erect any house or to rebuild any house which has been pulled down to or below the ground floor or to occupy any house so newly erected or rebuilt unless and until a covered drain or drains be constructed of such size and materials and at such level and with such fall as on the report of the surveyor may appear to the urban authority to be necessary for the effectual drainage of such house; and the drain or drains so to be constructed shall empty into any sewer which the urban authority are entitled to use and which is within 100ft. of some part of the site of the house to be built or rebuilt; but if no such means of drainage are within that distance then shall empty into such covered cesspool or other place, not being under any house, as the urban authority direct." It appears to me that the words are carefully selected to show what has to be considered for what is necessary for the effectual drainage of the house. It is possible that for the effectual drainage of a house it might be necessary to have more than one drain, and, further, if it were necessary for the requirements of the house that the drains should go into more than one sewer, that might have to be done. If these matters were for the effectual drainage of the house, it would not be beyond the power of the local authority to order them; but if the authority considers what is beneficial for the inhabitants in general—such as the disposal of sewage—that does not come within the powers given them by this section. There is no liability upon the owner of a house as to that matter except as a ratepayer in common with other ratepayers.

K.B. Div.]

SQUIRE (app.) v. BAYER AND Co. (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

BIGHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. Sect. 25 empowers the authority to take into consideration certain matters only when considering whether the drain is effectual for the drainage of the house. Those matters are mentioned in the section, and they are whether the drain is constructed of such size and materials and at such level and with such fall as is necessary for the effectual drainage of the house. Those are the only matters which they are entitled to take into consideration. If they are of opinion that those matters are not as they should be, the new house cannot be proceeded with. In this case the council have considered other matters. I come to this conclusion, not only from the evidence of the surveyor given before the justices, but by reading the report upon which the council acted. It is said that they took no other matters into consideration but what were necessary for the effectual drainage of the house. The report shows, however, that both the surveyor and the council took matters into consideration which they should not have done. In the report we find that one drain for conveying sewage only was to be of pipes connected to the council's sewage sewer, and that another drain was to be of pipes connected to the council's surface-water sewer. It is clear that both council and surveyor had nothing to do with these matters, but only with the powers given them by the section. When one considers all the facts, one can see the reason why all these matters were considered. There was a drainage scheme in the district by which sewage and surface water were separated. No doubt it is good and desirable that this should be carried out effectively, but the scheme must be carried out at the expense of the ratepayers, and not at the expense of the individual householder. This is an attempt to throw the expense of the system on one particular person. The council in exercising their discretion have travelled outside what the section allows. As to the words in the section "and the drain or drains so to be constructed shall empty into any sewer which the urban authority are entitled to use," I see nothing in those words to allow the council to direct which sewer the drain is to empty into. The local authority are not to consider or to direct which sewer the drains are to empty into. It is only necessary that the drain should empty into a sewer within 100ft. of some part of the site of the house to be built or rebuilt, and those words do not enlarge the power of the council. Here they have taken into consideration matters they should not have taken into consideration, and the appeal must be allowed.

Judgment accordingly.

SQUIRE (app.) v. BAYER AND Co. (resps.) (a) Employer and workman—Factory—Fines under contract—Good order and decorum while in factory—Specification of acts and omissions—Acts causing or likely to cause damage to employer—Truck Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 44), s. 1 (1) (b) (c). By the terms of the contract between employers and their workmen the latter were to be liable to a fine of 6d. or less if they failed to observe "good order and decorum" while in the factory.

By the consent of the employers the workmen were permitted to have their dinner in a workroom in the factory in which there were machinery and materials. During the dinner hour B., a workman within the meaning of the Truck Act 1896, was discovered in such playing a small harp to the music of which the other workmen were dancing. It was found as a fact that such conduct was disorderly, and that the dancing, by raising dust, caused or was likely to cause damage to the machinery and materials in the room. B. was fined by the employers.

Held, on these facts, that under the circumstances the rule prescribing fines for breaches of "good order and decorum" while in the factory was a sufficient specification of the acts or omissions for which fines might be inflicted to satisfy sect. 1 (1) of the Truck Act 1896, and that there was sufficient evidence to support the finding that B.'s conduct was a breach of such rule.

CASE stated by the justices of the city and county of Bristol.

An information and complaint was laid against the respondents, Bayer and Co., by the appellant, Rose Elizabeth Squire, one of H.M. inspectors of factories and workshops, that the respondents, being employers within the Truck Act 1896, did unlawfully make a contract with a workman—to wit, Helen Louisa Robbins—for a deduction for or in respect of a fine—to wit, of 6d. or less—from the sum contracted to be paid by the employers to the workman, contrary to sect. 1, sub-sect. 1. of the Truck Act 1896 in that the said contract did not specify the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine might be imposed; and the fine was imposed not in respect of some act or omission which caused or was likely to cause damage or loss to the employers or interruption or hindrance to their business, whereby the respondents were liable to a penalty of 10l.

Truck Act 1896 (59 & 60 Vict. c. 44):

Sect. 1 (1) An employer shall not make any contract with any workman for any deduction from the sum contracted to be paid by the employer to the workman or for any payment to the employer by the workman for or in respect of any fine unless . . . (b) the contract specifies the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed, and the amount of the fine, or the particulars from which that amount may be ascertained; and (c) the fine imposed under the contract is in respect of some act or omission which causes or is likely to cause damage or loss to the employer or interruption or hindrance to his business.

It was proved or admitted at the hearing before the justices that the respondents were corset manufacturers, and that their works at Bristol were a factory within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878 and 1895. Among the rules produced by the respondents as containing the terms of the contract between them and their employees was the following:

All workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory, and shall not do anything which may interfere with the proper and orderly conduct of the business thereof or of any department thereof; and shall in all respects obey the lawful commands of the general manager, forewoman, or superintendent of their respective departments. A fine of 6d. (or less at the discretion of the manager) shall be paid by each worker who shall be guilty of any infringement of this rule.

SQUIRE (app.) v. BAYER AND Co. (resps.).

[K.B. Div.]

The before-mentioned Helen Robbins was employed by the respondents under a contract upon the terms contained in these rules.

The respondents granted to their employees the privilege of having their dinners in the workroom of the factory between 1 and 2 p.m.; but the employees were not obliged to have their dinners there, but might dine elsewhere if they wished. The rules of the factory were in force during the dinner hour as well as at other times, and this was known to the employees. One day in November during the dinner hour Miss Knight, who was then in charge of the factory, and whose room was immediately beneath that in which the employees were having dinner, heard a considerable noise and commotion going on in that room, and on going there discovered Robbins playing a small harp, to the music of which several girls were dancing, singing, and clapping their hands. Miss Knight, in the course of her duty, reported the disorder, and Robbins and some others were fined 2d. each. Robbins stated before the justices that she had not been told that it was wrong to dance and sing during the dinner hour, and that she was not aware that there was any harm in it; but it was proved that a copy of the rules was posted in that workroom and other copies at other places in the factory, and Robbins admitted that she and the other girls would not have done what they did if Miss Knight had been present.

It was proved before the justices that the disorder and dancing caused considerable dust, and that dust would cause injury to the machines at which the employees worked as well as to the material served out to them to work upon. It was further proved that no fines were deducted from the wages of the employees, but a fine-book was kept, and once a week the employees were asked to pay such fines after they had received their wages in full, and a receipt was given for the fine, the one given to Robbins being as follows:

The sum of 2d. has this day been received from Robbins in respect of a fine for making a noise during dinner hour.

The appellant contended (a) that the rule did not specify the acts or omissions in respect of which a fine might be imposed; and (b) that the fine imposed under the rule was not in respect of some act or omission within the meaning of sub-sect. 1 (c) of sect. 1 of the Truck Act 1896.

The respondents contended that the words of the rule sufficiently specified the acts and omissions in respect of which a fine might be imposed, and that the fine in fact inflicted was in respect of an act which caused or was likely to cause damage or loss to the respondents or interruption or hindrance to their business.

The justices found as a fact upon the evidence that good order and decorum were not observed, and that dancing and disorder were likely to cause damage or loss to the respondents and injury to the discipline necessary to be enforced in a factory of that description. They also found as a fact that the rule (which was the only one in dispute before them) constituted a reasonable contract between the respondents and their employees for securing good order and decorum in the factory and complied with sect. 1 (1) (b) and (c) of the Act, and they accordingly dismissed the summons.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether on the facts stated the justices had come to a right conclusion.

The Attorney-General (Sir Robert R. Finlay, K.C.) (H. Sutton with him) for the appellant.—The whole object of sect. 1 of the Truck Act 1896 is to secure that the workman shall have specific notice of the acts for doing which he will be fined. Here there is no specific notice. There is a general and vague rule that the workmen are to maintain good order. This general rule is applicable not merely during working hours, but during the dinner hour. Surely it is impossible to say that the workmen have received specific notice of the acts they may not do while eating their dinners except at the risk of a fine. We submit the rule, then, is too general and vague to be in compliance with the requirements of sect. 1. Moreover, there is no evidence that any breach of it was committed. All that Robbins did was to play a small harp. This in itself could not in any way be a breach of order and decorum during dinner, though it might during working hours, when it would naturally interrupt the work. Neither could it by itself raise dust or in any other way injure the employers.

Foots, K.C. (Douglas Metcalfe with him).—If there is to be any rule at all as to the observance of order and decorum in the factory it must be in the general form which characterises this rule. It is impossible to prescribe the different acts which may constitute breaches of order and decorum either during working hours or the dinner hour. Here the workpeople were allowed the privilege of taking dinner in the factory, and it was perfectly proper that the employers should take measures to secure order while they were at dinner there. The only way in which this could be secured was by a general provision that disorder would be punished by fines. As to the point whether what was done by Robbins amounts to a breach tending to injure the employers, the finding of the justices is one of fact on the evidence and it cannot now be reviewed.

The Attorney-General in reply.

Lord ALVERSTONE, O.J.—This case is not free from difficulty, but I cannot see my way to hold that the justices have come to a wrong decision. The two questions which we are asked to consider are—first, whether the rule is valid; and, secondly, whether there has been such a breach of it as would justify the infliction of a fine, having regard to the statute. In the view I take, I do not dissent materially from anything the Attorney-General has said as to the conditions which must be present in order to justify the infliction of a fine. By sect. 1, sub-sect. 1, of the Truck Act 1896 there must be a contract which shall specify the acts and omissions in respect of which the fine shall be imposed, and the amount of the fine in money imposed under the contract must be in respect of some act or omission which causes or is likely to cause damage or loss to the employer; and under sub-sect. 2 the deductions must be made in pursuance of such a contract, and particulars in writing showing the acts or omissions in respect of which the fine is imposed are to be supplied to the workman. In the present case the justices have found that there was during the dinner hour dancing and disorder in this particular room in the factory—disorder is the word to which I call attention; that to the knowledge of the employees the rules were in force in the factory during the dinner hour, and that the disorder was discovered and reported by the clerk who was then in charge in pursuance of her duty. It has been pressed upon us that a rule which provides that "all workers shall observe good order and decorum while in the factory" is not a sufficient specification of the "acts or omissions in respect of which the fine may be imposed." Now, as there are so many different factories and so many kinds of businesses, and as good order and decorum must, in my view, be something with reference to the particular character of the business carried on and to the particular privileges given by the factory owners to the work-people, I think it would be going too far to say that the language prescribing a fine for breach of good order and decorum is necessarily too general. In a sense, of course, it does not specify the particular acts and omissions which will lead to the infliction of fines; but, in my opinion, "good order and decorum" must be construed with reference to the circumstances under which the business is carried on. Speaking for myself, I think it is a sufficient compliance with the Act for the employers to say that a fine may be inflicted if the employee does not observe good order and decorum while in the factory. The second point taken by the Attorney-General is that there was no evidence of anything done by the girl Robbins which could fairly be called a non-observance of the rule. As to that, I think that the facts found by the justices prevent the point being raised. They have clearly found that there was dancing by the girls to the music she was playing on the harp, and that such conduct was not an observance of good order and decorum, and that it was likely to cause injury, by reason of the dust raised, to the machinery and materials. I think on the face of these findings we cannot take the isolated act of the girl who provided the music, however innocent it may have been, and say that that particular act was not part of the disorder. The matter must be looked at as a whole, and, if the rule is in accordance with the requirements of the statute, we cannot say that there was no evidence of a breach of good order and decorum, having regard to the privileges which were allowed to these girls and the position they occupied in the factory. For I do not think we ought entirely to shut out of consideration the circumstance of the girls being allowed to have their meals in the workroom, where there were much valuable machinery and materials; and it is with reference to that that we must consider whether there has been a breach of the rule, having regard to the place in which the act was done which the justices have found to be disorderly. For these reasons the decision of the justices upon their findings must be affirmed.

LAWRENCE, J.—I am of the same opinion.

FULLERS LIMITED (apps.) v. SQUIRE (resp.). (a)

Factory—Workshop—Shop—Packing goods for sale after shop hours—"Adapting for sale"—Factory and Workshop Act (41 Vict. c. 16), s. 93.

The packing in a shop of goods for sale to customers may, if it takes place after the ordinary shop hours, amount to "adapting" them for sale within sect. 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act, and make the shop a workshop within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878 to 1895.

CASE stated by a metropolitan magistrate.

A complaint and information was preferred by the respondent, Rose Elizabeth Squire, an inspector of factories and workshops, against the appellants, Fullers Limited, under sects. 13 and 83 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 (41 Vict. c. 16), for that they on the 19th Dec. 1900, being then the occupiers of certain premises, the same being a workshop within the meaning of the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878 to 1895, at 206, Regent-street, within the metropolitan police district, did there and then unlawfully employ a certain woman—to wit, one Ada Simmonds—after the legal period of employment, contrary to the said statute.

By sect. 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 the expression "workshop" means (inter alia)

Any premises, room, or place not being a factory within the meaning of this Act in which premises, room, or place, or within the close or curtilage or precincts of which premises, any manual labour is exercised by way of trade or for the purposes of gain in or incidental to the following purposes or any of them; that is to say (a) in or incidental to the making of any article or of part of any article, or (b) in or incidental to the altering, repairing, ornamenting, or finishing of any article, or (c) in or incidental to the adapting for sale of any article, and to which or over which premises, room, or place the employer of the persons working therein has the right of access or control.

The appellants were a firm of wholesale and retail manufacturers of bonbons, sweetmeats, and confectionery, carrying on a wholesale business at a factory at Hammersmith, and had amongst other retail places of business a retail shop at 206, Regent-street.

At 206, Regent-street the appellants carried on their business on the ground, first, and top floors.

On the top floor artificial flowers were sewn on to the wicker hampers hereinafter mentioned. This floor was separate and distinct from the ground and first floors, and was separately managed and regulated by the appellants according to the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Acts 1878 to 1895. The ground and first floors were used for the sale of bonbons, sweetmeats, wicker hampers packed and decorated as hereinafter set out, cardboard boxes, and confectionery, and also as tea rooms and in the manner hereinafter described.

Ada Simmonds was on the 19th and 20th Dec. 1900 in the employment of the appellants, and was employed by them at their premises at Hammersmith from 8 a.m. till noon on the 19th

Dec., and afterwards on the ground and first floors at 206, Regent-street (with certain intervals) from 1 p.m. on the 19th Dec. to 3 a.m. on the 20th Dec.

For the purposes of such last-mentioned employment Simmonds was furnished by the appellants with an assortment of bonbons and sweetmeats of various shapes, sizes, and colours, also with cardboard boxes, ornamented wicker hampers, ribbons of a variety of sizes and colours, and fancy lace-paper necessary for her work as hereinafter described.

From 1 p.m. on the 19th Dec. until 3 a.m. on the 20th Dec. Simmonds was chiefly engaged in packing and arranging in layers in the cardboard boxes and ornamented hampers an assortment of bonbons and sweetmeats of different colours, shapes, and sizes in fancy patterns; placing sheets of the lace-paper between each layer of sweetmeats or bonbons, tying up the boxes and hampers when so filled with the fancy ribbons, and in arranging the same with bows on the outside of such boxes and hampers with a view to rendering the same more attractive to purchasers than they would be if not so tastefully sorted, arranged, packed, and bound up; and the magistrate found as a fact that the same were so rendered more attractive by the work so expended upon them, and that such work required the exercise of skill and taste upon the part of Ada Simmonds.

The hampers when so filled, arranged, and dealt with were intended to be and were sold to customers as a whole, and at a certain fixed price for the whole, but such price was the same as that charged to customers for such ornamental hampers when empty, plus the price of the sweets, no special or separate charge being added in respect of the packing.

At the hearing before the magistrate it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the employment of Simmonds by the appellants was not manual labour exercised by way of trade or for purposes of gain in or incidental to any of the purposes set out in sect. 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878.

The magistrate held that that portion of the premises at 206, Regent-street in which Simmonds was so engaged was a workshop within the meaning of sect. 93 of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878, and that she was employed contrary to the provisions of the Factory and Workshop Acts, and convicted the appellants.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the magistrate was right in convicting the appellants of the offence charged in the information.

Joseph Walton, K.C. (Given with him) for the appellants.—All that was done here was to parcel the goods out for sale; it was, in fact, part of the process of sale. If this makes the shop where it takes place a workshop within the Factory and Workshop Acts, then every druggist's or, for that matter, grocer's is a workshop. What sect. 93 (2) of the Factory and Workshop Act 1878 refers to is not the process of sale, but the process of manufacture. All that was done here is what is done in every shop—get the goods ready for delivery to the customers.

H. Sutton, for the respondent, was not called upon.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—This case is very near the line. The magistrate thought that the operations carried on came within sect. 93 of the Act of 1878. The facts appear to be that the place at which this work of packing sweetmeats was being carried on was, at any rate for a great part of the day, an ordinary shop—that is to say, sweetmeats were sold on the ground floor and tea was sold on the first floor—but up to a very late hour of the night the premises were being used for the carrying on of this particular operation. It must have been continued for several hours after the ordinary shop had closed. I do not wish to express any opinion upon the point raised upon behalf of the appellants—namely, that if in an ordinary shop during shop hours packing takes place the matter will of necessity come within sect. 93 of the Act of 1878. All we have to consider here is whether there was evidence on which the magistrate could come to the conclusion that he did. I have no doubt that there was. There were boxes of sweetmeats, and they were adapted for sale by the operation that was carried on—namely, that of placing them in layers, laying lace-paper in between the layers, and afterwards ornamenting the boxes. If this operation had taken place in a room in a separate building in which sweets were bought wholesale, I should have entertained no doubt upon the point. I was pressed, however, at first by the ingenious argument on behalf of the appellants, but I think the magistrate was entitled to hold on the evidence before him that, having regard to the fact that the operation was carried on for several hours after shop hours, it was not incidental to the shop business, but nothing more than carrying on the work which was to adapt the articles for sale. It is impossible to say there was no evidence upon which the magistrate could come to the conclusion he has arrived at. The appeal must be dismissed.

Gaming—Office used for betting—House opened abroad for receiving money in respect of bets—Advertisement of such house—Legality of advertisement—Betting Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), ss. 1, 7—Betting Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 15), s. 3.

Sec. 7 of the Betting Act 1853, which forbids the publication of any advertisement showing that any house is kept or used for the purpose of making bets or wagers, applies only to the first of the two illegal purposes specified in sect. 1 of the Act—namely, to houses opened, kept, or used, for the purpose of betting with persons resorting, that is, physically resorting thereto, and sect. 3 of the Betting Act 1874 also applies only to the same class of betting houses; and, therefore, the advertisement of a house kept or used for the purpose of money being there received as or for the consideration of an undertaking to pay thereafter money on events or contingencies relating to horse races, is not made illegal by either of these sections :

Consequently, an advertisement in a newspaper containing a "coupon competition," that is, a promise to pay a specified sum of money to such persons as should correctly guess the result of certain horse races shortly about to be run, and should write their guesses upon forms issued by the newspaper, and return the coupons so filled up, together with one penny for each guess, to a house or office abroad, kept and used for that purpose, is not made illegal by either of the above sections, as there is no physical resorting to such house for the purpose of betting.

ARGUMENT of a question of law raised on the pleadings.

The plaintiff, Joseph Stoddart, in his statement of claim alleged that :

1. The plaintiff is and has since the beginning of the year 1890 been carrying on business as the proprietor of a newspaper called Sporting Luck.

2. By an agreement, dated the 20th March 1890, the defendants agreed with the plaintiff to print and publish Sporting Luck on his behalf every week on terms and conditions in the said agreement more particularly specified.

3. The defendants have recently, while the said agreement was still in force, without any justification and in violation of their said agreement, refused to print and publish Sporting Luck for the plaintiff, whereby the plaintiff has suffered considerable damage.

The plaintiff claimed 1000*l.* damages.

By their amended defence the defendants alleged that :

1. The defendants always have been and still are ready and willing to fulfil their said contract so far as they legally may and to print the said newspaper. It was a condition of the said agreement that the defendants were only to be called upon to fulfil it if the said newspaper contained matter which was neither libellous nor illegal.

2. The defendants only refused to print the said newspaper because the plaintiff called upon them, under the contract which is above referred to, to print and publish for circulation in England with the said newspaper, and as a part of it, an advertisement, headed "International Supplement," relating to a horse racing competition, the publication of which, according to the defendants' contention, constitutes an offence against the Betting Acts of 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119, s. 7) and 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 15, s. 3).

PARTICULARS.

1. On the 30th October 1900 one Ada Jane Stoddart was tried and convicted at the Central Criminal Court for that she, being the occupier of an office at 10, Red Lion-court, in the city of London, had unlawfully opened, kept, or used that office for the purpose of money being there received by her as the consideration of undertaking to pay thereafter money on events relating to horse racing, in contravention of sect. 1 of the Betting Act of 1853.

2. The learned judge, at the trial of the said Ada Jane Stoddart, reserved the point and stated a case for the consideration of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved as to whether the then defendant had in law been guilty of any offence against the said section of the said Act, and on the 17th November 1900 the conviction of the said Ada Jane Stoddart was unanimously affirmed by the Court for the consideration of Crown Cases

Reserved: (see Reg. v. Stoddart, 83 L. T. Rep. 538; (1901) 1 Q. B. 177.)

The facts that were proved against the said Ada Jane Stoddart and upon which her conviction was founded were that she was the occupier of an office at 10, Red Lion-court, in the City of London, and the registered proprietor of a newspaper published weekly at that office. Each number of the paper contained a notice of what was called a "coupon competition," that is to say, of a promise by the then defendant to pay a certain specified sum of money to such persons as should correctly guess the result of a certain horse race then shortly about to be run, and should write their guesses upon certain forms called "coupons," which were issued with each number of the newspaper, and should return the coupons so filled up to the then defendant's office, together with the sum of one penny in respect of each guess made. A large number of persons every week sent in to the said office coupons filled up as aforesaid, accompanied by remittances of money.

3. As between the date of the said decision of the Court of Crown Cases Reserved affirming the said conviction and the date of the issue of the writ in this action, the plaintiff instructed the defendants under the agreement referred to in par. 1 in this defence to publish the advertisement called "An International Supplement," containing a number of coupons as part of the newspaper called Sporting Luck, in which was advertised to the English public a system of competition identical in all respects with that in regard to which the said Ada Jane Stoddart had been convicted, except that the competitors were no longer to send their moneys or deposits to No. 10, Red Lion-court, in the city of London or to any place of receipt or deposit within the jurisdiction of the English courts, but were to send all moneys to, and it was expressly announced that in the future all moneys would only be received at, an office which had been opened by the plaintiff for the purpose of receiving them at Middleburg, in the kingdom of Holland.

4. The defendants refused to print the said advertisement, contending that as the said office in Middleburg in Holland had been opened by the plaintiff for a purpose which would infringe sect. 1 of the Betting Act of 1853 and sect. 3 of the Betting Act 1874, if it had been so opened in this country the publication of an advertisement in relation to such an office was illegal under the specified sections of the two several Acts of Parliament which are above set forth, which refusal constitutes the breach alleged in the statement of claim and sued upon in this action.

The question raised on the pleadings and now argued was whether the advertisement of the "International Supplement" was or was not an infringement of sect. 7 of the Betting Act 1853 and sect. 3 of the Betting Act 1874.

The Betting Act 1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119), provides :

Sect. 1. No house, office, room, or other place shall be opened, kept, or used for the purpose of the owner, occupier, or keeper thereof, or any person using the same, or any person procured or employed by or acting for or on behalf of such owner, occupier, or keeper, or person using the same, or of any person having the care or management or in any manner conducting the business thereof betting with persons resorting thereto; or for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received by or on behalf of such owner, occupier, keeper, or person as aforesaid as or for the consideration for assurance, undertaking, promise, or agreement, express or implied, to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race, or other race, fight, game, sport, or exercise, or as or for the consideration for securing the paying or giving by some other person of any money or valuable thing on any such event or contingency as aforesaid; and every house, office, room, or other place opened, kept, or used for the purposes aforesaid, or any of them, is hereby declared to be a common nuisance and contrary to law.

Sect. 7. Any person exhibiting or publishing or causing to be exhibited or published any placard, handbill, card, writing, sign, or advertisement whereby it shall be made to appear that any house, office, room, or place is opened, kept, or used for the purpose of making bets or wagers, in manner aforesaid, or for the purpose of exhibiting lists for betting, or with intent to induce any person to resort to such house, office, room, or place for the purpose of making bets or wagers, in manner aforesaid, or any person who, on behalf of the owner or occupier of any such house, office, room, or place, or person using the same, shall invite other persons to resort thereto for the purpose of making bets or wagers, in manner aforesaid, shall, upon summary conviction thereof before two justices of the peace, forfeit and pay a sum not exceeding thirty pounds, and may be further adjudged by such justices to pay such costs attending such conviction as to the said justices shall seem reasonable; and on the nonpayment of such penalty and costs, or in the first instance if to such justices it shall seem fit, may be committed to the common gaol or house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any time not exceeding two calendar months.

The Betting Act 1874 (37 & 38 Vict. c. 15)—which by sect. 1 is to be construed as one with the Betting Act 1853, called the principal Act—provides:

Sect. 3. Where any letter, circular, telegram, placard, handbill, card, or advertisement is sent, exhibited, or published—(1) Whereby it is made to appear that any person, either in the United Kingdom or elsewhere, will on application give information or advice for the purpose of or with respect to any such bet or wager, or any such event or contingency as is mentioned in the principal Act, or will make on behalf of any other person any such bet or wager as is mentioned in the principal Act; or (2) with intent to induce any person to apply to any house office, room, or place, or to any person, with the view, of obtaining information or advice for the purpose of any such bet or wager or with respect to any such event or contingency as is mentioned in the principal Act; or (3) inviting any person to make or take any share in or in connection with any such bet or wager; every person sending, exhibiting, or publishing, or causing the same to be sent, exhibited, or published, shall be subject to the penalties provided in the seventh section of the principal Act with respect to offences under that section.

Lord Coleridge, K.O. and Stutfield (Bovill Smith with them) for the plaintiff.—The only advertisement which is illegal under these Acts is an advertisement of a betting-house, which comes within sect. 1. The preamble of the Act of 1853 is important as showing the scope of the Act; then sect. 1 deals with two distinct offences or illegal purposes: first, the offence of opening, keeping, or using a house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto; and, secondly, the keeping such a house for the purpose of any money or valuable thing being received there for those purposes. Then sect. 7, which is the section dealing with this matter, refers in fact to sect. 1, and prohibits the exhibiting or publishing, as described in that section, of any advertisement of a house as described in sect. 1. It does not prohibit the advertising of anything which does not come within sect. 1; and sect. 3 of the Act of 1874 does not go beyond the scope of sect. 1 of the Act of 1853, but merely refers us back again to sect. 1. Therefore these sections—sect. 7 of the Act of 1853 and sect. 3 of the Act of 1874—merely prohibit certain acts done in connection with the “house or office” which is defined in sect. 1, and do not enlarge the scope of that section. It becomes important, therefore, to see what is a “house, office, room, or place,” within sect. 1 of the Act of 1853, which is the governing section of the Act. That question was very fully discussed by the Court of Appeal and House of Lords in Powell v. Kempton Park Racecourse Company (77 L. T. Rep. 2; (1897) 2 Q. B. 242; 80 L. T. Rep. 538; (1899) A. C. 143). That case shows that what is forbidden in the first part of sect. 1 is the user of a prohibited place for the purpose of making bets with persons resorting to it—that is to say, an ordinary betting-house. The object of the Act was to suppress betting-houses, and the locality or place was the object of the suppression, and that locality must be within the jurisdiction of the court. The “bets” and the “resorting” referred to in sect. 7 must be bets made in, and a resorting to, a betting-house such as is aimed at in the Act, and the “house” in that section means and can only mean a betting-house in this country. Sect. 7, therefore, with regard to advertising, must relate to a place within the jurisdiction which comes within sect. 1, and sect. 3 of the Act of 1874 must also relate back to the Act of 1853 and to a house or betting-house in this country:

Coe v. Andrews, 12 Q. B. Div. 126.

Publishing an advertisement that there is a betting-house in Holland is not publishing such information in respect of a betting-house as is contemplated by sect. 1, and is therefore not prohibited by law. No possible construction of the statute can apply to a house out of the United Kingdom, and there can be no illegal user in this country of a house outside this country. Sect. 1 deals with the betting-house itself, and is the first Act which condemns the house itself, and condemns it as a common nuisance (sect. 1) and as a common gaming-house (sect. 2) within 8 & 9 Vict. c. 109. It would be contrary to every principle of construction and of international comity to extend these provisions to houses in any foreign country and to declare them common gaming-houses and nuisances. The right to search suspected houses given by sects. 11 and 12 could not be applied if a “house” applies to houses abroad; and if the true construction were that “houses” include houses abroad, it would not have been necessary specially to exclude Scotland as the Act does in sect. 20. It is necessary to show that the houses are within the jurisdiction of the court. The case of Macnee v. Persian Investment Corporation (62 L. T. Rep. 894; 44 Ch. Div. 306), as to lotteries, shows that a prohibition as to advertising lotteries would not extend to foreign lotteries unless specially made to do so by the statute. In the statute there is question (6 & 7 Will. 4, c. 66), there was an express prohibition against advertising “foreign and other illegal lotteries,” and it is clear that but for that express statutory prohibition there would be no prohibition against advertising foreign lotteries. An Act ought not to be so construed as to make it extend to foreign countries; and prima facie when an Act is prohibited by statute it is prohibited only with regard to acts done in England, and this is especially so with regard to statutes dealing with criminal offences. This Act therefore can only apply to betting-houses in this country, and when sect. 7 prohibits the publishing of advertisements of houses opened or kept for the purpose of making bets, it refers to and is confined to houses which come within the first of the two illegal purposes set out in sect. 1, and the case of Reg. v. Brown (72 L. T. Rep. 22; (1895) 1 Q. B. 119) shows that that purpose must be betting with persons physically resorting to the house. The house must be a house of resort, and there must be a physical resorting to the house for the purpose of betting, and that only is the house the advertisement of which is aimed at in sect. 7. It is perfectly clear that sect. 7 does not cover this case, but is confined to advertising houses within the jurisdiction which are kept for betting with persons physically resorting thereto, and sect. 3 of the Act of 1874 carries the case no farther.

C. W. Mathews for the defendants.—The defendants were in this position: They had this contract with the plaintiff for the printing of this paper. This contract was of value to them, and they did not wish to give it up unless there were some good reason for their doing so. At the same time they did not wish in the least degree to break the law or infringe the provisions of these Acts, and accordingly, after the conviction of Mrs. Stoddart in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart (ante, p. 48; 83 L. T. Rep. 538; (1901) 1 Q. B. 177), it became necessary for the defendants to reconsider their position, which they did, and they refused to print the paper so that the point might be properly settled whether in so printing it they would be acting legally or illegally. The defendants had to look at sect. 1 of the Act of 1853 under both its heads, and they had to take into consideration that sect. 7 of the same Act was co-extensive with sect. 1, and that therefore it would be a criminal offence under sect. 7 to publish these advertisements under the circumstances. The reason of their refusal to print the advertisement was that, as they contended, if the office in Holland had been opened in this country for the same purpose for which it had been opened in Holland, it would have been illegal under sect. 1 of the Act of 1853 and sect. 3 of the Act of 1874, and in that case the publication of an advertisement relating to the same would have come within sect. 7 and have been illegal. The words in sect. 7 are very wide, and the defendants had to consider, having regard to the decision in Reg. v. Brown (ubi sup.), whether there was not a complete offence, although there was no resorting to this house. In that case Lord Russell, C.J. says: "The real gist of the offence created by the section is the opening and keeping of a house for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, and the offence could be proved although no person ever resorted there." The defendants were therefore justified under sect. 7 of the Act of 1853 and sect. 3 of the Act of 1874 in refusing to print this advertisement.

PHILLIMORE, J.—In this case we are of opinion that there should be judgment for the plaintiff, and possibly on a somewhat narrow ground. The 1st section of the Betting Act

1853 (16 & 17 Vict. c. 119) deals with two different offences: first, the offence of keeping a betting-house to which persons resort for the purpose of betting. The decision of the Court for Crown Cases Reserved—whose decision upon such a point is binding on us—in the case of Reg. v. Brown (ubi sup.) says that that resort must be physical. Therefore the first part of sect. 1 makes it illegal to keep a house to which persons physically resort for the purpose of betting. That is not the class of offence which it is suggested the plaintiff Stoddart may be committing by what he is now doing. The second half of the section deals with the case of a person who keeps an office at which money is received (whether physically brought there or sent there by post or by messenger) by the owner, occupier, or keeper, "as or for the consideration for any . . . promise or agreement . . . to pay or give thereafter any money or valuable thing on any event or contingency of or relating to any horse race," or to certain other events. Under that half of this section—sect. 1—Mrs. Stoddart was convicted, and the conviction was upheld by the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart (ubi sup.). The circumstances under which she was convicted are precisely the same as the circumstances of the business which the plaintiff is now carrying on and which the defendants are asked to advertise, except that the plaintiff has his house of business outside the jurisdiction—namely, in the kingdom of Holland—and not inside the United Kingdom. It has been suggested and argued that the place where the plaintiff carries on his business makes all the difference, but, speaking for myself, I do not think it is necessary to get to that point. If this business had been the business which Mrs. Stoddart carried on and for which she was convicted, I still fail to see that advertising that business would, in the language of the 2nd paragraph of the amended defence, have constituted an offence against the Betting Acts 1853 and 1874, because the sections with regard to advertising are sect. 7 of the Act of 1853 and sect. 3 of the Act of 1874. When we come carefully to analyse sect. 7 of the Act of 1853, we see that it is directed against advertisements of houses kept for the first of the two purposes in sect. 1, and not against houses kept only for the purpose of the second offence under that section. The question was left to a certain extent open in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart (ubi sup.), whether the particular form of so-called competition for encouraging which Mrs. Stoddart was convicted was betting or not. For myself I think it was betting, for the reasons given in that case by my brother Wills; but it is not necessary at all to decide that point, because the offence under the first half of sect. 1 is not the offence of keeping the house open for the purpose of betting simpliciter, but it is the offence of keeping the house open for the purpose of betting with persons resorting thereto, which resorting, under the authority of Reg. v. Brown (ubi sup.), means a physical resorting. So that, whether this form of competition be or be not a bet, it is not a bet made by persons resorting to a place for the purpose of betting; and therefore sect. 7, which only relates to advertisements of such houses, does not make this particular publication an offence. Then sect. 3 of the Betting Act of 1874 was at one time thought by us to put further difficulty in the way of the plaintiff, but, again, when that section is analysed it does not do so. The 1st sub-section relates entirely to information and advice; and it makes it an offence to advertise that someone will give information or advice with respect to any such bet or wager. That 1st sub-section is as follows: [His Lordship read the section and sub-sect. 1, and proceeded:] That is not this case. I agree with the contention of counsel for the plaintiff that in the 2nd sub-section the words "with respect to any such event or contingency" are all subordinate to the words "information or advice." My brother Bruce has pointed out to me that the words in the 1st sub-section seem to show that that must be the grammatical meaning, however awkwardly it is expressed. Therefore the 2nd sub-section only deals with advertisements which point out persons or places where information or advice can be obtained, which, again, is not this case. The 3rd sub-section deals with advertisements inviting any persons to make any such bet or wager, or take any share in, or in connection with, any such bet or wager. Then we have to consider what is the meaning of "such bet or wager." It is such bet or wager, as the 1st sub-section shows, as is mentioned in the principal Act—that is, the Act of 1853. The only bets or wagers which are mentioned in the principal Act are bets or wagers made by the persons resorting to a house for the purpose of betting, or, according to the construction put on these words, physically resorting to a house for the purpose of betting. Therefore there is nothing in sect. 3 which makes the act of these defendants illegal. They are not offending against these Acts by reason of their publishing this advertisement, and therefore they have no right to break their contract, and there must be judgment for the plaintiff. In saying this, however, we pass no opinion upon the question whether or not the plaintiff Joseph Stoddart is carrying on a legal business. From what passed on a previous occasion, I should conjecture that it was hoped by this proceeding to obtain a decision from this court which might have some bearing on certain summonses pending before the alderman against the plaintiff in respect of the carrying on of his business. If that be so, nothing that we are now saying will assist or injure the hearing of these summonses. Speaking for myself, and I believe speaking with the consent of my brother, I in no way consider whether or not Joseph Stoddart, by having moved the business from London to Middleburg, has or has not escaped from the decision of the Court for the Consideration of Crown Cases Reserved in the case of Reg. v. Stoddart (ubi sup.). Taking it that he is doing exactly the same thing for which Mrs. Stoddart was convicted, I still say that neither sect. 7 of the Act of 1853 nor sect. 3 of the Act of 1874 makes it illegal in the defendant company to print and publish that particular advertisement.

HALL (app.) v. McWILLIAM (resp.). (a)

Lottery—Sale of chances—Proposal or scheme for sale of chances in newspaper—"Spot" competition in newspaper—Conviction—Lottery Act 1823 (4 Geo. 4, c. 60), s. 41.

It was announced in an issue of an evening newspaper belonging to a limited company and sold for the price of one halfpenny, that for a certain period in certain issues of the newspaper spots of varying size and configuration would be printed in various parts of the issues.

Some of such spots were distinguished as winning spots. It was also stated in the paper that on a specified day an announcement would appear in the paper showing the exact configuration of such spots as were declared to be winning spots; and it was stated in all the issues in question that the person who cut from the newspaper and sent to the offices of the same the portion of the newspaper containing any spot the facsimile of which had been declared to be a winning spot, would receive a prize. The winning spots were arbitrarily selected by the proprietors of the newspaper, and the winning of the prizes depended wholly upon chance.

The appellant, the printer and publisher of the newspaper, was summoned under sect. 41 of the Lotteries Act 1823 (4 Geo. 4, c. 60), for unlawfully publishing a proposal and scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery, namely, the proposal and scheme called "spots," and was convicted under the section as a rogue and vagabond.

Held, that the sale of the newspapers was the publishing a proposal and scheme for the sale of chances in a lottery, not authorised by any Act of Parliament within the meaning of the section, and that the appellant was properly convicted under the section.

CASE stated by the Lord Mayor of the city of London.

At a court of summary jurisdiction, sitting at the Mansion House, in the city of London, on the 22nd Jan. 1901, an information was preferred against the appellant under sect. 41 of 4 Geo. 4, c. 60, that he did, on the 29th Nov. 1900, unlawfully publish a certain proposal and scheme, to wit, a proposal and scheme called "Spots," for the sale of certain chances in a certain lottery not authorised by any Act of Parliament.

This information was heard before the Lord Mayor, who convicted the appellant, subject to this case for the opinion of the court.

Upon the hearing the following facts were proved or admitted.

The appellant was the printer and publisher of a certain evening newspaper called the Sun, and was liable to a conviction on the information if the offence charged was proved.

The Sun newspaper is the property of a limited liability company called "The Sol Syndicate," having offices at Temple-avenue, where the business of the newspaper is carried on.

The paper is published and sold in London as an evening newspaper at the price of a halfpenny, and the following issues—namely, the 29th Nov., the 3rd, 5th, 7th, 10th, and 12th Dec. 1900—containing the system referred to in the information,

K.B. Div.]

HALL (app.) v. McWILLIAM (resp.).

[K.B. Div.]

were put in evidence, and were to be treated as part of this case. No other evidence as to the nature of the scheme was tendered.

What the scheme was fully appeared from the issues of the newspaper; shortly it was as follows: It was announced in an issue of the paper dated the 29th Nov. that for a certain period in certain issues of every edition of the Sun, spots of varying size and configuration would be printed in various parts of the said issues. Some of such spots were distinguished as winning spots.

It was further announced in the said issue that on Wednesday, the 19th Dec., an announcement would appear showing the exact configuration of such spots as were declared winning spots.

It was stated in all such issues that the person who cut out from the newspaper and sent to the offices of the Sun newspaper the portion of the paper containing any spot, the facsimile of which had been thus announced as a winning spot, would receive a prize.

It was further announced in the above papers that the prizes differed for different spots.

It was also announced in the papers that certain persons, whose names and addresses were given, had in fact received prizes in accordance with the scheme set forth.

It was contended on behalf of the appellant that he had not committed the offence charged on the following grounds: That he had not published any scheme for the sale of a chance, within the meaning of the Acts, and that no chance had been sold or offered for sale; that the scheme was for the sale of the newspaper in the ordinary course of business at the fixed price which had always been charged—namely, a halfpenny—and that the distribution of prizes under this scheme was gratuitous, and was the result merely of a scheme by way of legitimate advertisement, ancillary to and in furtherance of the sale of the newspaper at its regular and fixed price, and was not a scheme for the sale of a chance, so as to constitute a lottery within the meaning of the Acts.

And secondly, that to enable the purchaser of a newspaper, which contained a winning spot to acquire the prize offered, necessitated on his part the exercise of such sufficient care, skill, and vigilance as to render the acquisition of such prize by him not a mere matter of chance.

The magistrate found, as a fact, that the winning of the prizes depended wholly upon chance.

The magistrate was of opinion upon the facts above stated that the above proposal and scheme, so published by the appellant, was a lottery not authorised by any Act of Parliament, and he therefore convicted him as a rogue and vagabond and fined him 25*l.* with 10*l.* 10*s.* for costs.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether the Lord Mayor, upon the above statement of facts, came to a correct determination, and decision in point of law, and if not, what should be done in the premises.

The Lotteries Act 1823 (4 Geo. 4, c. 60)—an Act for granting to his Majesty a sum of money to be raised by lotteries—provides:

Sect. 41. If any person or persons shall sell any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances in any lottery or lotteries authorised by any foreign potentate or state, or to be drawn in any foreign country, or in any lottery or lotteries, except such as are or shall be authorised by this or some other Act of Parliament to be sold, or shall publish any proposal or scheme for the sale of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, share or shares of any ticket or tickets, chance or chances, except such lottery or lotteries as shall be authorised as aforesaid, such person or persons shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of fifty pounds, and shall also be deemed a rogue and vagabond, or rogues and vagabonds, and shall be punished as such in the manner hereinafter directed.

Marshall Hall, K.C. and Germaine for the appellant.—This is not a lottery, because under the particular statute which deals with this matter there must be a sale of a chance in the first place, and it must be exclusively chance and no skill. Those are the two points. The preamble of the Act (4 Geo. 4, c. 60) clearly shows that a competition of this kind does not come within the spirit of the Act, and that the section cannot apply to the case of a sale of a halfpenny newspaper as in this case. To bring the case within the Act there must be, first, chance; secondly, no skill; and, thirdly, the sale of a chance. The real point is that there must be the sale of a chance, and it is conceded that there must be a sale. A sale implies a consideration moving from the purchaser of the newspaper towards the seller of it. There is no consideration here for the sale of the chance; the consideration (the halfpenny) is for the sale of the newspaper, and not for the sale of the chance. No portion of this halfpenny goes to the buying of the chance; the whole of it goes to the buying of the newspaper. Generally, when there are cases of selling chances, it is possible to apportion a specific part of the sum paid to the buying of the chances; but that is not so here. No portion of the halfpenny can possibly be allocated to the chance of getting the sovereign in this case, that is, to buying the chance. In order to constitute a lottery under this section there must be a payment of at least a halfpenny, as that is the smallest coin, and there must be the payment of some coin. This is not a sale at all; it is really a gift by the proprietors to the purchaser of a paper containing a winning spot. The decision in Caminada v. Hulton (64 L. T. Rep. 572), is entirely in the appellant's favour, as it decided that no offence had there been committed under sect. 41 of this Act. They also referred to Taylor v. Smetton, 11 Q. B. Div. 207.

Avory, K.C. and R. D. Muir, for the respondent, were not called upon to argue.

RIDLEY, J.—In this case the question is whether the magistrate was right in convicting the appellant under sect. 41 of the Lotteries Act 1823. [His Lordship read it.] There is no authority of an Act of Parliament which can be called in aid by the appellant in this case, so that those words in the section can have no application here, and therefore what we have to decide is whether the magistrate was right in holding that, upon the facts, the proposal and scheme so published by the appellant was a lottery. The facts are shortly these. In the Sun newspaper there were placed certain spots, I do not know how many or in what parts of the newspaper they were placed. A day came when a prize was given to the possessor of a spot which carried the right to a prize.

K.B.] NEW RIVER COMPANY v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF HERTFORD UNION. [K.B.]

If the purchaser of a newspaper could find that spot in the copy of the newspaper which he had bought, he would become entitled to the prize. It was not really argued that this was a case of skill, because that was not the point persisted in. If skill were really required in the discovery of the spot which entitled the owner of the spot to a prize, then the case would come within the principal in Caminada v. Hulton (ubi sup.), where the court decided that there was no lottery in that case, because there the question of skill came in, and it was necessary for anyone to win the prize to be able to select among the horses those which were likely to win the races. In that case there came in the question of skill, but in this case the point is, I think, very properly not insisted upon that anything like skill was required in the discovery of the spot. The case is different from those cases where perhaps there might be a consideration as to whether skill was required or not. Here there is no such element. The argument is that the newspaper is sold with other objects, such as the dissemination of news, and that this is but a minor portion of the scheme under which the newspaper is conducted, and that, the price of the newspaper being only one halfpenny, therefore one cannot discover that any tangible part of the sum paid for such newspaper is a purchase of a chance as distinct from the newspaper, and it is therefore contended that what has been is not within the Act of Parliament. I cannot discover any good reason for supporting any of those arguments. It seems to me to be certain that what a person buys, when he gives one halfpenny for a newspaper under these conditions, is not only the newspaper and the news which he obtains by the purchase of the paper, but also the chance which enters into his mind that he may be the fortunate possessor of the newspaper with the lucky spot upon it. I think it is impossible to suppose that is not so. It may be that the owners of the newspaper have other objects in their mind as to what they will do and how they will benefit by the offering of these prizes; but as far as the purchaser is concerned, I think he does buy with this newspaper the chance of obtaining the prize. Therefore I think there is a scheme for the sale of a ticket, chance, or chances, within the meaning of this Act. The argument for the appellant seems to assume that because the price is one halfpenny therefore you cannot say that any particular portion of that is given for a chance, when you cannot allocate what portion of the halfpenny is given for that chance. But that it enters into the mind of the purchaser of the newspaper seems to me quite certain. For these reasons I think the conviction ought to be upheld.

BIGHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. The appellant was summoned for unlawfully publishing a certain proposal and scheme—namely, a proposal and scheme called “spots” for certain chances in a certain lottery not authorised by any Act of Parliament. Now, sect. 41 of the statute 4 Geo. 4, c. 60, provides that if any person shall publish any proposal or scheme for the sale of any chance or chances in a lottery, he shall be guilty of an offence and shall be fined in the sum mentioned in the Act. The question in this case is whether the appellant was, in the circumstances, guilty of the offence mentioned in the statute. I think he was. What he did was to sell a newspaper to purchasers and with the newspaper to sell a chance of getting a prize in a lottery. The newspapers contained spots, apparently in different parts, and by some means or other, one of these spots was ascertained afterwards to be the winning spot, and any person who could produce a newspaper with that winning spot upon it and could point it out, received the money that he had won by his chance. I cannot understand how that is not publishing proposals for the sale of a chance. It is said that in some way or another no chance is sold because the one halfpenny that is given for the newspaper is said to be exhausted by the receipt of the newspaper by the person who pays the halfpenny. That is not accurate. What the person who buys this newspaper gets for his halfpenny is not the mere newspaper, but the chance as well. The two things—the newspaper and the chance—are sold together, and it does not make it any the less the sale of a chance that there happened to be conveyed with the chance something else—namely, the newspaper. I am therefore clearly of opinion that this offence was committed by the appellant, and that the conviction was right.

Conviction affirmed, and appeal dismissed.

NEW RIVER COMPANY v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF HERTFORD UNION. (a)

Rating—Water company—Intake works—Payments for intake to local authorities—Assessment of works—Principle applicable.

Where a water company is under its private Acts obliged to make capital or annual payments for the liberty to take water from a river, neither such liberty nor such payments are an element to be taken into consideration in assessing the value for rating purposes of the intake works.

The N. R. Company, under certain private Acts, in consideration of being allowed to take water from the river L., agreed to pay 42,000l. to the conservators of the river for the purpose of improving the navigation of the river, and also an annual sum to the conservators for general purposes, and a further annual sum to the Corporation of H.

The company erected certain works in the parish of St. John for the purpose of taking the water from the river L.

In assessing these works for rating purposes the assessment committee added to their annual value as based on the value of the land and the cost of erecting the works a further sum, based on these payments, for the value of the intake of water.

Held, that neither the liberty to take the water nor the payments made for such liberty could be taken into consideration in fixing the annual value of the works.

Liverpool Corporation v. Llanfyllin Union Assessment Committee (80 L. T. Rep. 667; (1899) 2 Q. B. 14) considered.

(a) Reported by J. ANDREW STRAHAN, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

K.B.] NEW RIVER COMPANY v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF HERTFORD UNION. [K.B.]

CASE stated by the Court of Quarter Sessions for the Hertford Division of the county of Hertford upon an appeal against a rate whereby the appellants were rated in the sums of 787*l.* plus 32*s.* 9*d.* gross, and 650*l.* plus 31*s.* 8*d.* rateable value.

1. The history of the appellant company and of their right to take water from the river Lee is contained in their charter and in the following statutes: 3 Jac. I, c. xviii.; 12 Geo. 2, c. xxxii.; Lee Navigation Improvement Act 1850 (13 & 14 Vict. c. cix.); River Lee Water Act 1855 (18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi.); Lee Conservancy Act 1868 (31 & 32 Vict. c. cliv.); Lee Conservancy Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxvii.).

2. Shortly stated, the facts appearing from the charter and statutes are as follows:—

3. The appellant company were formed under a charter granted in 1618 by King James I. for the purpose of bringing water from certain springs at Ohadwell and Amwell, in the county of Hertford, to London.

4. For many years prior to the year 1738 the appellant company had taken considerable quantities of water out of the river Lee, the point of intake being at a place called Chalk Island, in a channel of the river Lee called the Manifold Ditch, from which the water so taken flowed by means of an artificial cutting into the New River.

5. In the year 1738, by 12 Geo. 2, c. xxxii., the appellant company were permitted under sect. 5 of the Act to take a specified quantity of water from the river Lee through the Manifold Ditch, and the Manifold Ditch and the water running through it were (by sect. 11) vested in the appellant company, who were directed (by sect. 17) to pay to the trustees appointed to carry out the Act two capital sums amounting to 3250*l.* and two annual sums amounting to 350*l.* All those sums were (by sect. 18) to be applied to purposes relating to the navigation and purity of the water of the river Lee and the costs of passing the Act. The company were also required by sect. 3 of the Act to keep in repair the lock near the Ware Mills.

6. In 1850, 13 & 14 Vict. c. cix. gave the trustees of the river Lee the right to sell surplus water from the river Lee to certain water companies, and the appellant company for three years made an annual payment of 1500*l.* for water so purchased by them and supplied at an intake near Tottenham, in the county of Middlesex. The intake has not been used since the year 1855, but it might still be used.

7. In 1855, by 18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi., ss. 4, 5, the annual payments under the above-mentioned statutes ceased, and in lieu of such payments an annual sum of 1500*l.* and a capital sum of 42,000*l.* were directed to be paid by the appellant company. In return for these payments and other payments to be made by the East London Waterworks Company this statute (by sect. 9) vested in the appellant company and the East London Waterworks Company all the water flowing in the river Lee except so much as was required for navigation. The trustees of the river Lee were (by sect. 43) directed to expend 30,000*l.* of the capital sum of 42,000*l.* in specified improvements relating to the navigation of that river. The Act also contains provisions for the regulation of the quantity of the water to be taken by the appellant company from the river Lee through Manifold Ditch, and required the appellant company to construct a new gauge, which new gauge, with a house or building to contain the same with the requisite machinery, was erected by the appellant company in or about the year 1859 near the point of intake.

8. In 1868, by 31 & 32 Vict. c. cliv., the appellant company were directed (by sect. 103) to pay the annual sum of 600*l.* to the Corporation of Hertford, and (by sect. 131) the appellant company and the East London Waterworks Company were directed to pay an additional aggregate yearly sum not exceeding 1000*l.* (of which the appellant company were to pay one-third to the Conservators of the River Lee)—who, by that Act, became the successors of the trustees—for purposes therein specified relating to the purity of the water of the river Lee.

9. Since 1868 the appellant company have paid to the Conservators of the River Lee, under these statutes, an annual sum of 1833*l.* 6*s.* 8*d.*, and have paid to the Corporation of Hertford an annual sum of 600*l.*

10. By the Lee Conservancy Act 1900 (63 & 64 Vict. c. cxvii.), s. 25, which received the Royal Assent on the 30th July 1900, from and after the 1st Jan. 1901 the aggregate yearly sum payable by the appellant company and the East London Waterworks Company under sect. 5 of the Act 18 & 19 Vict. c. cxcvi. (referred to in par. 7 hereof) was to be increased to 8000*l.*, of which 3750*l.* was to be paid by the appellant company, and from and after the same date the additional aggregate yearly sum payable by the two companies under sect. 131 of 31 & 32 Vict. c. cliv. (referred to in par. 8 hereof) was to be increased to 2000*l.*, and that section is to be read and construed accordingly.

11. The parish of St. John urban, in respect of which the rate in question was made, was formed under the Local Government Act 1894, and comprised a portion of the previously existing parish of St. John, Hertford (the part within the borough of Hertford), and in addition thereto a part of the liberty of Little Amwell (such part as was within the borough aforesaid).

12. From 1876 to 1894 the appellant company's property in the parish of St. John was rated at 350*l.* and in the liberty of Little Amwell at 500*l.*, and those figures had not been materially altered since 1859.

13. Upon the new parish of St. John urban being formed the property of the appellant company therein was rated at 350*l.* in respect of that portion which was in the parish of St. John, and at 300*l.* in respect of that portion which was taken from the old liberty of Little Amwell. The portion left in the old liberty of Little Amwell, which had then been constituted the new parish of Little Amwell, was rated at 200*l.* The rating of the property of the appellant company in the new parish of St. John urban therefore stood at the same valuation as in 1876.

14. Until Jan. 1900 the property of the appellant company in the parish of St. John urban had never been assessed at more than 650*l.* rateable value.

15. In Jan. 1900, by a supplemental valuation list subsequently confirmed by the assessment committee, a further sum of 3180*l.* was added to the rateable value in the assessment of the property in the occupation of the appellant company under an entry in which the company were rated for property described as "intake from the river Lee." On the 24th May 1900 the rate in question was made in accordance with the supplemental valuation list. The following is a copy of the said rate:

K.B.] NEW RIVER COMPANY v. ASSESSMENT COMMITTEE OF HERTFORD UNION. [K.B.]

No.	Name of Occupier.	Name of Owner.	Description of Property rated.	Name or Situation of Property.	Estimated Extent.	Gross Estimated Rental.	Rateable value of Buildings, &c.	Amount of Rate at 1s. 2d. in the £ on Agricultural Land and 2s. 6d. in the £ on other hereditaments.
125	New River Company	New River Company	Chadwell Spring—portion of the New River gauge-house, sluice, and appurtenances	Kings Meads	a. r. p. 5 2 38	£ 787	£ 650	£ s. d. 78 10 10
126	New River Company	New River Company	Intake from river Lee	Kings Meads	—	3280	3180	384 5 0

16. The appellant company duly appealed against the rate, the grounds of their appeal, so far as they are material to this case, being—(1) that the appellant company were overrated; (2) that the appellant company did not occupy any rateable hereditament in the parish coming within the description of intake from the river Lee; and (3) that no rateable hereditament coming within that description had any existence in the parish.

17. The appeal came on for hearing on the 15th Oct. 1900, when the above-stated facts were proved or admitted.

18. It was further proved and admitted that the sum of 3180*l.* was arrived at by the professional valuer who made the supplemental valuation list by taking 4 per cent. upon the capital sum of 42,000*l.* (namely, 1680*l.*) and the annual sum of 1500*l.* directed to be paid under the above-mentioned statute of 1855, but the respondents admitted that, although these sums might be prima facie evidence, they were not necessarily the measure of rateable value.

19. It was also proved that the actual intake from the river Lee consisted of a certain structure with the land upon which it stood, that the appellant company had put a grating across the mouth or opening of the Manifold Ditch where water issued from the river to prevent timber and other things from floating into the intake, and that they had erected posts in the bed of the river to protect the intake, and that they were in occupation of the posts, and that in and by the item of 650*l.* the intake grating and posts were rated at their full structural value, that the area of the land was about three poles, and that its annual value as land (apart from its user as an intake) did not exceed 5*l.*, which was also included in the sum of 650*l.* It was at this point that the specified quantity of water which the appellant company were authorised to take from the river Lee entered the Manifold Ditch and flowed thence into the New River. For the respondents it was contended—(1) That beyond the rating of the intake at its structural value and value as land it ought to be rated in an additional sum as having an enhanced value in respect of the user made of it by taking water from the river Lee into the channel of the appellant company; (2) that the sums of money which the appellant company had paid under the statutes were evidence that the land and the structure erected thereon had some additional value beyond the structural value thereof in respect of the user made of them, and that such additional value was sufficiently great to support the rate appealed against; (3) that the additional payments directed by sect. 25 of the Lee Conservancy Act 1900 were evidence to show what (in the opinion of Parliament at the date of the passing of that Act) the user of the intake was worth to the appellant company. The appellants contended—(1) That all the rateable property of the appellant company in the parish was already rated in the item 650*l.*; (2) that no addition ought to be made to the assessment of 650*l.* in respect of the water flowing over the intake or of the user of the intake by such water flowing over it; (3) that the intake ought not to be assessed upon or with reference to the moneys represented by the item 3180*l.*, which were paid by the appellant company for the purchase of water and the right to divert water from and control the water in the river Lee or with reference to the sums payable under the Act of 1900.

The Court of Quarter Sessions dismissed the appeal.

The question for the court was whether the hereditament was rateable upon the principle contended for by the respondents. If it was so rateable the judgment was to stand; if not, then either the gross and rateable values were to be reduced respectively to the sums of 787*l.* and 650*l.*, or the court was to make such other order herein as it should think just.

Marshall, K.C. (R. D. Muir with him) for the appellants.—There are two ways of assessing the value of property liable to assessment. Where the property is property which produces income, the way to assess it is by fixing the annual rent a tenant would fairly pay for it. Where the property is property which produces no income—that is, property for which no tenant could be obtained—then the value of it should be assessed on its structural value. Here the property is of the second kind. To assess its annual value its structural value must be ascertained, and then a percentage on this as a capital amount:

Reg. v. Mile End Old Town Overseers, 10 Q. B. 208;
Reg. v. New River Company, 1 M. & S. 503;
Reg. v. Miller, 2 Cowp. 619;
Reg. v. West Middlesex Waterworks Company,
 1 E. & E. 716.

The intake of water cannot be taken into consideration in assessing the value since it does not enable the companies to make any profits in the parish, and the capital amount paid for the water cannot be considered part of the cost of construction since it had nothing to do with the construction. The annual payment of 1500*l.* is simply a payment made for water received, and has nothing to do with any hereditament within the parish.

Byde for the respondents.—The intake of water is rateable on two grounds. In the first place, it is a licence held by the appellants in respect to a rateable hereditament, and, just like a licence to sell intoxicating liquors, it should be regarded as increasing the value of the hereditament. In the second place, the capital sum paid for improvements on the river Lee and the annual payments on that behalf may be regarded as expenses of construction, if it is to be said that we are only to look to the structural value of the hereditament:

Reg. v. Grand Junction Railway, 4 Q. B. 18;
Liverpool Corporation v. Llanfyllin Union Assessment Committee, 80 L. T. Rep. 667; (1899)
 2 Q. B. 14.

In the latter case the facts were very like the facts here. There the works in question were a reservoir, and the question was whether the money spent under their private Act in building a new church, vicarage, and school in place of the church, vicarage, and school situate on the land to be submerged by the reservoir was part of the cost of construction. The Court of Appeal held that it was.

RIDLEY, J.—This case, no doubt, is one of some importance, but I think the principle on which it ought to be decided is perfectly clear. Upon a question of this kind there is a considerable body of authority, and I think the point raised in this case is concluded by decisions that are to be found in the books—the latest to which we have been specially referred being Liverpool Corporation v. Llanfyllin Union Assessment Committee (sup.). That case was a case very similar to the present, where the subject of the rate was waterworks, and the principle already known was applied to the part of the undertaking which was not the direct earning part, but the indirect earning part. I think this principle can be traced back to the decision of Reg. v. Mile End Old Town Overseers (sup.) if not to even an earlier date—namely, that in cases like the present the rateable value is not to be arrived at by the usual rule or method of ascertaining what the hypothetical tenant of the statute will give by way of rent for the hereditament, but a different method of valuation must be adopted. In the words of Smith, L.J. in giving judgment in the Court of Appeal in Liverpool Corporation v. Llanfyllin Union Assessment Committee (at p. 669 L. T. Rep. and p. 20, 2 Q. B., sup.): “It is familiar law that where a hereditament can be compared with other hereditaments of a like nature which are the subject of letting, its rateable value may be arrived at by showing what rent tenants from year to year will in fact give for such hereditaments; but a difficulty in rating law arises with regard to hereditaments which cannot be compared with other similar hereditaments so as to ascertain the rent which a tenant will actually give for them. Therefore, inasmuch as a rateable hereditament cannot be allowed to escape from being rated because no such comparison can be made, in such cases it has come to be a recognised position that the rent which a hypothetical tenant would give for the hereditament must be estimated in some other way. In a case like the present, where no profits are earned in the parish by the use of the hereditament, a rough way of arriving at the rateable value by rule of thumb, there being no other way available, is to see what the site and the construction of the works cost, and take a percentage on the capital amount so expended as representing the rent which a tenant would give.” Now, there is the principle clearly laid down, and in this case it was applied to hereditaments precisely similar to those which are the subject of the rate in the present case. It therefore seems to me impossible to argue that the principle does not apply to them. Applying it, the question is whether it is right that this increase of the rate, representing what is called the user of the water—I use those words simply as a short phrase, and without intending to give them any particular signification—should be added and taken into account. It is not, I think. I think there is included in the old rate all that is properly the subject of consideration in a matter like this—namely, the value of the land and the cost of the structure upon it. But it is argued that there is to be taken into account what is called in the rate the “intake.” It is not merely the intake, but, as has been contended on behalf of the respondents, the right to use the water. It was also contended that that right is attached to the land and therefore must be taken into account, because it is in some way the cost of the construction. I cannot agree with that contention. It seems to me that, assuming the right has a bearing upon the general use of the undertaking, it is no part of, and cannot logically be connected with, the construction. It was also contended that it should be taken into account as the cost of the construction because the money has to be paid. It is true the money has to be paid—the £2,000. and the annual sum; but they are not the cost of construction, nor do I think that Liverpool Corporation v. Llanfyllin Union Assessment Committee (sup.) on this point assists the respondents’ argument. Upon their behalf it has been contended that the money which has to be paid to the proprietors or corporators of the River Lee Navigation is in the same position as that which was required in the latter case to provide the new church, vicarage, and schools, and the bridges and roads in place of those which were to be covered by the water of the new reservoir. Now, the Court of Appeal dealt with that question in this way. Smith, L.J. says (at p. 669 L. T. Rep. and at 22, 2 Q. B., sup.): “They could not construct the works which they desired to construct as necessary for the purposes of the water supply to their city without coming under the obligation to provide a new church, vicarage, and schools in lieu of paying a pecuniary compensation for those which would be destroyed by the works”; and by that process of reasoning they arrived at the conclusion that the cost of providing these new schools, bridges, and roads was an expenditure required for the purpose of constructing the new works precisely as if it had been a payment down for the matters mentioned. In my opinion this payment to the corporators of the River Lee Conservancy cannot be treated as an expenditure of the same nature. I think, therefore, that this case is covered by authority, and it is not right to add to the rate this sum in respect of that which may be called the user of the water. But there is another objection to the rate. The right to use the water is not connected with this piece of land. It may be transferred, and there is a power still remaining and existing to transfer it. Nor, in my opinion, can it be taken into account in the same way as the particular advantages which

REX v. BURNBY.

[K.B. Div.]

result from the user of a piece of land in the hands of a tenant might. In such a case there is a tenant rated in the ordinary way, and, if a spring of water issues from his land, he must be rated on the value of the land with the right to that spring of water. But is there not the widest difference between that case and the present? It appears to me that there is, and that for these reasons the decision of the Court of Quarter Sessions was wrong, and that the rate ought to be reduced to the former figure.

BIGHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion. The rule in a case of this kind is that the value of the land and the cost of the construction of the buildings shall be ascertained and the assessment fixed upon a percentage of the amount of those two items. A question, however, sometimes arises as to what items of the cost of construction ought to be included. Such a question arose in Liverpool Corporation v. Llanfyllin Union Assessment Committee (sup.), and there it was held that the money which had to be paid by the local authority before the reservoir could be constructed was to be regarded as part of the cost of construction. Upon behalf of the respondents it is now contended that the decision in that case compels us to hold that they are entitled to succeed in the present case. But what is it that the respondents desire to add to the assessment? It is neither money which must be paid as a condition precedent to the construction of the buildings, nor is it part of that spent on the construction itself. It is, therefore, in my opinion, not an element to be taken into consideration.

REX v. BURNBY. (a)

Criminal law—Permitting licensed premises to be used as brothel—Averment of commission of offence on different days—Continuing offence.

As information charged B. that he within six months then passed—namely, on the 26th, 28th, 29th, and 31st Jan., and the 1st, 4th, 5th, and 6th Feb. 1901—permitted his licensed house to be used as a brothel, contrary to sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1872.

Held, that the information was not bad for duplicity as charging the commission of two or more offences on different and discontinuous days, and that B. might be rightly convicted on it of the offence of permitting his house to be used as a brothel since that offence was a continuing offence.

MOTION for a rule nisi for a writ of certiorari to bring up a conviction of the justices of the borough of Colchester.

The applicant, James Burnby, a licensed victualler, was summoned before the said justices on the 6th Feb. 1901 on the information of the borough head constable charging that he

On the 26th, 28th, 29th, and 31st days of Jan., and the 1st, 4th, 5th, and 6th days of Feb. 1901, at the parish of Colchester within the borough aforesaid, there being duly licensed to sell by retail intoxicating liquors in his house and premises known by the sign of the Royal Oak there situate, unlawfully did permit his house and premises to be used as a brothel, contrary to sect. 15 of the Licensing Act 1872.

Licensing Act 1872 (35 & 36 Vict. c. 94):

Sect. 15. If any licensed person is convicted of permitting his premises to be a brothel he shall be liable to a penalty.

At the hearing the defendant's solicitor took objection that the information was bad for duplicity, on the ground that it alleged the commission of eight separate offences, and he asked that the prosecutor should elect upon which of the eight charges he should proceed. The justices overruled the objection, and after hearing the evidence convicted the defendant, in the terms of the information, of having on the said eight days permitted his house to be used as a brothel.

C. E. Jones for the applicant.—By sect. 10 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act 1848 every information "shall be for one offence only and not for two or more offences." Here, however, the information alleges eight different offences on eight separate and non-continuous days. The justices therefore had no jurisdiction to hear the case unless the information was amended and the prosecutor compelled to elect on which charge he should proceed. The justices refused to amend. [BIGHAM, J.—I cannot see why they should. The information alleges not eight separate offences, but one continuing offence—keeping a brothel—on eight different days.] Here the days are not consecutive. There was an interval of days between the separate acts alleged. If there may be an interval of days, why not one of months or years? In Newman v. Bendyshe (10 Ad. & E. 11), where there were several acts of selling intoxicating liquors on different days in the same information, it was held that a conviction of "the offence aforesaid" was bad since there were three offences. [RIDLEY, J.—In Onley v. Gee (4 L. T. Rep. 338; 30 L. J. 222, M. C.), where there were several days mentioned in the information on which it was alleged that the defendant had kept a betting-house, a conviction for keeping a betting-house on one of those days was held good.] I do not contend that if the justices had here put the prosecutor to his election on which charge he would proceed and had convicted the defendant only on that charge that the conviction would have been bad. My contention is that they convicted him not of one offence, but of several on distinct and discontinuous days.

RIDLEY, J.—I think there is no foundation for this application. This is a continuing offence, and has been so treated by the justices. If it had been a charge of the commission of a separate offence on each of the days named in the information, no doubt the information and conviction would have been bad. But it is not. One offence only is charged. The rule must be refused.

BIGHAM, J.—I am of the same opinion.

Rule refused.

[CT. OF APP.]

CROWN CASES RESERVED.

Saturday, May 18, 1901.

(Before Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J., MATHEW, WILLS, GRANTHAM, and BIGHAM, JJ.)

REX v. COSNETT. (a)

Criminal law—False pretences—Obtaining goods—False cheque—Cheque drawn on closed account—24 & 25 Vict. c. 96, s. 88.

To obtain goods in exchange for a cheque, falsely representing that the cheque will be honoured on presentation, is to obtain goods, not credit, by false pretences. A person in payment for certain goods gave a cheque drawn on a bank at which he represented that he had an account, knowing that his account had been closed, and that the cheque would not be honoured.

Held, that the offence was not obtaining credit but goods by false pretences, and that there was evidence on which he could properly be convicted of that offence.

THE facts of this case, stated by the Deputy-Chairman of the Worcester Quarter Sessions, were, so far as they are material, as follows:—

Thomas Cosnett was indicted for obtaining goods from Thomas Travin by false pretences. The prosecutor Travin had a quantity of old iron which the prisoner had agreed to buy for £1. 17s. The iron was at the prosecutor's farm, and on making the bargain the prisoner paid 10s., and agreed to pay the balance when he removed the iron. On the 1st Jan. 1901 the prisoner came to the prosecutor's farm with a cart for the purpose of taking away the iron, and, while the iron was being loaded on to the cart, the prisoner, after some conversation about payment, wrote and gave to the prosecutor a cheque for £1. 7s., drawn on a bank at Tewkesbury, saying that the cheque was "all right." On the prosecutor presenting the cheque it was dishonoured, the fact being that the prisoner had opened an account at the bank in Aug. 1899, that the account was overdrawn in Oct. 1899 and closed by order of the manager, and that the bank had sued the prisoner for the amount of the overdraft.

It was contended in defence that the property in the iron had passed before the cheque was given, and that therefore the iron was not obtained on a representation that the cheque would be met.

The jury found, in answer to questions put to them by the deputy-chairman, (1) that the intention of the parties was that the iron should remain the prosecutor's property till the whole of the purchase money had been paid; (2) that the prosecutor had not parted with the possession or control of the goods at the time when the cheque was tendered; (3) that the prisoner was aware that the banking account had been closed in Oct. 1899, and that the cheque which he drew would not be honoured; (4) that the prosecutor parted with the iron by reason of the false statements made to him with reference to the said banking account and cheque; and (5) that the prisoner intended throughout to defraud the prosecutor. The jury found the prisoner guilty.

The question for the opinion of the court was whether, upon the facts stated and the findings of the jury, the prisoner was rightly convicted or not.

(a) Reported by A. A. BETHUNE, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

F. W. Sherwood for the prisoner.—There was no evidence on which the jury could find that the iron was obtained by false pretences. The evidence was that the cheque was given after the loading of the goods on to the cart had commenced, and, as the loading of the iron showed that the prosecutor had parted with the property in it, the evidence was that the goods were not obtained by giving the cheque. The offence, if the prisoner committed any, was not obtaining goods by false pretences, but obtaining credit by fraud. He referred to Archbold's Criminal Pleading, 21st edit., p. 567.

J. B. Matthews, for the Crown, was not called upon to argue.

Lord ALVERSTONE, C.J.—The prisoner was indicted for obtaining a quantity of iron by false pretences. The jury found that the bargain was that the iron was to remain the prosecutor's property until all the money had been paid. They also found that the prosecutor parted with the property; and, lastly, they found that the prosecutor parted with the property on the representation of the prisoner that the cheque would be paid when presented. The contract for sale was that the prisoner should pay 10s. on account, and the balance when he came to take away the iron. It has been argued that there was no evidence that the prisoner said that he would pay when he came for the iron. But it appears on the facts stated that while the loading was in progress the prisoner wrote the cheque in question, and on these facts I think that it is clear that the prosecutor would not have allowed the iron to go unless something had been said about payment. The conviction was clearly right; there was evidence on which the jury could find as they did.

MATHEW, WILLS, GRANTHAM, and BIGHAM, JJ. concurred.

COURT OF APPEAL.

June 4 and 5, 1901.

(Before SMITH, M.R., WILLIAMS and STIRLING, L.JJ.)

REX v. SUNDERLAND JUSTICES. (a)

APPEAL FROM THE KING'S BENCH DIVISION.

Licensing—New licence—Confirming sessions—Bias of justices—Agreement between corporation and applicant for licence—Members of corporation voting as justices—Certiorari.

An order of the confirming authority under sect. 43 of the Licensing Act 1872, confirming a new licence, can be brought up on certiorari to be quashed.

Reg. v. Manchester Justices (80 L. T. Rep. 531; (1899) 1 Q. B. 571) approved.

A corporation, having purchased land upon which there was a fully licensed public-house for the purpose of street improvements, made an agreement with a brewery company by which the company agreed to pay 10,000*l.* to the corporation if a licence were granted to the company for a new public-house in another part of the borough, and the corporation agreed to close their public-house and not to apply for renewal of the licence after payment of the 10,000*l.* and the grant of the new licence to the company.

(a) Reported by J. H. WILLIAMS, Esq., Barrister-at-Law.

At the annual licensing meeting a new licence was by a majority granted to the company, and it was subsequently confirmed by the confirming authority by a majority. Some of the justices present at the licensing meeting were members of the corporation and had taken a very active part in promoting the making of the agreement with the company, and these justices were also present at the meeting of the confirming authority.

Held (reversing the decision of the King's Bench Division), that there was such a real likelihood of bias on the part of the justices who were members of the corporation that the grant of the new licence was invalid, and that a writ of certiorari ought to be granted to bring up the order of the confirming authority to be quashed. Reg. v. Stockport Justices (60 J. P. 552) overruled.

THIS was an appeal by the applicant, Foster, from an order of the Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J. and Lawrance, J.) discharging a rule nisi for a certiorari and a rule nisi for a mandamus.

The appellant, Foster, who was a ratepayer and inhabitant of Sunderland, obtained a rule nisi calling upon the justices of the borough of Sunderland to show cause why a writ of certiorari should not issue to bring up a certain order of the 27th Sept. 1900, confirming a provisional licence which had been granted to Duncan and Dalgleish Limited on the 26th Sept. 1900.

In 1899 the corporation of Sunderland bought some property in the borough for the purpose of carrying out some street improvements. A part of that property consisted of a fully licensed public-house, known as the Londonderry Hotel, which was bought for the sum of 14,600*l.*, and it was proposed to use a part of the site of this building for the purpose of widening the street. The corporation endeavoured to make arrangements for the hotel to be pulled down and for a part of the site to be used for widening the street, and for the hotel to be rebuilt upon the rest of the site and to be let to the brewers. This attempt, however, failed.

Subsequently a resolution was passed by the corporation that they should consent to the transfer or lapsing of the licence for the Londonderry Hotel and to the demolition of the hotel, and that the highways committee of the council should be instructed to negotiate accordingly and report the terms which they recommended for acceptance.

The highways committee accordingly entered into negotiations upon the matter, and tenders were invited from various brewers. Duncan and Dalgleish Limited, brewers, offered to pay 10,000*l.* to the corporation for the right to have the licence of the Londonderry Hotel put an end to, they being desirous of obtaining a licence for a new hotel in the Pallion district of Sunderland.

Ultimately a contract under seal was entered into between the corporation and Duncan and Dalgleish Limited, by which it was agreed that in the event of the brewery company making before the justices, and succeeding in, an application for a new licence for the Pallion Hotel, the company would pay to the corporation the sum of 10,000*l.*; the corporation agreed that, after payment of the sum of 10,000*l.*, and after the new hotel at Pallion was licensed and opened, the Londonderry Hotel would be closed and no further application would be made to the licensing justices for a renewal of the licence therefor; it was further agreed that, if the grant and confirmation of the new licence for the hotel at Pallion should be revoked by legal proceedings in the High Court expressly instituted for that purpose, then the sum of 10,000*l.* was to be repaid by the corporation to the company.

At the meeting of the corporation at which it was resolved to enter into that agreement, the chairman of the highways committee who had negotiated the agreement and several other members of the corporation who, as well as the chairman of the highways committee, were justices for the borough took a very active part in the discussion in order to persuade the council to enter into the agreement.

On the 20th Aug. 1900 the annual general licensing meeting for the borough of Sunderland was held. There were present seven justices of the borough who were members of the licensing committee. Of these seven justices, five were members of the corporation, including the chairman of the highways committee and others who had actively supported the adoption of the agreement.

The solicitor who represented Foster and other persons, who were objecting to the grant of the licence for the hotel of Duncan and Dalgleish Limited, objected to those justices who were members of the corporation adjudicating upon the application, but that objection was disregarded.

At that meeting three applications for new licences in the Pallion district were refused, and the meeting was adjourned.

The adjourned meeting was held on the 26th Sept., when six justices who were members of the licensing committee were present, five of whom were the before-mentioned members of the corporation. The same objection was made to the presence of those five justices and was disregarded. The application for a new licence for the hotel of Duncan and Dalgleish Limited was heard and was granted by a majority.

Upon the 27th Sept. the meeting of the confirming authority for the borough was held, and thirteen justices were present, among whom were seven members of the corporation, including the before-mentioned five members.

The confirmation of the new licence for the hotel of Duncan and Dalgleish Limited was opposed by Foster and others, but it was confirmed by a majority.

Foster thereupon obtained the rule nisi for a certiorari, and also a rule nisi for a mandamus.

The Divisional Court (Lord Alverstone, C.J. and Lawrance, J.) discharged the rule nisi for a certiorari and the rule nisi for a mandamus (ante, p. 221; 84 L. T. Rep. 591).

Foster appealed.

C. A. Russell, K.C. and Blacklock for the appellant.—The licensing committee for the borough are a committee of the borough justices, and, as there are no separate quarter sessions for the borough, the confirming body are the whole of the borough justices, by sect. 38 of the Licensing Act 1878. The borough justices are not necessarily members of the corporation, and those who are not members of the corporation could properly hear this application. [WILLIAMS, L.J. referred to Thellusson v. Rendlesham (7 H. L. C. 429), with reference to the fact that there would not be a quorum of the committee if the members of the corporation were disqualified.] If there is any real likelihood of bias, a justice is disqualified from acting. In Reg. v. Rand (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 230) Blackburn, J. said: "Wherever there is a real likelihood that the judge would, from kindred or any other cause, have a bias in favour of one of the parties, it would be very wrong in him to act; and we are not to be understood to say that where there is a real bias of this sort this court would not interfere." In Reg. v. Meyer (34 L. T. Rep. 247; 1 Q. B. Div. 173) Blackburn, J., stating the effect of his judgment in Reg. v. Rand (ubi sup.), said: "The effect of our judgment in that case was that, though pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of dispute, however small, disqualifies the justices, yet the mere possibility of bias did not ipso facto avoid the justices' decision; and we thought that though there was a possibility of bias in that case, yet it was not real. But we expressly excepted a real bias, saying . . ." In the case of a pecuniary interest the inference is at once drawn that there is bias; in the case of any other interest the court does not inquire whether the interest did in fact influence the man's mind, but only whether there was a real likelihood that it would do so. In Reg. v. Hertfordshire Justices (6 Q. B. 753) Lord Denman, C.J. said: "We cannot enter into an analysis of the different motives which may have produced the decision; it is enough to say that a single interested person has formed part of the court." The court has never entertained the question of fact as to whether the presence of an interested justice has influenced the decision at all, and that shows that it is not necessary to prove that there was in fact bias on the part of a justice; it is sufficient to show that there was a real likelihood of bias arising from some interest. The rule to be deduced from all the cases is that, when it is alleged that a justice is disqualified from acting by reason of some interest which is not a pecuniary interest, it must be shown that the interest is of such a kind that there is a reasonable likelihood that it will influence the mind of the justice. The case of Reg. v. Stockport Justices (60 J. P. 552) was wrongly decided, and ought to be overruled. A writ of certiorari can be granted to bring up an order of justices acting as the confirming authority under sect. 43 of the Licensing Act 1872:

Reg. v. Manchester Justices, 80 L. T. Rep. 531; (1899) 1 Q. B. 571;

Reg. v. Sharman, 78 L. T. Rep. 320; (1898) 1 Q. B. 578.

They cited also

Reg. v. Cumberland Justices, 58 L. T. Rep. 491;

Reg. v. Huon, 12 Times L. Rep. 323;

Attorney-General v. Willett, 16 J. P. 643;

Reg. v. Fraser, 57 J. P. 500.

E. Shortt for the licensing justices.—Neither certiorari nor mandamus will lie in a case of this kind. First of all, however, there was no bias in this case, within the rule laid down by the authorities, which could disqualify any of the justices from acting. The consideration for the promise of the brewers to pay 10,000*l.* to the corporation was the agreement that the licence which the corporation had should be surrendered in order that the brewers might be able to say that another licence would be surrendered when they applied for the new licence at Pallion, and that therefore the number of licences would not be increased if a new licence was granted to them. In order to disqualify a justice from acting, the alleged bias must be a real and substantial bias. Now, here, the corporation were bound by their agreement not to oppose the granting of a new licence to the brewers, but that was the act of the corporation and in no sense the act of the individual members. Any individual member of the corporation was perfectly free to act as a justice in the way which might seem right to him. The corporation would not be responsible for the action of any member. The interest of a justice must be substantial in order to disqualify him. In Reg. v. Meyer (34 L. T. Rep. 247; 1 Q. B. Div. 173) Blackburn, J. said: "But though disqualifying interest is not confined to pecuniary interest, the interest, if not pecuniary, must be substantial." The interest must be so substantial that the court ought to assume that there was a real likelihood and not a mere possibility of bias:

Reg. v. Rand, L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 230.

In this case, the justices who were members of the corporation had no personal interest in the matter at all, and had no desire one way or the other with regard to the granting of a new licence to the brewers. The mere desire as a member of the corporation to have certain improvements carried out in a way as beneficial to the ratepayers as possible is not such an interest as creates a disqualification. There is no evidence at all in this case of any such likelihood of bias on the part of the justices who were members of the corporation as would disqualify them from acting. Certiorari will not lie to bring up an order of the confirming authority to be quashed. The confirming authority is a body of licensing justices created by the Act of George IV. By the Act of 1872 they elect a committee from their number to take the first steps in licensing proceedings, and they only sit as the whole body of justices for the purpose of confirming new licences; they are still, when so acting, the licensing justices sitting at the licensing meeting. The confirming meeting, if a new licence is confirmed, grants a certificate which is signed on behalf of the majority who voted for the confirmation. There is no order, or determination, or record of any kind which can be brought up by certiorari. The confirming authority is in exactly the same position as the licensing committee, and is not a court at all:

Boulter v. Kent Justices, 77 L. T. Rep. 288; (1897) A. C. 556.

The confirming authority acts under sect. 38 of the Act of 1872, and is a meeting of the licensing justices. [SMITH, M.B. referred to Reg. v. Cumberland Justices (58 L. T. Rep. 491).] It is true that, under sect. 43 of the Act of 1872, the confirming authority has power to give costs to the successful party, but that does not make the confirming authority any more a court than the licensing committee. The applicant and the objector are not parties in the ordinary sense; the objector appears in the public interest to give information to the meeting and is more like a witness than a party, and the justices have power to order the payment of the expenses of such witnesses. There is no lis inter partes in proceedings before the confirming authority. If there were a lis, each party ought to have the same remedy if he is aggrieved, but if a certificate of confirmation is not granted there is absolutely nothing which the applicant can bring up by certiorari. It cannot be supposed that the Legislature intended to create a lis inter partes without giving to both parties the same remedy if aggrieved. In the case of Reg. v. Sharman (78 L. T. Rep. 320; (1898) 1 Q. B. 578) it was held by Wright and Darling, JJ. that certiorari would not lie in the case of a meeting of licensing justices. With regard to the second rule, mandamus will not lie.

E. Tindal Atkinson, K.C. and E. H. Lloyd for the brewers.—A mandamus will not lie in cases of this kind. Certiorari will not lie, because in order to establish a right to a writ of certiorari there must be some order which can be brought before the court. The case must be one in which some order must be made, whichever party is successful. The certificate of the confirming authority is not an order in any sense. That was said by Lord Herschell in Boulter v. Kent Justices (ubi sup.). Sect. 43 of the Act of 1872 only makes a statutory addition to the previous jurisdiction of the licensing justices and gives power to grant costs. The mere right to grant costs does not confer upon that tribunal the character of a court. If these proceedings are a subject for certiorari, then the court could order the whole proceedings to be brought into the King's Bench Division for trial, and there hear the matter and grant a licence. No one has ever heard of such a proceeding. With regard to the other point, it seems to be contended that members of the corporation are disqualified from acting as justices because as members they have expressed an opinion upon the matter. That is not sufficient. No judge is disqualified because he has expressed an opinion, however strongly, upon the matter. Bias must be caused by some external matter which does not touch the merits of the case. In Reg. v. Cumberland Justices (58 L. T. Rep. 491), to which the Master of the Rolls has referred, the justice complained of was in fact a litigant as a member of the board of guardians.

Russell, K.C. was not called upon to reply.

SMITH, M.R.—This case has been well argued, and I agree that it is a case which requires a good deal of consideration, but, having ascertained the facts, I think there is no difficulty in ascertaining what the rule is with regard to the first point. The question then is to ascertain clearly what the facts are, in order to ascertain whether or not the justices in question, who sat at the licensing meeting and also at the meeting of the confirming authority, were so biased as not to be capable of making the orders which they did make, and which are now being brought up for the purpose of being quashed by writ of certiorari. This is an appeal to this court against the refusal of the King's Bench Division to quash two orders which have been brought up upon certiorari. A rule nisi was obtained, and we are asked to make that rule nisi absolute. The applicant, Mr. Foster, who, I understand, is a ratepayer of Sunderland, appeals to this court, and contends that that rule nisi ought to have been made absolute; in other words, that those two orders ought to have been quashed on the ground of bias in the justices who made those orders. I think it will be convenient for me to point out, in the first instance, what these two orders are before I come to the facts of the case. The first order states that at the meeting of the licensing committee for the county borough of Sunderland, held on the 26th Sept 1900, six of the justices of the borough, being the majority of the members of the licensing committee appointed for the borough then present, did thereby grant to John Duncan a provisional grant authorising him, after those presents and the order of confirmation thereunder written should have been declared to be final by an order of the licensing justices of the borough to be made in pursuance of sect. 22 of the Licensing Act 1874, to apply for and hold any of the excise licences that may be held by a publican for the sale by retail in the premises in question of all intoxicating liquors to be consumed on the premises. The confirming order states that at a special sessions of the justices of the county borough of Sunderland eight of the said justices, being the majority of the justices then assembled, did thereby confirm the within provisional grant. Now, it is said by the applicant that the justices who made those orders, whether as the original licensing committee or as the confirming authority, were incapacitated from sitting on the bench and making these orders by reason of bias. With regard to the confirming meeting of justices, I understand there were thirteen present, and they voted by eight to five in favour of the licence being granted to the Pallion Hotel. Now, before I come to the rule as to what constitutes a real bias, I wish to state specifically what I understand to be the facts of the case, because they are very important. In my judgment, in all these cases, when the decision of the justices is impeached on the ground of the bias of the justices, it is always a question of fact as to whether or not, as I understand the rule to be, there was a likelihood of there being a real bias in the justices. That is a question of fact and a question of inference to be drawn from the admitted facts. If there is a likelihood of there being a real bias in the justices, then, in my opinion, the law is undoubtedly that these justices are incapacitated from sitting on the judgment seat. That seems to be in accord with natural justice and common sense. Now, that that is the rule I will show presently by citing three or four cases from which this rule is to be deduced. Now, what are the facts? There was a street in Sunderland which was too narrow, and it was thought desirable for the town of Sunderland, and it was desired by the corporation of Sunderland, to widen that street. There was in the way a large hotel called the Londonderry Hotel, which was a fully licensed house, and the street could not be widened in the manner that was proposed while that hotel continued to stand as it was. It was thought that they might pull down that portion of the hotel which was contiguous to the proposed new street, and then rebuild and relet it as an hotel to the brewers. But those negotiations did not come to anything, and fell through. It was suggested later on that if they could get the brewers to come forward and give a large sum of money to the corporation, if they could get a licence for the Pallion Hotel, that would be a very effective way of recouping the corporation of Sunderland for the 14,600*l.* which I understand they paid for the Londonderry Hotel. They would get in that way a large sum of money towards that outlay, and it would be a desirable thing for the corporation of Sunderland to get the improvement carried out by means of this sum of money to be paid by the brewers to the corporation. Now, there appears upon the documents, as it seems to me, strong evidence that certain members, who afterwards sat upon the judgment seat when this licence was granted, took a very keen and lively interest in getting the brewers bound by agreement to pay 10,000*l.* to the corporation if they could get a new licence for the Pallion Hotel. I have only to read the report of the speeches that were made by Mr. Gibson at a meeting of the corporation; he is one of those who sat upon the bench and is said to have been biassed. One cannot read those speeches through without seeing that he took a very lively interest and a very keen part in getting that agreement made with the brewers. At this meeting there was discussed the question of what other brewers would be willing to give, and the question was discussed whether those offers should be accepted or not, and at last Mr. Alderman Reed proposed as an amendment—he is one of the justices who sat upon the bench and whose capacity is impeached—that, as the matter with Vaux and Co. had fallen through, the council accept the tender of Duncan and Dalgleish of 10,000*l.* for the licence. Mr. Gibson and Mr. Reed were there, and I believe there were others there of those who subsequently sat upon the bench. I cannot read this without coming to the conclusion that they were all most interested to get, if they could, the brewers (Duncan and Dalgleish) bound by this agreement to pay this 10,000*l.* to the corporation. I hold as a matter of fact that that is an inference which I can draw for myself. Then the agreement was made. What is the upshot of the agreement? The agreement, it seems to me, paraphrased is this: Duncan and Dalgleish agree in writing with the corporation of Sunderland, at the instance of some of these gentlemen who afterwards sat upon the judgment seat, that they will pay the corporation 10,000*l.* if they can get from the licensing committee the grant of a licence for the new house at Pallion, but if for any reason thereafter that new licence is not granted to the Pallion, or does not hold good, then the corporation must return that 10,000*l.* to the brewers. That is the agreement which was keenly debated and in which a very lively interest was shown by these gentlemen who afterwards sat upon the judgment seat. The agreement was entered into in writing and was executed. They afterwards sat upon the judgment seat, and the result was that, at the meeting at which they were present, by a majority this new licence was granted to the Pallion Hotel. Now Mr. Foster comes forward and says that the justices who took that active part in getting this agreement entered into between the brewers and the corporation were so interested that it would be likely that they would have a real bias when sitting upon the judgment seat in granting a licence to the Pallion Hotel so that the 10,000*l.* should come to the corporation; and that therefore their order ought to be brought up and quashed because it is an order made by interested persons. Now, I say nothing invidious against these gentlemen at all. The whole question is whether or not they have come within the rule. What is the rule with regard to bias? A justice of the peace personally or pecuniarily interested in the matter cannot sit upon the judgment seat. That has been decided, but that is not this case. A justice of the peace cannot be a litigant and a judge in his own matter—that is, in a matter in which he is concerned—that is bias. That is not this case. Is there any other bias which disqualifies a justice from sitting on the judgment seat and adjudicating upon such a case as this? Now, there are perhaps three cases to which I ought to call attention with regard to this question. First of all there is the case of Reg. v. Rand (L. Rep. 1 Q. B. 230). There Blackburn, J. delivered the judgment of the court, composed of Cockburn, C.J. and Blackburn and Shee, J.J., and he said: "The question which we have to determine is whether this disqualifies the justices from acting in what was certainly a judicial inquiry; and we think it does not. There is no doubt that any direct pecuniary interest, however small, in the subject of inquiry does disqualify a person from acting as a judge in the matter; and if by any possibility these gentlemen, though mere trustees, could have been liable to costs, or to other pecuniary loss or gain, in consequence of their being so, we should think the question different from what it is; for that might be held an interest. But the only way in which the facts could affect their impartiality would be that they might have a tendency to favour those for whom they were trustees; and that is an objection not in the nature of interest, but of a challenge to the favour. Wherever there is a real likelihood that the judge would, from kindred or any other cause, have a bias in favour of one of the parties, it would be very wrong in him to act; and we are not to be understood to say that where there is a real bias of this sort this court would not interfere." Now, to apply to the present case the rule that "wherever there is a real likelihood that the judge would, from kindred or any other cause, have a bias in favour of one of the parties." Can I say judicially that I am convinced that there is not a real likelihood here that these gentlemen, who have taken such an interest in getting this 10,000*l.* agreement entered into by the brewers, would have a bias in favour of one of the parties, namely, in favour of the brewers who have agreed in writing to give the 10,000*l.* if they get the licence from the justices, that is, to give or withhold the 10,000*l.* conditionally upon obtaining a licence? I cannot say there was not. So much for the case of Reg. v. Rand. Then the case of Reg. v. Rand came up again in the case of Reg. v. Meyer (34 L. T. Rep. 247; 1 Q. B. Div. 173), and there again Blackburn, J. restates what he had stated in Reg. v. Rand. He says there: "But the disqualification in the present instance

REX v. SUNDERLAND JUSTICES.

is not on the ground of pecuniary interest. The question is, Was Mr. Meyer really substantially interested, though not in a pecuniary sense, in the proceedings as to which these informations were one step, so as to be likely to have a real bias in the matter? Now, it is impossible to read Mr. Harrison's affidavit, which is really and substantially uncontradicted, without seeing Mr. Meyer had such an interest. In the case of a justice having any pecuniary interest the court were compelled to quash the conviction; but though disqualifying interest is not confined to pecuniary interest, the interest, if not pecuniary, must be substantial. In Reg. v. Band we held that there was no ground for quashing the certificate of the justices. The effect of our judgment in that case was that, though pecuniary interest in the subject-matter of dispute, however small, disqualifies the justices, yet the mere possibility of bias did not ipso facto avoid the justices' decision; and we thought that, though there was a possibility of bias in that case, yet it was not real. But we expressly excepted a real bias, saying 'that we must not be understood to say that where there is a real bias this court would not interfere.' Now, I have laid down the law, and I have already said what I think is the true inference to be drawn from the facts. The other case to which I wish to refer seems to me to go rather further than Blackburn, J. went. I am alluding to the judgment of Lord Russell, C.J. in Reg. v. Hain (12 Times L. Rep. 323), who said: "There was no doubt about the law that the decisions of justices should be carefully scrutinised when they were acting under circumstances which indicated the possibility of their being biased." Without referring to what I and my brother Mathew said in Reg. v. Cumberland Justices (58 L. T. Rep. 491), it seems to me that that case goes a considerable way towards supporting the judgment I am giving in the present case—namely, that these gentlemen did so interest themselves in and about getting this agreement signed by the brewers, that they have thereby incapacitated themselves from sitting on the judgment seat. I wish to add this, that it seems to me to be of importance, not only in this court, but in every court, that a man who is going to sit on the judgment seat should not lay himself open even to the statement being made by the other side that he is so interested in the matter that he might possibly have a bias. I therefore have come to the conclusion here, after finding out what the rule is and applying it to the facts of this case, that this rule for a certiorari ought to have been made absolute and not discharged, as it was in the King's Bench Division. Another point was taken. It is said that this is not a proper matter for certiorari. Before the decision in Boulter v. Kent Justices (77 L. T. Rep. 288; (1897) A. C. 556) it is clear from Blackburn, J.'s decisions that this class of certificate was a matter for certiorari, and I have no doubt that it was. The point taken was that the decision in Boulter v. Kent Justices (ubi sup.) has altered all that. Now, as I have said during the argument, I do not know what other judges may do, but I am not myself going to be a party to extending the case of Reg. v. Boulter. That was a case which had reference to a licensing committee and a licensing committee alone, and I quite agree that the House of Lords have held that a licensing committee is not a court. I think it follows that, if it is not a court, certiorari possibly would not lie. I understand that Channell, J. said in Reg. v. Manchester Justices (80 L. T. Rep. 531; (1899) 1 Q. B. 571) that, with regard to the confirming order, certiorari will lie, and I agree with him on two grounds. First of all, in my opinion, clearly before Reg. v. Kent Justices (ubi sup.) it would lie, and, in my opinion, that case does not touch the confirming sessions; and the main reason for the distinction which I would draw between the confirming sessions and the original sessions is that in the original sessions there is no party. It is pointed out by Lord Herschell in the House of Lords in that case that there was no party, because on one side there was the applicant and on the other side there was all the world. With regard to the confirming authority, it is enacted by sect. 43 of the Licensing Act 1872 that "Any person who appears before the licensing justices and opposes the grant of a new licence and no other person may appear and oppose the confirmation of such grant by the confirming authority in counties or boroughs, and the confirming authority may award such costs as they shall deem just to the party" who shall succeed in the proceedings before them. There we find the applicant and the party, and a legislative enactment by which the confirming authority are entitled to award costs. It seems to me that there is a great distinction between a meeting of the confirming authority and the annual licensing meeting, and I agree with my brother Channell with regard to that. Then it was said that there was no order to be brought up and quashed by certiorari. Though the order of the confirming authority merely states that the justices confirm the provisional grant of a licence by the licensing committee, the real meaning of that is that the confirming authority make an order that there shall be a licence granted to this Pallion Hotel. Then the appellant says that the justices of Sunderland, who made that order, had no jurisdiction to make it on the ground of bias. For these reasons I think that this appeal must be allowed.

WILLIAMS, L.J.—I agree. This is an appeal from the decision of the Divisional Court, consisting of the Lord Chief Justice and Lawrence, J. I want to say, first, that I am not at all clear myself that the Divisional Court could have properly arrived at any other decision than that at which they did arrive, because the Divisional Court were bound by the decision of the Divisional Court in the case of Reg. v. Stockport Justices (60 J. P. 552), and Mr. Russell in arguing this case very properly conceded that it was not possible to draw any distinction between the facts of that case and the facts in this case. In this court, however, we are not bound by the decision in that case. We have to decide the question for ourselves. Now, I will first deal with the technical objection which is made that this is a case in which a certiorari will not lie. It appears to me that it is quite sufficient to say that I entirely agree with the judgment of Channell, J. in the case of Reg. v. Manchester Justices (ubi sup.), and I agree with him for the very reason that he gives—that is to say, it is perfectly plain to my mind, whatever was decided in Boulter v. Kent Justices (ubi sup.), that that decision applies only to the proceedings of the licensing committee, and has no application whatsoever to the proceedings of the confirming justices. When one looks at the terms of sect 43 of the Licensing Act of 1872 and finds a provision that the confirming authority may award such costs as they shall deem just to the party who shall succeed in the proceedings before them, it is to my mind impossible to say that there is not a lis, or that there is not a lis with parties, or that, however narrowly the line may be drawn as to when certiorari will lie, a certiorari would not lie in such a case as the order of the confirming justices under sect. 43 of the Act of 1872. I wish to add for myself that I do not regard the case of Boulter v. Kent Justices (ubi sup.) as having decided that certiorari will only lie when there is an order of a court properly so called. It is not necessary to decide it in this case, but all I can say, speaking of one's instinctive knowledge of the common law, is that I had always conceived the common law to be that, wherever a body, whether justices or otherwise, had under the provisions of a statute to grant or withhold a statutory certificate, and on looking at the section it appeared that they had to exercise their judicial discretion in so doing, a certiorari would lie whether or not the body upon whom the statute imposed the duty of granting or withholding the certificate were or were not a court. Now, having said this about certiorari, I will say a word or two about the merits of this case. To my mind this is happily one of those cases in which, instead of having a conflict of cases, or cases which it is difficult to reconcile, we have a continuous series of authorities which is absolutely unchanged in its colour and flow, and, if one takes the two decisions of Blackburn, J. in Reg. v. Rand (ubi sup.) and Reg. v. Meyer (ubi sup.), one really has the whole law laid down. When is it that a justice or a judge is disqualified from acting? In the first place, he is disqualified from acting if he has an interest. The moment one finds a justice with an interest—that is to say, an interest which is pecuniary or capable of pecuniary measure—that alone is sufficient. The law then makes a presumption that he is biased. The law, for reasons of policy which hardly require an explanation, does not think it convenient, when once a pecuniary interest is admitted, to go into the question whether or not the judge, upon the occasion of the particular trial, acted partially or impartially; it presumes bias from the very fact of the pecuniary interest. Now, this is not a case where the justices have personally any pecuniary interest at all. The utmost which could be said would be that they had a pecuniary interest as trustees. I do not think that the pecuniary interest as trustees, on the authorities, is sufficient to raise this legal presumption. But, then, is there any other case besides the case of interest in which a justice is disqualified from acting? The answer, on looking at the case of Reg. v. Rand (ubi sup.), is that clearly there is another case, and that is the case where the objection is not in the nature of interest, but, to use the expression of Blackburn, J., “of a challenge to the favour,” and in such a case, the presumption not arising, we have to ask ourselves whether there is a real likelihood that the judge, from the circumstances raising this challenge to the favour, would have a bias in favour of one of the parties. That being so, before I answer that question, I look to the facts of this case. The corporation, being minded to widen this street, had purchased the Londonderry Hotel for the purpose of pulling down a portion of it and widening the street. They had purchased it for a sum of 14,600*l.*, and they arrived at the conclusion that they could not conveniently, even if they could legally, carry on the business of this hotel, and I do not know whether, if the street had been widened, or as soon as it was widened, it would have been physically possible to do so. In that state of things, having a very valuable licence to sell, they invited the brewers and others within the district to tender for what has been called a surrender by the corporation of this licence. It was not strictly speaking a surrender, and the only possible advantage to be gained by the person whose tender was accepted and who made the payment was that, if the corporation agreed not to apply for a renewal, or to pull down or demolish the Londonderry Hotel, when the person making the payment applied for a new licence in this district he would be able to urge as one of the matters in favour of a grant of the licence, that the grant of the licence to him would not increase the number of licences in the district. But I do not think one ought to leave out of consideration, when one is going through these facts, that in this district, which has been called the Pallion district, it was perfectly plain that the corporation were well aware that there were several persons who would be disposed to open a new hotel or public-house if they could obtain a licence. I think it is perfectly plain that the corporation were aware that there was competition to get a new licence for this Pallion district. I presume that it is probably an increasing district. Under these circumstances an agreement was entered into by the corporation for the payment of 10,000*l.*, which sum was only to be paid when the new licence had been granted by the licensing committee and confirmed by the confirming body, and which sum was to be returned in the event of the High Court quashing the licence. The question is whether the magistrates, who were actively engaged in the negotiation of this agreement under which this 10,000*l.* was to be paid, had become thereby disqualified from acting as justices in the matter of the confirmation of this licence under the 43rd section of the Act of 1872. In other words, one has to ask oneself whether in these circumstances there is a real likelihood that the justices would, by reason of the part they had taken in the negotiation of this agreement, have a bias in favour of this particular applicant for this new licence for an hotel in the Pallion district. To my mind it is really not possible to draw any other conclusion than the conclusion that there is a real likelihood that these justices would have a bias. I do not know that one adds to it by stating it in different words, because the substance of the law is just the same when it is stated by Blackburn, J. in his later judgment of Reg. v. Meyer (ubi sup.). The mere possibility or mere suspicion that a judge might be biased is not sufficient. That was decided in the case of Reg. v. Dean and Chapter of Rochester (17 Q. B. 1). It cannot be said here that there is a mere possibility or mere suspicion. To my mind one must judge of these things as reasonable men would judge of them in the conduct of their own business; and can anyone doubt that a man in the conduct of his own business would infallibly draw from these circumstances the inference that these justices, who negotiated this agreement, would have a real bias in favour of the granting of a licence to these particular persons? Under these circumstances I entirely agree with the judgment which has been delivered by my Lord, and I should not have added anything except that the case is one of considerable general importance in form and, as I have already said, in substance, by reason of the Divisional Court being bound by the case of Reg. v. Stockport Justices (ubi sup.), which we are overruling.

STIRLING, L.J.—I am of the same opinion. The question to which we have to address ourselves is, I apprehend, that which is stated in the judgment of Blackburn, J. in the case of Reg. v. Rand (ubi sup.)—namely, whether there is in this case a real likelihood that the justices would have a bias in favour of one of the parties. The nature of the bias is indicated in that judgment by the reference which the learned judge there makes to a bias in favour of kindred. That is an illustration which he gives, though he includes in it other cases. Now, what is said here to give rise to the bias is that a contract was entered into on the 22nd Aug. 1900 between the corporation of Sunderland of the one part and a limited company, Duncan and Dalgleish, of the other part, who are brewers, by which it was agreed that in the event of the brewery company making before the justices and succeeding in an application for a licence, the brewery company would pay over to the corporation the sum of 10,000*l.* The consideration on the part of the corporation receiving this 10,000*l.* was an agreement on their part that, after payment of the sum of 10,000*l.*, and after the premises which were licensed had been opened under the licence so obtained, then a certain property known as the Londonderry Hotel, which was the property of the corporation, would be closed, and that no further application would be made to the licensing justices for a renewal of the licence which had been granted for that property. There was a further stipulation in the agreement that, if the grant and confirmation of the licence should be revoked by legal proceedings, then the sum of 10,000*l.* was to be repaid. Now, the Londonderry Hotel, as I have said, was the property of the corporation, and it came to be the property of the corporation in this way. The corporation were improving the streets of the borough, and part, not the whole, of this licensed hotel was required for the purposes of the improvements. In order to enable improvements to be made, it was found necessary that the corporation should buy the whole hotel, and the corporation did buy it, paying for it a sum of over 14,600*l.* This took place some time in the year 1899. They subsequently made attempts to sell so much of the hotel and of the site of it as was not required for the purposes of the proposed improvements, but they failed, and after considerable negotiation this contract, to which I have already referred, was entered into. Now, that contract was approved at a meeting of the corporation which was held, I think, on the same day, the 22nd Aug., and on behalf of the respondent justices a short report of the proceedings at that meeting has been put in evidence. Looking at that report, it is impossible not to see that the proposal to enter into this contract was a matter of keen interest amongst the members of the corporation who were present upon that occasion, and among them I observe that a Mr. Atkinson Gibson, who was chairman of the highways committee, took an active part and so also did another gentleman—namely, Mr. Alderman Reed, who moved in point of fact that this contract should be entered into; and at the close of the discussion Mr. Gibson put forcibly to the members of the corporation the reasons which appeared to him to be weighty for the acceptance of the proposals which had been made. He said: "As a matter of fact, the corporation had paid some 14,000*l.* for the Londonderry and had purchased the licence. Were they as trustees of the ratepayers, if the licence could be surrendered for a certain sum of money, going to throw the chance away? Certainly not." Now, after the discussion had been closed with that speech, the matter was put to the vote, and the proposal that this contract should be entered into was accepted. The matter then had to come before the licensing justices, and the first stage is that it comes before the licensing committee. That committee, as I understand, consisted of seven justices, five of whom were members of the corporation, and amongst them were the two gentlemen to whom I have referred—Mr. Atkinson Gibson and Mr. Reed. At that meeting the proposal to grant a licence, on which the whole contract hinges, was accepted by a majority. Again, at the meeting of the confirming justices which was afterwards held, thirteen justices were present, of whom seven were members of the corporation, again including Mr. Atkinson Gibson and Mr. Reed, and that proposition was carried by eight to five. Now, the question to be decided is that which I have already stated, and it raises a short point, though perhaps not an easy point. Really in this case we have each of us to perform the functions of a jury, and apply our minds to the question which I have already stated, whether there was a real likelihood that the justices would be biased in considering this application which came before them. It seems to me that the answer to that question must be in the affirmative, and that, having regard to the active part which had been taken by Mr. Atkinson Gibson and Mr. Reed, and to the obvious feeling of interest in the whole matter which is shown by the discussion which took place at the meeting to sanction the contract being entered into, I cannot but feel that the securing of 10,000*l.* for the funds of the corporation was a matter which must have weighed in the minds of those who had taken so active a part in getting this contract entered into by the corporation. For these reasons I think that on the merits of the case the appeal ought to be allowed. As regards the technical question, whether this is a case in which a writ of certiorari ought to be granted, I do not think I can usefully add anything to that which has already been said by my Lords.

SMITH, M.R.—I omitted to deal with the case of Reg. v. Stockport Justices (ubi sup.), and I wish to say that I agree with what Williams, L.J. has said. I do not see how the Lord Chief Justice and Lawrance, J., sitting as a divisional court, could have held otherwise than they did. In this court we can draw our own inferences of fact, and have done so.

Appeal allowed. Rule nisi for a certiorari made absolute.

CHANCERY DIVISION.

June 29, July 10 and 11, 1901.

(Before BYRNE, J.)

ATTORNEY-GENERAL v. TAMWORTH RURAL DISTRICT COUNCIL. (a)

Inclosure award—Jurisdiction of commissioner—Watercourse—Repairing and cleansing—Highway authority—Inclosure Act (52 Geo. 3, c. xiii.).

An Inclosure Act provided that the commissioner should set out such watercourses as he should think proper, and should order and direct by whom and at whose expense such watercourses should be repaired and cleansed. The Act further provided that the commissioner should assign land for the getting of materials for repairing public roads. The commissioner, in pursuance of such Act, by his award appointed certain roads to be set out, and awarded to the surveyor of highways land for the getting of materials for the repair of public roads. He further ordered that a watercourse should be made, and directed that such watercourse should for ever thereafter be repaired and cleansed by the surveyor of highways for the time being, the expenses attendant upon such repairing and cleansing to be paid out of a rate to be made for the repair of highways in the township.
